Prince, hath obtained any new Signiory, and added it to that of his own, or exalted himself from being a private man to the dignity of a Prince, it behooveth the Successor to maintain it by the same way and art, by which it was gotten.

To conclude, Syracuse (though not without blows, ere that she could cleanse her self of the creatures and lovers of Gelon) was now again become Mistress of her self, and held her self free, well-near three score years, to the time of Dionysius, though she were in the mean while greatly endangered by a Citizen of her own, called Tindarus.

Now, to prevent the greatness of any one among them, for the future, they devised a kind of banishment of such among them, as were suspected; taking pattern from the Athenian Ostracisme. They called this their new devised judgement of exile, Petalismos, wherein every one wrote upon an Olive-leaf (as at Athens they wrote upon shells) the name of him, whom he would have expelled the City. He that had most suffrages against him, was banished for five years. Hereby in a short time, it came to pass that those of judgement, and best able to govern the Commonwealth, were, by the worst able, either suppressed, or thrust out of the City. Yea, such as feared this Law; though they had not yet felt it, withdrew themselves as secretly as they could, seeking some place of more security, wherein to maintain themselves. And good reason they had so to do; seeing that there is nothing so terrible in any State, as a powerful and authorized ignorance. But this Law lasted not very long. For their necessity taught them to abolish it, and restore again the wiser sort unto the Government; from which, the Nobility having practised to banish one another, the State became altogether Popular. But after a while, being invaded by Ducetius, King of the Sicilians, that inhabited the inner part of the Island (who had already taken Enna, and some other of the Grecian Cities, and overthrown the Army of the Agigentines) the Syracusians sent forces against him, commanded by an unworthy Citizen of theirs, called Bolcon. This their Captain made nothing so much haste to find out Ducetius, against whom he was employed, as he did to flee from the Army he led, as soon as Ducetius presented him battle. So for want of conduct, the greatest number of the Syracusians perished.

But making better choice among those whom they had banished, they levy other troops: by whom, in conclusion, Ducetius being being beaten, submitte himself, and is constrained to leave the Island for a time. Yet it was not long ere he returned again, and built the City Collatina on the Sea-side.

Ducetius being dead; all the Greek Cities did in a fort acknowledge Syracuse, Trinacria excepted; which also by force of Arms, in the fourscore and fifth Olympiad, they brought to reason.

But they do not long enjoy this their Superintendency. For the Citizens of Leontium, being oppressed by them, seek aid from the Athenians; about the sixth year of the Peloponnesian War. In this suit they prevailed by the eloquence of Gorgias their Orator; and got an hundred Athenian Gallies to succour them, under the leading of Laches, and Charmoder. To this Fleet, the Leontines, and their Partners, added one hundred more; with which forces, and with some supplies brought by Sophocles, Pythodorus, Eurymedon, and other Athenian Captains, they invaded the Territories of the Syracusians, and their Partisans; wan and lost divers places; took Messana; and in the seventh year of the Peloponnesian War, lost it again. They also at the same time attempted Hymera, but in vain. The fire of this quarrel took hold upon many Cities, which did invade each others Territory with great violence. But when they had wearied themselves on all hands, and yet could see none issue of the War, the Leontines, without the advice of the Athenians, came to an accord with the Syracusians, and were admitted into their society, with equal freedom. So the Athenians, who hoped to have greatened themselves in Sicily, by the division and civil War, were disappointed of their expectation, by the good agreement of the Sicilians, and fain to be gone with the broken remainder of their Fleet. This they knew not how to amend; but (according to the custom of popular Estates) by taking revenge upon their own Commanders. So they banished Pythodorus, and Sophocles, and laid an heavy fine upon Eurymedon. Shortly after this, followed the most memorable War, that ever was made by the Greeks in Sicily; which was that of the Athenians, against the Selinuntines and Syracusians, in favour of the Cities of Egesta, Leontium, and Catana. They of Selinus had oppressed the Egestians; and they of Syracuse the Leontines, and the Catanians: which was the ground of the War. For the Athenians undertook the protection of their old friends: and, in hatred of the Athenians, aid from Lacedaemon was sent to the Syracusians. The Lacedaemonians dealt plainly, having none other end, than that which they pretended, namely, to help a people of their own Tribe, that craved their succour, being in distress. The Athenians scarce knew what to pretend: for their preparations were so great, as discovered their intent to be none other, than the Conquest of the whole Island. Yet they which had called them in, were so blinded with their own passions, that they would not believe their own eyes; which presented unto them a Fleet and Army, far greater, than the terrible report of fame had made it.

In this expedition, the City of Athens had engaged all her power; as regarding not only the greatness of the enterprise, but the necessity of finishing it in a short space of time. For the Lacedaemonians (as hath already been shewed in due place) stood at that time in such broken terms of peace with Athens, as differed not much from open War. Wherefore it was thought necessary, either to spare cost in this great Expedition, or altogether to forbear it: which was likely to be hindered by Wars at home, if their proceedings were slack abroad. And surely, had not the desire of the Athenians been over-passionate, the arguments of Nicias had caused them to abstain from so chargeable a business, and to reserve their forces for a more needful use. But young counsels prevailed against the authority of ancient men, that were more regardful of safety than of honour.

Of this business, mention hath been already made, in that which we have written of the Peloponnesian War. But what was there delivered in general terms, as not concerning the affairs of Greece, otherwise than by consequence, doth in this place require a more perfect relation, as a matter, wherein the whole State of Sicily was like to have felt a great conversion.

Though Alcibiades had prevailed against Nicias, in exhorting the people to this great voyage; yet Nicias, together with Alcibiades and Lamachus, was appointed to be one of the chief Commanders therein.

These had commission and direction, as well to succour the Segelians, and to re-establish the Leontines, call out of their places by the Syracusians; as also by force of Arms, to subvert the Syracusians, and all their adherents in Sicily, and compel them by tribute, to acknowledge the Athenians for their supreme Lords. To effect which, the for-named Captains were sent off, with an hundred and thirty Gallies, and five thousand one hundred Souldiers, besides the thirty ships of burden, which transported their vituals, engines, and other munitions for the War: and these were Athenians, Mantineans, Rhodians, and Candians: there were, besides these, six thousand Megarians light-armed, with thirty horsemen.

l. 6. c. 9.

With these troops and fleets they arrive at Rhegium, where the Rhegians refuse to give them entry; but sell them vituals for their money. From thence they sent to the Egeftians, to know what treasure they would contribute towards the war, seeing for their sakes they had entred thereinto. But they found by their answers, that these Egeftians were poor, and that they had abused the Athenian Embassadors with false shews of gold, having in all but 30. talents. The Athenians further were discouraged, when they found that the Rhegians, their ancient friends, and allied unto the Leontines, refused to trust them within their Walls. Hereupon Nicias adviseth to depart towards the Selimumnians, and to force them, or persuade them to an agreement with the Egeftians; as likewise to see what disbursements the Egeftians could make; and so return again into Greece, and not to waste Athens in a needless war. Alcibiades, on the other side, would sollicit the Cities of Sicily to confederacy against the Syracufans and Selimumnians, whereby to force them unto restitution of all that they had taken from the Leontines. Lamachus he persuades them to assail Syracuse it self, before it were prepared against them. But in the end (being excluded out of divers Cities) they surprize Catana: and there they take new counsel how to proceed. Thence they employed Nicias to those of Egefta, who received from them thirty talents towards his charges; and one hundred and twenty talents more there were of the spoils they had gotten in the Island. Thus the Summer being spent in idle consultations, and vain attempts, the Athenians prepare to assail Syracuse. But Alcibiades having been accused at home, in his absence, was sent for back by the Athenians to make his answer: and the Army was left to the conduct of Nicias and Lamachus. These Commanders obtain a landing place very near unto Syracuse, by this device.

They employ to Syracuse an inhabitant of Catana, whom they trust; and instruct him, to promise unto the Syracufans, that he would deliver into their hands all the Athenians within Catana. Hereupon the Syracufans draw thither ward with their best forces. But in the mean while, the Athenians, setting sail from Catana, arrive at Syracuse, where they land at fair ease, and fortifie themselves against the Town. Shortly after this, they fight, and the Syracufans had the loss: but the Athenians, wanting horse, could not pursue their victory to any great effect. They then retire themselves, with a resolution to refresh their Army at Catana, for the winter-season. From thence they made an attempt upon Messana, hoping to have taken it by an intelligence, but in vain. For Alcibiades had discovered such as were Traitors within the City to the Messenians. This he now did, in despite of his own Citizens, the Athenians; because they had recalled him from his command, with a purpose either to have put him to death, or to have banished him: whereof being assured by his friends, he took his way towards the Lacedemonians, and to them he gave mischievous counsel against his Country. While this winter yet lasted, the Syracufans send Embassadors to Lacedamon, and Corinth, for aid: as likewise the Athenian Captains in Sicily, send to Athens for supplies. Which both the one and the other obtained.

In the Spring following (which was the beginning of the eighteenth year of the Peloponnesian war) the Athenians in Sicily sail from the Port of Catana to Megara, forsaking the Inhabitants; from whence, foraging the Country, they obtain some small victories over the stragling Syracufans: and at their return to Catana, they receive a supply of two hundred men at arms, but without horse, which they hoped to furnish in the Island from the Segeftians; and other their adherents: they were also strengthened with a company of Archers, and with three hundred talents in money.

Hereupon they take courage, and encamp near Syracuse, upon the banks of the great Port, repelling the Syracufans, that failed to impeach their intrenchments. They also received from their Confederates four hundred horse-men, with two hundred other horse, to mount their men at arms. Syracuse was now in effect blockt up, so as hardly any succours could enter, but such as were able to force their passage: yet the Athenians receive divers losses; among which it was not the least, that Lamachus, one of their best Commanders, was slain.

In the mean while, Cyllippus and Pythos, with the Lacedemonian and Corinthian forces, arrive, and take land at Hymera. The Citizens of Hymera, and of Gela, together with the Selimumnians, joyn with them; so that with these and his own troops, Cyllippus adventured to march over-land toward Syracuse. The Syracufans send a part of their forces to meet him and conduct him. The Athenians prepare to encounter them, expecting his arrival arrival near unto the City upon a place of advantage. At the first encounter they had the better of their enemies, by reason that the Syracusan horse-men could not come to fight in those straights: but soon after, Cyllippus charging them again, brake them, and constrained Nicias to fortifie himself within his Camp. Whereupon Nicias made the state of his affairs known, by his letters to the Athenians; shewing, that without great supplies by Sea and Land, the enterprise would be lost, together with the small Army remaining. These letters received, the Athenians appoint two other Generals, Eurymedon and Demosthenes, to joyn with Nicias: the one they dispatch presently with some supplies, the other they send after him in the Spring following.

In the mean while, Cyllippus at Syracuse, fights with the Athenians both by Sea and Land, sometimes with ill, and at other times with good success: but in conclusion, he took from their Fort, near unto Syracuse, the Promontory called Phymyrium; wherein the Athenians lost their treasure, and a great part of all their provisions. Notwithstanding which loss, and that the Athenians themselves, in Greece, were (in effect) besieged within Athens, by the Lacedemonians; yet were they most obstinate in prosecuting the War in Sicily, and dispatched away Demosthenes, with new succours. Demosthenes, in his way towards Sicily, encountered with Polysperter the Corinthian, with his fleet: both the Captains being bound for Sicily, the one to succour Nicias, the other Cyllippus. The loss between them was in effect equal; and neither so broken, but that each of them prosecuted the enterprise they had in hand. But before the succours arrived to either, Cyllippus and Arifon had assailed the Athenians in the great Port of Syracuse, and in a Sea fight put them to the worst, to the great discouragement of the Athenians. On the neck of this, Demosthenes arrived with three score and thirteen Gallies, charged with footmen; and (blaming the sloath of Nicias) he invaded the Syracufans the same day that he arrived. But he made more haste than he had good speed, being shamefully beaten, and repulsed with great loss. Hereupon Demosthenes and Eurymedon determine to rise up from before Syracuse, and return to the succour of Athens: but Nicias disputed to the contrary, pretending that he had good intelligence within Syracuse, whereby he learned, that the Town could not long hold out.

Whatsoever Nicias his intelligence was; upon the arrival of a new supply into the Town, the Athenians had all consented to depart, and to lodge at Calana: had not an Eclipse of the Moon, boding (as was thought) ill success caused them to defer their departure. But this superstition cost them dear. For the Syracufans, Lacedemonians, and Corinthians, with three score and seventeen sail of Gallies, entred the great Port of Syracuse, wherein the Athenians kept their fleet, and whereon they had fortified themselves. The Athenians in the same Port encountered them with four score and six Gallies, commanded by Eurymedon: in which the Athenian fleet was beaten, by the lesser number, and Eurymedon slain. Now, though it were so, that the Syracufans received the more loss by land (for the fight was general) yet when the Athenians were beaten by sea, in which kind they thought themselves invincible, they were wonderfully cast down. For it was well said of Cyllippus, to the Syracufans; When any people do find themselves vanquished in that manner of fight, and with those weapons, in which they persew themselves that they exceed all others, they not only lose their reputation, but their courage. The Athenians, besides the Gallies sunk and wrackt, had seventeen taken, and posselt by the enemy: and with great labour and loss they defended the rest from being fired, having drawn them within a Palfado, in one corner of the port, unadvisedly: for it is as contrary to a Sea-war, to thrust ships into a straight room and corner, as it is to scatter foot in a plain field against horse; the one subsisting by being at large, the other by close imbatailing.

The Syracufans, having now weakened the Athenian fleet, resolve to imprison them within the Port. And to that purpose they range all their Gallies in the mouth of the Haven, being about a mile over, and there they came to Anchor; filling the out-let with all manner of Vessels; which they man most strongly, because the Athenians, being now made desperate, should not with double ranks of Gallies break through the Syracusan fleet; which lay but single, because they were forced to range themselves over all the Out-let of the Port. They therefore not only mored themselves strongly by their Anchors, but chained the sides of their Gallies together, and lay behind them again certain ships, which served in the former war for victuallers: to the end, that if any of their Gallies were sunk; or the chain, which joyned them to their fellows, broken; the Athenians might yet find themselves a second time, intangled and arrested. To disorder also those Athenian Gallies, which came on in form of a wedge, to break through, and force a passage, the Syracufians had left within these Gallies and Ships, inclosed together, a certain number of loose ones, to stop their course and fury. For where the way of any vessel, using oar or sails, is broken, and their speed forlorned, they cannot force with any weight and violence, the resistance opposing.

On the other side, the Athenians knew that they were utterly lost, except with an invincible resolution they could make their way, and break down this great bridge of boats; or (at least) force a passage through them in some part or other: which they resolve to hazard, with all their shipping (to the number of one hundred and ten of all sorts) and with all the strength of their Land-army, in them imbarqued. But the Gallies, which were within the bridge of boats, did so disorder the Athenian fleet, ere they came to force the bridge, as albeit some few of them had broken through the chains, yet being stoppt with the ships without, and assailed by other loose Gallies of the Syracufians, which were purposely left at large in the sea, they were either taken or sunk. Three great disadvantages the Athenians had: the first, that fighting within a Haven, and (as it were) in a straight, they had no room to turn themselves, nor to free themselves one from another, being intangled; the second, that having overperplexed their Gallies with Souldiers, who used offensive arms of darts and slings, they had not place upon the decks to stretch their arms; the third was, the discomfortable end for which they fought, namely, to force a passage, by which they might save themselves by running away. To be short, the fight was no less terrible than the confusion: the slaughter great on all sides; and the noise, and the cries, so lowd and lamentable, as that no direction could be heard. But in the end, the Athenians, as many as survived, were beaten back to the Land, with loss of three-score of their Gallies, broken, sunk, or abandoned. The Syracufians did also lose twenty of theirs, with Phylon, Commander of the Corinthians. The rest of the Athenian Gallies, running themselves into the bottom of the Port, saved themselves by the help and countenance of the Land-army there fortified. In this desperate estate, the Athenian Commanders go to counsel. Demofthenes persuades them to furnish with fresh Souldiers those few Gallies which remained; and while the Syracufians were triumphing, and made secure by their present victory, to set upon them, and forcing their way out of the Port, to return to Athens. This was no ill counsel. For, as we have heard of many great Captains (yea, the greatest number of all that have been victorious) that have neglected the speedy prosecution of a beaten enemy; so might we produce many examples of those, who having slept securely in the bosome of good success, have been suddenly awaked, by the re-allied Companies of a broken Army, and have thereby lost again all the honour and advantage formerly gotten. But Nicias opposeth the advice of Demofthenes: Others say, that the Seamen were against it. Whereupon abandoning their Gallies, they all resolve to march over land to the Cities of their Confederates, till some more favourable fortune should call them thence. On the other side, Gylippus, and other the Lacedemonian and Corinthian Captains, with Hermocrates, exhort the Syracufians to put themselves presently into the field, and to stop all the passages, leading to those Cities of their enemies, to which the Athenians might make retreat. But many were weary, and many were wounded, and many of them thought that they had done enough for the present. Which humour in some of our Commanders at Cadex, lost us both the Indian fleet, and the spoils of many other neighbour places. Hermocrates, the Syracusan, finding it a lost labour, to persuade his Countrymen to any hasty prosecution, devised this good stratagem, whereby to gain time; not doubting, but that after a day or two, he should draw them willingly out. He sent two or three horse-men out of Syracuse by night, willing them to find Nicias, and (after they had assured him, that they were of the Athenian faction) to give him advice not to march away over-hastily from the place, wherein he was fortified; alleging that the Syracufians had lodged their Army, which could not long stay there, upon the passages and places of advantage, leading towards the Cities of their Allies. These tidings Nicias easily believed, and put off his journey to the third day. For men newly beaten, are (for the most part) more fearful than wife; and to them, every thistle in the field appears, by night, a man at arms.

The third day (leaving all their Gallies, and all their baggage) they remove; being pierced and pursued with the lamentable out-cries of those that were sick and hurt: whom they abandon to the cure of their enemies swords. The rest march away, to the number of forty thousand; and make their first passage by force, over the River of Anapus, notwithstanding the opposition of their enemies, mies. But being every day charged in their marches, and by the Syracusan horse-men, beaten in from forraging and provision of food, they grow weak and heartless. The Syracufians also possess the Mountain Lepus, by which they were to pass towards Camarina, and thereby force them to fall back again towards the Sea-coast, and to take what way they could: being unable to proceed in their journey intended. Many hard shifts they made, in difficult passages, and blind marches by night; which they were fain to endure, as having none other means to escape from the enemy that pursued them, and held them waking with continual skirmishing. To keep all in order, Nicias undertook the leading of the Vanguard, and Demofthenes conducted the Rear. At the River Erineus, Nicias takes the start of a whole nights march; leaving Demofthenes to make the retreat: who being incompassed, and overrest with numbers, in the end renders himself. The conditions he obtained, were far better than he could have hoped for; and the faith of his enemies far worse than he suspected. For he was afterward, with Nicias murdered in prison. The Army of Demofthenes being dissolved, they pursued Nicias with the greater courage: who being utterly broken upon the passage of the River Assinarus, rendered himself to Gylippus, upon honest conditions. Gylippus fought to preserve him, and to have had the honour to have brought these two to Sparta; Nicias, as a noble Enemy to the Lacedemonians, and who, at the overthrow which they received at Pylus by the Athenians, had saved the lives of the vanquished; Demofthenes, as one that had done to Lacedemon the greatest hurt. Hermocrates also, the Commander of the Syracusan Army disswaded the rest, by all the art he had, from using any barbarous violence, after so noble a victory. But the cruel and cowardly fort, (cowardise and cruelty being inseparable passions) prevailed, and caused these brave Captains to be miserably murdered: one part of their Souldiers to be starved in loathsome prisons; and the rest, sold for slaves. This was the success of the Sicilian war: which took end at the River Assinarus, the four and twentieth day of May, in the fourscore and eleventh Olympiad.

The Athenians being beaten out of Sicily: the Egeftians (for whose defence against the Selinuntines, this late war had been taken in hand) fearing the victorious Syracufians, sought help from the Carthaginians; and their City offered themselves, and their City, as their vassals. The Carthaginians, though ambitious enough of enlarging their Dominion in Sicily, yet considering the prosperity of the Syracufians, and their late victories over the Athenians, they stayed a while to dispute of the matter, whether they should refuse or accept the offer made unto them: for the Selinuntines were straightly allied to the Syracufians, as may appear by what is past. In the end the Senators of Carthage resolve upon the enterprise; and (by a trick of their Punic wit) to separate the Syracufians from the Selinuntines, they send Embassadors to Syracuse: praying that City, as in the behalf of the Egeftians, to compel the Selinuntines to take reason, and to rest content with so much of the lands in question, as they of Syracuse should think meet to allow them. The Syracufians approved the motion; for it tended to their own honor. But the Selinuntines would make no such appointment: rather they took it ill, that the Syracufians, with whom they had run one course of fortune, in the Athenian war, should offer to trouble them, by interposing as Arbitrators, in abuses that themselves could end by force. This was right as the Carthaginians would have it. For now could they of Selinus with an ill grace crave aid of Syracuse; and the Syracufians as ill grant it unto those, that had refused to stand to the Arbitrament, which the Carthaginians would have put into their hands. Hereupon, an Army of three hundred thousand men is set out from Carthage, under the conduct of Hannibal, Nephew to that Amilcar, who (as you have heard before) was overthrown with the great Carthaginian Army at Himera by Gelon. Hannibal was exceeding greedy of this employment, that he might take revenge as well of his Uncles, as of his Fathers death; the one of them having been slain by the Himerians, the other by those of Selinus. Both the Cities, Hannibal, in this war, won by force of arms, sacked them, and burnt them; and having taken three thousand of the Himerians prisoners, he caused them to be led unto the place, where Amilcar was slain, and buried them there.

After this followed some trouble at Syracuse, occasioned by the banishment of Hermocrates, who had lately been General of the Syracusan forces, against the Athenians. The malice of his enemies had so far prevailed with the ingrateful multitude, that he was condemned to exile for his meek vertue, at such a time as he was aiding the Lacedemonians, in their war against Athens: wherein he did great service. All the honest fort within Syracuse were sorry for the injury injury done unto him, and sought to have him repealed. Hermocrates himself, returning into Sicily, gathered an Army of six thousand; with which he began to repair Selinus; and by many noble actions laboured to win the love of his Citizens. But the faction that opposed him was the stronger. Wherefore he was advised to march upon a Gate of Syracuse, with some strength of men; whereby his friends within the Town, might have the better means to rise against the adverse party. This he did: but presently the multitude fell to arms, and set upon him; in which conflict he was slain. But his Son-in-law, Dionysius, shall make them with Hermocrates alive again.

Of Dionysius the Tyrant: and others, following him.

THe Syracusans had enjoyed their liberty about threescore years, from the death of Thrasybulus, to the death of Hermocrates: at which time Dionysius was raised up by God, to take revenge, as well of their cruelty toward strangers, as of their ingratitude towards their own best Citizens. For before the time of Dionysius, they had made it their pastime, to reward the virtue of their worthiest Commanders with death, or disgrace: which custom they must now be taught to amend.

Dionysius obtained the principality of Syracuse, by the same degrees, that many others, before him, had made themselves masters of other Cities, and of Syracuse it self. For, being made Pretor, and commanding their Armies against the Carthaginians, and other their enemies, he behaved himself so well, that he got a general love among the people, and men of war. Then began he to follow the example of Pisistratus, that made himself Lord of Athens; obtaining a band of six hundred men, to defend his person: under pretence, that his private enemies, being traitorously affected to the State of Syracuse, had laid plots how to murder him, because of his good services. He doubled the pay of his Souldiers; alledging, that it would encourage them to fight manfully: but intending thereby to assure them to himself. He persuaded the Citizens, to call home, out of exile, those that had been banished, which were the best men of Syracuse; and these were afterwards at his devotion, as obliged unto him by so great a benefit. His first favour, among the Syracusans, grew from his accusation of the principal men. It is the delight of base people to reign over their betters; wherefore, gladly did he help them to break down, as fetters imprisoning their liberty; the bars that held it under safe custody. Long it was not, ere the chief Citizens had found whereat he aimed. But what they saw, the people would not see: and some that were needy, and knew no how to get Offices without his help, were willing to help him, though they knew his purposes to be such, as would make all the City to smart. He began early to hunt after the tyranny; being but five and twenty years of age when he obtained it: belike it was his desire to reign long. His first work, of making himself absolute Lord in Syracuse, was, the possession of the Citadel, wherein was much good provision, and under it the Gallies were moored. This he obtained by allowance of the people, and having obtained this, he cared for no more, but declared himself without all shame or fear. The Army the chief Citizens restored by him from banishment; all the needy fort within Syracuse, that could not thrive by honest courses; and some neighbour-towns, bound unto him, either for his help in war, or for establishing the faction, reigning at that present; were wholly affected to his assistance. Having therefore gotten the Citadel into his hands, he needed no more, save to assure what he had already. He strengthened himself by divers marriages; taking first to wife the daughter of Hermocrates; and after her, two at once; the one a Locrian, Doris, by whom he had Dionysius, his Successor; the other, Arifomache, the daughter of Hipparchus, and sister to Dion, honourable men in Syracuse; which bare unto him many children, that served to fortify him with new alliances.

Yet it was not long, ere some of the Syracusans (envying his prosperity) incited the multitude, and took arms against him, even in the novelty of his Rule. But their enterprise was more passionately, than wisely governed. He had shamefully been beaten by the Carthaginians at Gela: which, as it vexed the Sicilian men at arms, making them suspect that it was his purpose to let the Carthaginians waste all that he might afterwards take possession of the desolate places; so it inflamed them with a desire to free themselves from his tyranny. They departed therefore from him, and marched hastily to Syracuse, where they found friends to help them: there they forced his Palace, ransacked his treasures, and so shamefully abused his wife, that for the grief thereof the poisoned her self. But he followed their heels apace; and firing a Gate of the City by night, entered soon enough to take revenge, by making a speedy riddance of them. For he spared none of his known, nor nor of his suspected enemies. After that, he grew so doubtful of his life, as he never durst trust Barber to trim him, nor any person, no not so much as his brother, to enter into his chamber, unstript and searched. He was the greatest Robber of the people that ever reigned in any State, and withall the most unrespectively cruel.

After this, he separated with fortification that part of the City, called the Island, from the rest; like as the Spaniard did the Citadel of Antwerp: therein he lodged his Treasures, and his Guards.

He then began to make war upon the free Cities of Sicily: but while he lay before Herbessa, an in-land Town, the Syracusans rebelled against him; so, as with great difficulty he recovered his Citadel: from whence, having allured the old Souldiers of the Companions, who forced their passage through the City, with one thousand and two hundred horse, he again recovered the mastery over the Syracusans. And when a multitude of them were busied in gathering in their harvest, he disarmed all the Townsmen remaining, and new strengthened the Fort of the Island, with a double wall. He inclosed that part also, called Epipolæ; which, with threescore thousand labourers, he finished within three weeks, being twelve leagues in compass. He then built two hundred new Gallies; and repaired one hundred and ten of the old; forged one hundred and forty thousand Targets, with as many swords, and head-pieces, with fourteen thousand corselets, and all other suitable arms. Which done, he sent word to the Carthaginians (greatly infected by the plague) That except they would abandon the Greek Towns, which they held in Sicily, he would make war upon them: and, not staying for answer, he took the spoil of all the Phœnician ships, and merchandize, within his Ports; as King Philip the second did of our English, before the war in our late Queens time. He then goes to the field with fourscore thousand foot, and three thousand horse, and sends his brother Leptines to sea, with two hundred Gallies, and five hundred ships of burden. Most of the Towns which held for Carthage yielded unto him; saving Panormus, Segesta, or Egesta, Ancyræ, Motya, and Eniella. Of these, he first won Motya by assault, and put all therein to the sword; but before Egesta he lost a great part of his Army, by a sally of the Citizens. In the mean while Himilco arrives; but, ere he took land, he lost in a fight at Sea, with Leptines, fifty ships of war, and five thousand Souldiers, besides many ships of burden. This notwithstanding, he recovered again Motya upon his first descent. From thence marching towards Messana, he took Lypara, and (soon after) Messana, and razed it to the ground. Now began Dionysius greatly to doubt his estate. He therefore fortified all the places he could, in the Territory of the Leontines, by which he supposed that Himilco would pass toward Syracuse; and he himself took the field again, with four and thirty thousand foot; and one thousand horse. Now, hearing that Himilco had divided his Army into two parts, marching with the one half over-land, and sending Mago with the other by Sea: he sent Leptines, his brother to encounter Mago. But Leptines was utterly beaten by the Carthaginians; twenty thousand of his men were slain, and an hundred of his Gallies lost. It is very strange, and hardly credible, which yet good Authors tell us; That one City should be able to furnish five hundred sail of ships, and two hundred Gallies: (for, so many did Syracuse arm in this war) and more strange it is, that in a battail at Sea, without any great Artillery, or Muskets, twenty thousand should be slain in one fight. In all our fights against the Turks, of which that at Lepanto was the most notable, we hear of no such number lost; nor in any other fight by Sea, that ever happened in our age, nor before us. When Charles the fifth went to besiege Algier, he had in all his fleet, transporters and others, but two hundred and fifty sail of ships, and threescore and five Gallies: for the furnishing of which fleet, he sought help from all the Cities and ports of Spain, Naples, and the rest of Italy. But in old times it was the manner to carry into the field, upon extremity, as many as were needfull, of all that could bear arms, giving them little wages, or other allowance: in our dayes it is not so; neither indeed, is it often requisite. Upon this overthrow, Dionysius posts away to Syracuse, to strengthen it: Himilco follows him, and besiegeth the Town by Land and Sea. But the Tyrant, having received aid from the Lacedæmonians, under the conduct of Pharacidas, puts himself to Sea, to make provision for his Citizens, who, in his absence, take twenty of the Carthaginian Gallies, and sink four. Hereupon, finding their own success pro-

perous, and that of the Tyrant exceeding ill, having also at the present weapons in their hands, they consult how to recover their liberty. And this they had done, had not Pharides the Lacedaemonian resisted them. It also fell out to his exceeding advantage, that the plague was so increased, and so violent among the Carthaginians, as it is said, that above an hundred thousand of them died thereof. He therefore, with the power that he could gather together, sets upon them both by Sea and Land; and having slain great numbers of them, forceth Himilco to desire peace. This peace Dionysius sold him for so great sum of money; on condition, that he should steal away with his Carthaginians only: which he basely accepted, betraying the rest of the Africans and Spaniards. Yet no faith was kept with him: for he was pursued, and left many of his Carthaginians behind him. The rest of the Africans fell under the swords of their enemies; only the Spaniards, after they had a while bravely defended themselves, were (after their submission) entertained, and served the Conquerour.

May such examples of perfidious dealing I have noted in other places, and can hardly forbear to deliver unto memory the like practices, when they meet with their matches: That which hapned unto Monsieur de Piles, was very futable to this treachery, wherewith Dionysius pursued Himilco. I was present when De Piles related the injury done unto him. He had rendered S. John d' Angelle to the French King Charles IX. who besieged him therein. He rendered it, upon promise made by the faith of a King, that he should be suffered to depart in safety, with all his followers. Yet in presence of the King himself, of the Duke of Anjou his Brother, General of his Army, of the Queen Mother, and of divers Dukes and Marshalls of France, he was set upon and broken in his March; spoiled of all that he had, and forced to save his life by flight; leaving the most of his Souldiers dead upon the place; the Kings hand and faith warranting him to march away with ensigns displaid and withall his goods and provisions, no whit availing him. It needs not therefore seem strange, that an Heathen Tyrant should thus break his faith, since Kings, professing Christianity, are bold to do the like, or command their Captains to do it for them.

Dionysius after this great victory, took care to re-edifie Messena. Mago who layed in Sicil, to hold up the Carthaginians therein, is again beaten by Dionysius; who is also beaten by the Tauromenians. A new supply of fourscore thousand Souldiers is sent from Carthage to Mago, with these take eggs for their money, and make peace with Dionysius, leaving the Sicilians in Tauromenium, to shift for themselves: whom Dionysius, after a long siege, overcame, and gave their City to the mercenary Souldiers.

He then past into Italy, obtained divers victories there, brought the Rhegiens on their knees, forced them to pay him one hundred and fourscore thousand crowns, to furnish him with threecore Gallies, and put in an hundred pledges, for assurance of their future observance of covenants. This he did, not with any purpose to perform unto them the peace that they had so dearly bought; but that having taken from them their Gallies, he might besiege them, and ruine them utterly, with the more ease. Now to the end he might not, without some colour, falsifie the faith that he had given to them; he pretended to want victual for his Army; at such time as he seemed ready to depart out of Italy, and sent to them to furnish him therewith, promising to return them the like quantity at his coming home to Syracuse.

His resolution was, that if they refused to furnish him, he would then make their refusal the cause of his quarrel: if they yielded to aid him with the proportion which he desired, that then they should not be able, for want of food, to endure a siege any long time against him. For, to ruine them he had fully determined, at what price soever. And great reason he had to take revenge of them, if he had done it fairly, and without breach of faith. For when in the beginning of his reign, he desired them to bestow a daughter of some of their Nobility upon him for a wife; they answered, that they had not any one fit for him, save the Hangmans daughter. Princes do rather pardon ill deeds, than villanous words. Alexander the great forgave many sharp words, but never any sharp tongues; no, though they told him but truly of his errors. And certainly, it belongs to those that have warrant from God, to reprehend Princes; and to none else, especially in publick.

It is said, that Henry the fourth of France, had his heart more inflamed against the Duke of Biron, for his over-bold and biting taunts, than he used against him before Amiens, than for his conspiracy with the Spaniard or Savoyan: for he had pardoned 10000. of such as had gone farther, & drawn their swords against him. The contemptuous tuous words that Sir John Parret used of our late Queen Elizabeth, were his ruine; and not the counterfeit letter of the Komifio Priest produced against him. So fared it with some other, greater than he, that thereby ran the same, and a worse fortune, soon after.

To be short, he made them know new bread from old. He assaulted their Town on all sides, which he continued to do eleven moneths, till he won it by force. He used his victory without mercy, specially against Phyton, who had commanded within it.

Some other wars he made with the Carthaginians, after the taking and razing of this City; and those with variable success. For, as in one encounter he slue Mago, with ten thousand Africans: so the son of Mago beat him, and slew his brother Leptines, with fourteen thousand of his Souldiers. After which he bought his peace of the Carthaginians, as they had formerly done of him; following therein the advice of Prosperity and Adversity, as all Kings and States do.

When he had reigned eight and thirty years, he died: some say in his bed, peaceably, which is the most likely, though others report it otherwise. A cruel man he was, and a faithles; a great Poet, but a foolish one. He entertained Plato a while, but afterward, for speaking against his tyranny, he gave order to have him slain, or sold for a slave. For he could endure no man that flattered him not beyond measure. His Parasites therefore stiled his cruelty, The hate of evil men; and his lawles slaughters, The ornaments and effects of his justice. True it is, that flatterers are a kind of vermine, which poison all the Princes of the World; and yet they prosper better than the worthiest and valiantest men do: and I wonder not at it, for it is a world: as our Saviour Christ hath told us, The World will love her own.

To this Dionysius his son of the same name succeeded, and inherited both his Kingdom and his Vices. To win the love of the People, he pardoned, and released out of prison, a great number of persons, by his Father lockt up and condemned. Withall, he remitted unto his Citizens divers payments, by his Father imposed upon them. Which done, and thereby hoping that he had fastned unto himself the peoples affections; he cast off the sheeps skin, and put on that of the wolf. For being jealous of his own Brethren, as men of more vertue than himself, he caused them all to be slain; and all the kindred that they had by their Mothers side. For Dionysius his Father (as hath been said) had two Wives; Doris of Locris, and Arifomachea a Syracusan, the sister of Dion, which Brother-in-law of his he greatly enriched.

By Doris he had this Dionysius, who succeeded unto him: and by Arifomachea he had two sons and two Daughters of which the elder, called Sophrolyne, he gave in marriage to his eldest son, and her half-brother Dionysius; the younger, called Arcta, he bestowed on his Brother Theorides; after whose death Dion took her to wife, being his Niecee.

This Dion a just and valiant man, finding that Dionysius had abandoned all exercise of vertue, and that he was wholly given over to sensuality, prevailed so much with Plato, whose Disciple he had been, as he drew him into Sicil, to instruct the young King. And having perswaded the King to entertain him, he wrought so well with him, as Dionysius began to change condition; to change Tyranny into Monarchy: and to hold the Principality that he had, rather by the love of his people, and his National Laws, than by the violence of his Guards and Garisons. But this goodness of his lasted not long. For Philistus the Historian, and other his Parasites, that hated Dions severity, wrought him out of the Tyrants favour, and caused him soon after to be banished out of Sicil, to the great grief of the whole Nation. For whereas Dion had made offer to the Kings either to compound the quarrels between him and the Carthaginians, of whom Dionysius stood in great fear; or (at least) if they refused it, to furnish him with fifty Gallies at his own charge, during the war against them: his enemies found means, by sinister interpretation, to convert his good will into matter of Treason. They told Dionysius, that all the great commendations, given of Plato, had tended to none other end, than to soften his mind, and to make him neglect his own affairs, by the study of Philosophy; whilst Dion in the mean time having furnished fifty Gallies under colour of the Kings service, had it in his own power either to deliver to the Syracusians their former liberty, or to make himself Lord and Sovereign of their State.

It is likely, that the honest and liberal offer which he made, to serve the King with so great a preparation, at his own charge, begot him many enemies. For they that had served the King for none other end than to raise and enrich themselves, and had already been raised & enriched, thought themselves bound to make the same offer that Dion had made, if the King had had the grace to conceive it aright. But the covetous and ignorant cowards, that had neither the knowledge, nor the daring that Dion had, were bold to stile his Love and Liberality, Pride and Presumption; and heartned the young King in his oppressing, and eating up his own people, of whose spoils they themselves shared no small portion. I have heard it, That when Charls the fifth had the repulse at Algier, in Africa, Ferdinando Cortese, one of the bravest men that ever Spain brought forth, offered unto the Emperour, to continue the siege at his own charge. But he had never good day after it. For they that envied his victories, and his conquest of Mexico in the West-Indies, perswaded the Emperour, that Cortese sought to value himself above him; and to have it said, that what the Emperour could not, Cortese had effected, and was therefore more worthy of the Empire, than he that had it.

When Dion was newly banished, the Tyrant was contented at first to send him the revenues of his Lands, and permit him to dispose of his moveables at his own pleasure: not without giving hope to recall him in short time. Had he continued in this good mood, like enough it is, that Dion would have been well pleased to live well, as he did, at Athens. But after some time, Dionysius made Port-fale of this Noble-mans goods, and thereby urged him to take another course, even to seek the restitution of his Country to liberty. The virtues of Dion, especially his great Liberality, had purchased much Love in Greece. This Love made him suspected and hated of the Tyrant: but it stood him in good stead, when he sought to raise men, with whose help he might return into Sicily. Yet he got not above eight hundred (for he carried the matter closely) to follow him in his adventure. But many of them were men of quality, and fit to be Leaders. Neither did he doubt of finding in Syracuse, as many as should be needfull, that would readily assist him. Therefore he landed boldly in Sicily, marched to Syracuse, entred the City without resistance, armed the multitude, and won all, save the Citadel.

Dionysius was then absent in Italy but he quickly had advertisement of his dangerous accident. Wherefore he returned hastily to Syracuse: whence, after many vain treaties of Peace, and some forcible attempts to recover the Town, he was fain to depart; leaving yet a Castle to the Custody of Apollocrates his eldest Son. Yet ere he went, his Minion Philius, coming with a strength of men to assist him, was beaten, taken, and put to death by torment. But Dion, for the recovery of his Countries liberty, had the same reward that all worthy men have had from popular Estates. He was disgraced, assaulted, and forced to abandon the City. He retired himself to the Leontines, who received him with great joy. Soon after his departure from Syracuse, new troops enter the Castle: they fall out, assail, spoil, and burn a great part of the City. Dion is sent for, with humble request: yet ere he could arrive, Dionysius his Souldiers were retired; and the Towns-men thinking themselves secure, shut the gates against Dion. But the next night they of the Castle fall out again, with greater fury than ever: they kill Man, Woman, and Child, and set fire in all parts of the Town. In this their extremity Dion comes the second time to their succour; the love of his Country surmounting all the injuries that he had received. He sets upon the Garrison of the Castle, with the one part of his Army; and quencheth the fire every where kindled, with the other part. In conclusion, after he had conquered both the fire and the sword, that had well near burnt to ashes, and depopulated Syracuse, he recovered the Castle, with the munition and furniture thereof, and sent Apollocrates after Dionysius his Father into Italy. But their malice, of whom he had best deserved, and whom he had loved most, gave an untimely end to his dayes. For he was soon after his victory, murdered by Gylippus; who after he had with ill success, awhile governed Syracuse, was slain with the same Dagger, with which he had murdered Dion.

Ten years after the death of Dion, Dionysius, with the assistance of his friends in Italy, recovers his estate; and returns to Syracuse, driving Nysens thence, whom he found Governour therein. The better sort of the Citizens, fearing more than ever, his cruelty, flee to Icetes, a Syracusan born, and then ruling the Leontines. Icetes enters into confederacy with the Carthaginians, hoping by their assistance, not only to prevail against Dionysius; but by the hatred of the Syracusians towards Dionysius, to make him also Lord of their Ciay. The Syracusians, being deservedly afflicted on all sides, send to the Corinthians for succour. Icetes also sends thither, and dissuades the Corinthians, as well as he can, from intermeddling in the business. He tells them, by his Messengers, That he had entred into league with the Carthaginians, who were so strong by Sea, that it was not in the power of Corinth, to land an Army in Sicily. But the Corinthians, being by this treason of Icetes, more enraged than than dissuaded, sent Timoleon with nineteen Gallies, to deliver Syracuse from tyranny. In the mean while, Icetes had entred Syracuse, and with the help of the Carthaginians, driven Dionysius into the Castle, where he besieged him.

Icetes, being himself a Tyrant in Leontines, rather sought how to enlarge his power, than how to deliver his Country. Therefore, hearing that Timoleon was arrived at Rhegium, he sent to perfwade him, to return his Fleet; for that all things were (in effect) established in Sicily. The Carthaginian Gallies were also in the same Port of Rhegium, whose Captains advised Timoleon to get him gone in peace. They had far more Gallies there than he had, and were like to compel him, if he would not be perfwaded. Timoleon, finding himself over-mastered, makes request to the Carthaginian Captains, that they would be pleased to enter into Rhegium, and there, in an open assembly of the people, to deliver unto him those arguments for his return, which they had used to him in private; that he might, by publick testimony, discharge himself to the Senate of Corinth.

The Carthaginians, perswading themselves, that a victory obtained by a few fair words, was without loss, and far more easie, than that of many blows, and wounds, yielded to Timoleons desire. But while the Orations were delivering, Timoleon, favoured by the Rhegians, stole out of the prease; and having set sail, before the Gates were opened to the Carthaginians, he recovered the Port of Tanormenum, where he was joyfully received by Andromachus the Governour. From thence he marched toward Adranum, where surprizing Icetes his Army, he slew a part thereof, and put the rest to run. It is the nature of victory to beget friends. The Adranians joynd with him, and so did Manerens, the Tyrant of Catana. Dionysius also sent to Timoleon, offering to surrender the Castle of Syracuse into his hands, as thinking it better to yield up himself, and the places which he could not defend, unto the Corinthians, than either to Icetes, whom he disdained, or to the Carthaginians, whom he hated. Now Timoleon, who, within fifty dayes after his arrival, had recovered the Castle of Syracuse, and sent Dionysius to Corinth, to live there a private man, was still invaded by the Armies, and molested by the practices of Icetes. For he besieged the Corinthians within the Castle of Syracuse, and attempted (but in vain) the murder of Timoleon.

The Corinthians send unto Timoleon a supply of two thousand foot, and two hundred horse, which are stayed in Italy by foul weather. Icetes is strengthened with threecore thousand African, brought unto him by Mago (all which he lodgeth within Syracuse) and with an hundred and fifty Gallies, to keep the Port. This was the first time that ever the Carthaginians had dominion within the walls of that City. With this great Army Icetes assaileth the Castle Timoleon sends them victuals, and succour, in small boats, by night, from Catana. Mago and Icetes do therefore resolve to besiege Catana; but they were no sooner on their way towards it, with part of their forces, than Leon, Captain of the Corinthians, sallied out of the Castle, and took that part of Syracuse, called Acradina, which he fortified.

In the mean while, the two thousand Corinthians arrive: with whom, and two thousand other Souldiers, Timoleon marched toward Syracuse. Mago abandoneth Icetes being frightened out of Sicily (which he might easily have conquered) with an idle rumour of treason. This made him return to Carthage; where the general exclamation against his cowardize, did so much affright him, that for fear of further punishment he hanged himself. Timoleon enters the City, and beats down the Castle (which he called The Nest of Tyrants) to the ground. But he found the City, when the strangers were fled, in effect desolate; so as their horses did feed on the grafs growing in the Market-place. Therefore he writes to Corinth for people to re-inhabit it. Ten thousand are sent out of Greece, many come from Italy; others from other parts of the Island.

But a new storm ariseth. Asdrubal and Amilcar, Carthaginians, arrive about Lilibanum, with threecore and ten thousand Souldiers, transported (with all their provisions) in a thousand ships of burden, and two hundred Gallies. Timoleon marcheth thither, and chargeth this great Army upon the passage of a River.

A tempest of rain, hail, and lightning, with boisterous winds, beating upon the faces of the Carthaginians, they are utterly broken, ten thousand slain, five thousand taken, with all their carriages and provisions: among which there were found a thousand Corsets guilt and graven. After this, Timoleon gave an overthrow to Icetes, and following his victory, took him, with his Son Eupolemus, and the General of his horse, prisoners; whom he caused all to be slain: and afterwards (which was imputed to him for great cruelty) he suffered Icetes his wives and daughters to be put to death. But this was the revenge of God upon Iceter, who (after the murder of Dion) had caused Arete, Dion's wife, and a young child of his, with Arismache his Sister, to be cast into the Sea.

He again prevailed against Mamercus Tyrant of Calana, and won Calana itself. Mamercus fled to Hippon Tyrant of Aleffena; but Timoleon, pursued him, won the Town; delivering Hippon to his Citizens, who tormented him to death. The same end had Mamercus, and all the Tyrants in Sicil.

Finally, he made peace with the Carthaginians, on condition that they should not pass the River of Lyens. After this, he lived in great honour among the Syraculans, till his death; and was solemnly buried in them in the Market-place of their City: the day of his Funerals being for ever ordained to be kept holy among them.

After such time as Timoleon had delivered Syracuse from the tyranny of Dionysius, and brought peace to the whole Island; the Inhabitants enjoyed their liberty in peace, about twenty years. The Cities and temples were repaired; the Trade renewed; the Merchant sailed in safety; and the Labouring man enjoyed the fruits of the earth in quiet. But it was impossible that a Nation which neither knew how to govern, nor how to obey; which could neither endure Kings, nor men worthy to be Kings, to govern them; should any long time subsist.

Twenty years after the death of Timoleon, there started up one Agathocles among them, a man of base birth, and of baser condition: who from a Beggar, to a common Souldier; from a Souldier to a Captain; and so from degree to degree, rising to be a Prætor: finally, became Lord and Sovereign of the Syraculans. Many fortunes he ran, and under-went as many dangers, ere he obtained the principality. For he had more than once attempted it, and was therein both beaten and banished. A passing valiant man he was, and did notable service, as well for those by whom he was employed, as also for the Syraculans, and against them. For in their Wars against those of Enna, and the Campanians, he did them memorable service: and on the contrary, as memorable service for the Aurgantines against the Syraculans. For being entertained by the people of Aurgantia, and made General of their forces, he sackt Leontium; and besieged Syracuse so straitly, that the Citizens were driven to crave aid, even from their antient and natural enemies, the Carthaginians. Amilcar was sent by the Carthaginians to relieve Syracuse. With him Agathocles wrought so well, that he got him to make peace between himself and the Syraculans; binding himself by promise and oath to remain a friend and servant to the State of Carthage, for ever after. Amilcar entertained the business, and compounded the quarrels between Agathocles and the Syraculans. Agathocles is chosen Prætor; he entertains five thousand Africans, and divers old Souldiers of the Aurgantines, under colour of a purpose to besiege Herbita. With these, and with the assistance of the poor and discontented Syraculans (the City also being divided into many factions) he assails the Senators, kills all his enemies and opposites; divides the spoil of the rich among the poor; and gives liberty to his Souldiers, to rob, to ravish, and to murder, for two whole daies and nights, without controlment: the third day, when they had blunted their barbarous appetites, and strewed the streets with ten thousand dead carcases, besides those that had broken their necks over the walls; their fury had no further subject to work on.

Agathocles, in an assembly of the people (being an eloquent knave) perswaded them, that, for the violent sickness, by which the Common-wealth was utterly consumed, he found no better than the violent remedies which he had administered: and that he affected no other thing than the reducing of the state from an Oligarchy, or the rule of a few tyrannous Magistrates, to the ancient and indifferent Democracy, by which it had been governed, from the first institution, with so great glory and posterity. This he did, to have the Crown clapt on his head (as it were) perforce. For, as he knew that he had left none living, within the City, fit or able to exercise the office of a Magistrate: so knew he right well, that all they which had assisted in the murder and spoil of their fellow-Citizens, had no other hope of defence, than the support of a lawless Lord, who had been partaker with them in their villanies and cruelties committed. So as this table, his Oration ended, proclaimed him King: again and again saluting and adoring him, by that name, as if he had been given to him by some lawfull election. Hence had our King Richard the third a piece of his pattern; but the one was of base, the other of Kingly Parents; the one took liberty from a Common-wealth, the other sought only to succeed in a Monarchy; the one continued his cruelty to the end, the other, after he had obtained the Crown, sought, by making good Laws to recover the love of his people.

The life of this Tyrant is briefly written by

by Justine; more largely and particularly by Diodorus Siculus: the sum whereof is this. The same Amilcar that had brought him into Syracuse, and that had lent him five thousand men to help in the Malface of the Citizens, was also content to wink at many wrongs that he did unto the confederates of the Carthaginians. It was the purpose of Amilcar, to settle Agathocles in his tyranny, and to let him vex and waste the whole Island; because it was thereby like to come to pass, that he should reduce all Sicil into such terms as would make it become an easie prey to Carthage. But when the Cities, confederate with the Carthaginians, sent their Embassadors, with complaint of this ill dealing, to Carthage; the Punic faith (so much taunted by the Romans, as no better than meer falsehood) shewed it self very honourable in taking order for the redress. Embassadors were sent to comfort the Sicili-ans, and to put Agathocles in mind of his Covenants; Amilcar was recalled home into Africk, and a new Captain appointed to succeed in his charge, with such forces, as might compel Agathocles to reason, if otherwise he would not hearken to it. All this tended to save their Confederates, from suffering such injuries in the future. For that which was past (since it could not be recalled) they took order to have it severely punished. Amilcar was accused secretly, and by way of scrutiny: the suffrages being given, but not calculated; and so reserved until he should return. This was not so closely handled, but that Amilcar had soon notice of it. In managing his business with Agathocles, it is likely that he had an eye to his own profit, as well as to the publick benefit of his Country. For he had made such a composition with the Syraculans, as gave him not only means to weaken others, but to strengthen himself, both in power and authority, even against the Carthaginians. Such is commonly the custom of those, that hope to work their own ends by cunning practices, thinking to deal subtly and finely, they spin their threads so small, that they are broken with the very wind. Amilcar saw, that his Carthaginians had a purpose to deal substantially; and that therefore it would be hard for him, to make them follow his crooked devices: which if he could not do, it was to be expected, that their anger would break out into so much the greater extremity, by how much the more they had concealed it. Therefore he followed the example, which some of his fore-goers had taught him; and, for fear of such a death as the Judges might award him, he ended his own life in what sort he thought best. This desperation of Amilcar served to inform Agathocles of the Carthaginians intent. He saw they would not be deluded with words, and therefore resolved to get the start of them in action. He dissembled no longer; but, instead of spoil and robbery, made open War upon all their Adherents. He had made the better part of Sicil his own, ere the Carthaginian Forces arrived: which thinking to have encountered an ill-established Tyrant, found him ready, as a King, to defend his own, and give them sharp entertainment. They were beaten by him; and their Navy was so Tempest-beaten, that they could neither do good by Land, nor Sea; but were glad to leave their business undone, and return into Africk.

The Carthaginians prepare a new Fleet: which being very gallantly manned and furnished was broken, by foul weather, and the best part of it cast away, even whilst it was yet within kenning of their City. But Amilcar, the Son of Gisco, gathering together the remainders of his shipwreck, was bold to pass over into Sicil, and landed not far from Gela; where Agathocles was soon ready to examine the cause of their coming. Many skirmishes passed between them, in which (commonly) the Syraculans had the better. But his good success begat presumptions; whereby he lost a battel more important than all the other fights. One adverse chance is enough to overthrow the state of a Tyrant; if it be not upheld by great circumference. The War was soon transferred to the walls of Syracuse; within which Agathocles was closed up, and driven to make his last defence by their help, who may be judged to have loved him not very greatly. But the Inhabitants of Syracuse, after that great Malface of the principal men, made in the beginning of this new Tyranny, were (for the most part) such, as had been either mercenary Souldiers, infranchised slaves, or base and needy people; helpers in establishing the present Government, and Executors of the murders, and spoil committed in that change. If there were any other (as some there were) they were so well observed, and (withal) so fearful, that they durst not stir. But it was enough that they all agreed in the common defence of themselves and their City; Famine was likely to grow upon them, and enforce them to change their resolution. In this necessity Agathocles adventured upon a strange course, which the event commended as wise. He imbarqued as many as he thought meet, in those vessels that rode in the Haven; and committing the

the Government, of the City to his Brother Antander, willed the people to be of good courage, for that (as he told them) he had bethought himself of a mean, both to raise the siege, and to repair all other losses. A Carthaginian Fleet lay in the mouth of the Haven, both to hinder the entrance of victuallers, and to keep the besieged from issuing forth.

Now, at such time as Agathocles was ready to depart, advertisement came, that many ships of burden, laden with Corn, and other provisions, were drawing near unto Syracuse. To intercept these the Carthaginians hoise sail, and lanch forth into the deep. They were not far gone, when they might behold Agathocles issuing forth of the Port, with purpose (as they thought) to give convoy unto his victuallers. Hereupon they wheel about, and make amain toward him, as thinking him the better booty. He neither abode their coming, nor fled back into the City, but made all speed towards Africk; and was pursued by the Carthaginians, as long as the day would give them light. In the mean season the victuallers were gotten to Syracuse; which was the more plentifully relieved by their coming, for that Agathocles had unburdened the place of no small number. When the Carthaginian Admiral perceived, first, that by pursuing two Fleets at once, he had missed of them both: and secondly, that Agathocles returned not again, but was gone to seek his fortune elsewhere, he thought it good to pursue those that were fled, and to attend so well upon them, that they should not have leisure to do mischief in some other part.

The Carthaginian Navy, followed Agathocles (whether by chance, or by relation of such as had met with him at Sea) directly towards Africk, and overtook him after six days. He had (at the first) a great start of them; so that (belike) they rowed hard, and wearied themselves in seeking their own misfortune: for he fought with them, and beat them; and, having sunk or taken many, drave the rest to flye which way they could, laden with such strange tydings of his voyage.

When Agathocles had landed his men in Africk, then did he discover unto them his project, letting them understand, that there was no better way to divert the Carthaginians, not only from Syracuse, but from all the Isle of Sicily, than by bringing the war to their own doors. For here (said he) they have many that hate them, and that will readily take Arms against them, as soon as they perceive that there is an Army on foot, which desires to look upon their walls. Their Towns are ill fortified, their people untrained, and experienced in dangers; the mercenary forces that they levy in these parts, will rather follow us than them, if we offer greater wages than they can give: which we may better promise and make good, by letting them have some share with us in all the wealth of the Carthaginians, than our enemies can do, by making some addition to their stipends. Thus he talked, as one already Master of all the riches in Africk; and with many brave words encouraged his men so well, that they were contented to set fire on all their ships (reserving one or two to use as Messengers) to the end that no hope should remain, save only in victory. In this heat of resolution, they win by force two Cities; which after they had thoroughly sacked, they burnt to the ground: as a mark of terror to all that should make resistance. The Carthaginians hearing this, are amazed, thinking that Amilcar is broken, and his whole Army destroyed in Sicily. This impression so dismayes them, that when they know the truth of all, by such as had escaped in the late Sea-fight, yet still they fear, and know not what. They suspect Amilcar's faith, who had suffered Agathocles to land in Africk: they suspect their principal Citizens at home, of a meaning to betray Carthage unto the enemy; they raise a great Army, and know not to whose charge they may safely commit it.

There were at that time two famous Captains in the City, Hanno and Bomilcar, great enemies. And therefore the more unlikely to conspire against the Common-wealth. These are made Generals of the Army levied, which far exceeded the forces of Agathocles. But it seldom happens, that dissension between Commanders produceth any fortunate event. Necessity drave Agathocles to fight: and the courage of his men, resolved to deal with the whole multitude of the Carthaginians, made easie the victory against the one half of them. For Bomilcar would not stir, but suffered Hanno to be cut in pieces.

The reputation of this great victory, brought over a King of the Africans, from the Carthaginian Society, to take part with Agathocles: who pursuing his victory, winneth many Towns, and sends word to Syracuse of his good success. The Carthaginians also send unto Sicily, willing Amilcar, their General, to succour the State of Africk, which was in danger to be lost, whilst he was travelling in the Conquest of Sicily. Amilcar sends them five thousand men: all all his forces he thought it not needful to transport; as hoping rather to draw Agathocles back into Sicily, than to be drawn home by one, that could scarce retain his own Kingdom. But these good hopes had a bad issue. He spent some time in winning a few Towns that adhered unto the Syracusan; and, having brought his matters to some good order, he conceived a sudden hope of taking Syracuse by surprise. It was a pretty (though tragical) Accident, if it were true, as Zully relates it. Amilcar had a dream, which told him that he should sup the next day within Syracuse. His fancy begot this dream, and he verily believed it. He made more halt than good speed toward the City: and coming upon it on the sudden, had good hope to carry it. But his enemies were prepared for him, and had laid an ambush to entrap him, whereinto he fell. So he was carried prisoner into the City; in which it was likely that he had no great cheer to his supper: for they struck of his head, and sent it into Africk (a welcome present) to Agathocles.

This good success of things at home, did put such courage into the Sicilian Army, that Agathocles was bold to wear a Crown, and stile himself King of Africk. He had alured Opbellus, King of the Cyrenians, to take his part, by promises to deliver the Country into his hands: for that (as is said) it was sufficient unto himself to have diverted the Carthaginians from Sicily, wherein (after this war ended) he might reign quietly. Opbellus came, with a great Army, and was friendly entertained. But the traitorous Silician, taking an advantage, did murder this his assistant; and afterwards by good words, and great promises, drew all the Cyrenean Army to follow him in his Wars. Thus his villany found good success; and he prevailed in Africk, that he got leisure to make a step into Sicily. Many Towns in Sicily had embraced a desire of recovering their liberty; thinking it high time to fight at length for their own freedom, after that they had so long been exposed, (as a reward of victory) either unto Aliens, or to Tyrants of their own Country. These had prevailed far, and gotten many to take their parts, as in a common cause: when the coming of Agathocles abated their high spirits, and his good success in many fights, compelled them to Obedience. Out of Sicily he returned into Africk, where his affairs stood in very bad terms. Archagathus, his son had lost a battel; and (which was worse) had ill means to help himself: his Army being in mutiny for lack of pay. But Agathocles pacified the tumult, by the accustomed promises of great booty and spoil. It had now been time for him to offer peace to the Carthaginians: which to obtain, they would (questionless) have given to him both money enough to pay his Army, and all that they then held in Sicily. For their City had been distressed, not only by this his war, but by the treason of Bomilcar, who failed not much of making himself Tyrant over them. But ambition is blind. Agathocles had all his thoughts fixed upon the conquest of Carthage itself: out of which dream he was awakened, by the loss of a battel, not so memorable in regard of any accident therein, as of the strange events following it. The Carthaginians, after their great misfortunes in this war, had renewed their old sacrifices of children to Saturn: from which they had abstained ever since they made peace with Gelon. And now they made choice of some, the goodliest of their prisoners taken in the battel; to offer unto the said Idol, in way of thankfulness to their victory. The fire, with which these unhappy men were consumed, caught hold upon the lodgings nearest unto the Altar, and (spreading itself farther through the Camp, with the destruction of many men, caused such a tumult as is usual in the like cases. At the same time, the like accident of fire burnt up the Pavilion of Agathocles. Hereupon both the Armies fled away, each of them believing, that the noise in the adverse Camp, was a sign of the enemies coming to invade it. But the Carthaginians had a late retreat: Agathocles, by a second error, fell into a new calamity. In the beginning of this his flight in the dark, he met with his own African Soldiers; and thinking them to be enemies, (as indeed the one half of them had revolted from him, to the Carthaginians, in the last battel) he began to assail them, and was so stoutly resisted, that he lost in this blind fight above four thousand of his men. This did so discourage his proud heart, that, being fallen from the near hope of taking the City of Carthage, unto some distrust of his own safety, he knew no more how to moderate his present weak fears, than lately he had known how to govern his ambition. Therefore he took the way that came next into his head; which was to steal closely aboard his ships, with his younger son (the elder he suspected of Incest, and of Ambition) and so to flye into Sicily, thinking it the best course to shift for himself, as wanting vessels wherein to transport his Army. His elder son Archagathus, perceiving his drift, arrested him and put him under custody:

G g g g g but

but by means of a sudden tumult, he was let loose, escaped, and fled alone, leaving both his sons behind him. His flight being noysed through the Army, all was in an uproar; and extremity of rage caused not only the common Souldier, but even such as had been friends to the Tyrant, to lay hold upon his two sons, and kill them. That this flight of Agathocles was extremely base, I need not use words to prove: That his fear was truly, as all fear is said to be, a passion, depriving him of the succours which reason offered, the sequel doth manifest. His forsaken Souldiers, being now a headless company, and no longer an Army to be feared, obtained nevertheless a reasonable composition from the Carthaginians: to whom they sold those places, whereof they had possession, for nineteen talents. Likewise, Agathocles himself, having lost his Army, did nevertheless, by the reputation of this late war, make peace with Carthage upon equal terms.

After this, the Tyrant being delivered from forain enemies, discovered his bloody nature, in most abominable cruelties, among the Sicilians. His wants and his fears, urged him so violently, that he was not satisfied with the spoils of the rich, or the death of those whom he held suspected: but in a beastly rage depopulated whole Cities. He devised new engines of torment; wherein striving to exceed the Bull of Phalaris, he made a frame of brass, that should serve to scorch mens bodies, and withall give him leave to behold them in their misery. So devilish is the nature of man, when reason, that should be his guide, is become a slave to his brutish affections. In these mischiefs he was so outrageous, that he neither spared Sex, nor Age; especially, when he was informed of the slaughter of his children in Aspich. But this was not the way to preserve his estate: it threw him into new dangers. They whom he had chased out of their Country took arms against him, and drove him into such fears, that he was fain to seek that love at Carthage, which by ruling well he might have had in Sicil. He freely delivered into the Carthaginians hands, all those Towns of the Phoenicians in Sicil, belonging unto them, which were in his possession. They required him honourably, with great store of corn, and with four hundred talents of gold and silver. So (though not without much trouble and hazard) he prevailed against the Rebels, and settled his estate. Having no further business left in Sicil, he made a voyage into Italy. There he subdued the Brutians, rather by terror of his name than by any force, for they yielded at his first coming. This done, he went to the Isle of Lipara, and made the Inhabitants buy peace with one hundred talents of gold. But when he had gotten this great sum, he would needs exact a greater; and finding plainly that they had no more left, he was bold to spoil the Temples of their gods. Herein (me thinks) he did well enough. For how could he believe those to be gods, that had continually given deaf ears to his horrible perjuries? Then he returned richly home, with eleven ships loaden with gold: all which, and all the rest of the fleet, were cast away by foul weather at Sea; one Gally excepted, in which he himself escaped, to suffer a more miserable end. Agrievous sickness fell upon him, that rotted his whole body, spreading it self through all his veins and sinews. Whilst he lay in this case, all desiring his end; save only Theogenia (a wife that he had taken out of Egypt) and her small children: his Nephew, the son of Archagathus, before mentioned, and a younger son of his own, began to contend about the Kingdom. Neither did they seek to end the controversy by the old Tyrants decision; they regarded him not so much. But each of them laid wait for the others life: wherein the Nephew sped so well, that he slew his Uncle, and got his Grandfathers Kingdom, without asking any leave. These tydings wounded the heart of Agathocles with fear and sorrow. He saw himself without help, like to become a prey to his ungracious Nephew, from whom he knew that no favour was to be expected, either by himself, or by those, whom only he now held dear, which were Theogenia and her children. Therefore he advised her and them to fly before they were surprised: for that otherwise they could by no means avoid, either death, or somewhat that would be worse. He gave them all his treasures and goods, wherewith he even compelled them (weeping to leave him desolate in so wretched a case) to imbarke themselves hastily, and make speed into Egypt. After their departure, whether he threw himself into the fire, or whether his disease consumed him, there was none left that cared to attend him, but he ended his life as basely, as obscurely; and in as much want as he first began it.

After the death of Agathocles it was, that the Mamertines, his Souldiers, traitorously occupied Messana, and infested a great part of the Island. Then also did the Carthaginians begin to renew their attempts of conquering all Sicil. What the Nephew of Agathocles shocler did, I cannot find. Likely it is that he quickly perished. For the Sicilians were driven to lend for Pyrrhus to help them, who had married with a daughter of Agathocles. But Pyrrhus was soon weary of the Country (as hath been shewed before) and therefore left it; prophesying that it would become a goodly champion field, wherein Rome and Carthage should fight for superiority. In which business, how these two great Cities did speed, the order of our story will declare.

§. V.

A recontinuation of the Roman War in Sicil. How Hieron, King of Syracuse, forsook the Carthaginians, and made his peace with Rome.

When Appian Claudianus, following the advantage of his victory gotten at Messana, brought the War unto the Gates of Syracuse, and besieged that great City; Hieron found it high time for him to seek peace: knowing that the Carthaginians had neither any reason to be offended with him, for helping himself by what means he could, when they were not in case to give him assistance; and foreseeing withall, that when once he had purchased his quiet from the Romans, it would be free for him to sit still, without fear of molestation, whilst Rome and Carthage were fighting for the mastery. In this good mood the new Roman Consuls, M. Valerius, and C. Offacilius found him, and readily embraced the offer of his friendship. Yet they made use of their present advantage, and sold him peace for an hundred (some say two hundred) Talents.

These Consuls had brought a great Army into Sicil; yet did they nothing else in effect, than bring over Hieron to their side. If the Syracusan held them busied (which I find not, otherwise than by circumstances, as by the sum of money imposed upon him, and by their performing none other piece of service) all the whole time of their abode in the Island; then was his departure from the friendship of Carthage, no less to his honour than it was to his commodity. For by no reason could they require, that he should suffer his own Kingdom to run into manifest peril of subversion, for their sakes that should have received all the profit of the victory: seeing they did expose him to the whole danger without straining themselves to give him relief. But the Carthaginians had lately made good proof of the strength of Syracuse, in the dayes of Agathocles: and therefore knew, that it was able to bear a very strong siege. And hereupon it is like that they were the more slack, in lending help: if (perhaps) it were not some part of their desire, that both Rome and Syracuse should weaken one the other, whereby their own work might be the easier against them both. Yet indeed, the case of the besieged City was not the same, when the Romans lay before it, as it had been when the Carthaginians attempted it. For there was great reason to try the uttermost hazard of war against the Carthaginians, who fought no other thing than to bring it into slavery: not to against the Romans, who thought it sufficient if they could withdraw it from the party of their enemies. Besides, it was not all one to be governed by Agathocles, or by Hieron. The former of these cared not what the Citizens endured, so long as he might preserve his own tyranny: the latter, as a just and good Prince, had no greater desire than to win the love of his people by seeking their commodity; but including his own felicity within the publick, laboured to uphold both, by honest and faithfull dealing. Hereby it came to pass that he enjoyed a long and happy reign, living dear to his own Subjects, beloved of the Romans, and not greatly molested by the Carthaginians; whom, either the consideration, That they had left him to himself, ere he left their society, made unwilling to seek his ruine; or their more earnest business with the Romans, made unable to compass it.

§. VI.

How the Romans besage and win Agrigentum. Their beginning to maintain a fleet. Their first loss, and first victory by sea. Of sea-fights in general.

Hieron, having sided himself with the Romans, adideth them with vituals and other necessities: so that they, presuming upon his assistance, recall some part of their forces. The Carthaginians find it high time to bestir them; they send to the Ligurians, and to the troupes they had in Spain, to come to their aid; who being arrived, they made the City of Agrigentum the seat of the War, against the Romans, filling it with all manner of munition.

The Roman Consuls, having made peace with Hieron, return into Italy; and, in their places, Lucius Posthumus and Quintus Manilius arrive. They go on towards

* Agrigen-

* Agri-entum: and finding no enemy in the field, they besiege it, though it were studded with fifty thousand Souldiers. After a while, the time of harvest being come; a part of the Roman Army range the Country to gather corn, and those at the siege grow negligent; the Carthaginians fall furiously, and indanger the Roman Army, but are in the end repelled into the Town with great loss; but by the smart felt on both sides, the Assailants redoubled their guards, and the besieged kept within their covert. Yet the Romans, the better to assure themselves, cut a deep trench between the walls of the City and their Camp: and another on the outside thereof; that neither the Carthaginians might force them suddenly, by a fall; nor those of the Country without, break upon them unawares: which double Defence kept the besieged also from the receiving any relief of victuals, and munitions; whilst the Syracusan supplies the assailants, with what they want. The besieged send for succour to Carthage, after they had been in this sort pent up five months. The Carthaginians embark an Army, with certain Elephants, under the command of Hanno; who arrives with it at Heraclea, to the West of Agri-entum. Hanno put himself into the field, and surpriseth Erbesus, a City wherein the Romans had bestowed all their provision. By means hereof, the famine without grew to be as great, as it was within Agri-entum; and the Roman Camp no less straightly assailed by Hanno, than the City was by the Romans: inasmuch, as if Hieron had not supplied them, they had been forced to abandon the siege. But seeing that this distress was not enough to make them rise, Hanno determined to give them battle. To which end departing from Heraclea, he makes approach unto the Roman Camp. The Romans resolve to sustain him, and put themselves in order. Hanno directs the Numidian horsemen to charge the Vanguard, to the end to draw them further on; which done, he commands them to return Temples, and Theatres, Water-conduits, and Fish-ponds: the ruins whereof at this day are sufficient argument, that Rome it felt could never boast of the like. In the Porch of the Temple of Jupiter Optimus, (by which we may judge of the Temple it self) there was set out on one side the full proportion of the Giants, fighting with the gods, all cut out in polished marble of divers colours; a work the most magnificent and rare that ever hath been seen on the other side, the war of Troy, and the encounters which hapned at that siege; with the perijegies of the Heroes that were doers in that war; all of the like beautiful stone, and of equal stature to the bodies of those men in ancient times: In comparison of which, the latter works of that kind, are but petty things, and meer trifles. It would require a volume to express the magnificence of the Temples of Heracles, Asclepiades, Ceres, Jean Lucius, Chastity, Proserpina, Cerber and Pallas; whereas the Master-pieces of those exquisite Painters and Carvers Phidias, Zexis, Myo, and Polycletus, were to be seen. But in process of time it ran the same fortune that all other great Cities have done, and was ruined by divers calamities of war: whereof this war present brought unto it not the least.

as broken, till they came to the body of the Army, that lay shadowed behind some rising grounds. The Numidians perform it accordingly; and while the Romans pursued the Numidians, Hanno gives upon them, and having slaughtered many, beats the rest into their Trenches.

After this encounter, the Carthaginians made no other attempt for two months, but lay strongly encamped, waiting until some opportunity should invite them. But Annibal that was besieged in Agri-entum, as well by signs as messengers, made Hanno know how ill the extremity which he endured, was able to brook such dilatory courses. Hanno thereupon, a second time, provoked the Consuls to fight: Bushie Elephants being disordered by his own Vanguard, which was broken by the Romans, he lost the day: and with such as escaped, he recovered Heraclea. Annibal perceiving this, and remaining hopeless of succour, resolved to make his own way. Finding therefore that the Romans, after this dayes victory, wearied with labour, and secured by their good fortune, kept negligent watch in the night; he runs out of the Town, with all the remainder of his Army, and past by the Roman camp without resistance. The Consuls pursue him in the morning, but in vain: for they were, that he could not carry the City with him, which with little a-do the Romans entered, and pitifully spoiled. The Romans, proud of this victory, pursued rather to follow the direction of their present good fortunes, than their first determinations. They had resolved in the beginning of this War, only to succour the Mamertines, and to keep the Carthaginians from their own coasts: but now they determine to make themselves Lords of all Sicily; and from thence, being favoured with the wind of good success, to sail over into Africa. It is the disease of Kings, of States, and also of private men, to covet the greatest things, but not to enjoy the least; the desire of that which we neither have nor need, taking from us the true use and fruition of what we have already. This curse upon mortal men, was never taken from them since the beginning of the World unto this day.

To prosecute this War, Lucius Valerius and Titus Otacilius, two new Consuls, are sent into Sicily. Whereupon, the Romans being Masters of the field, many in-land Towns gave themselves unto them. On the contrary, the Carthaginians keeping still the Lordship of the Sea, many maritime places became theirs. The Romans therefore, as well to secure their own coasts, often invaded by the African fleets, fleets, as to equal themselves in every kind of warfare with their enemies, determine to make a fleet. And herein fortune favoured them with this accident, that being altogether ignorant in ship-wrights craft, a storm of wind thrust one of the Carthaginian Gallies, of five banks, to the shore.

Now had the Romans a pattern, and by it they began to set up an hundred Quinqueremes, which were Gallies, rowed by five on every bank; and twenty, of three on a bank: and while these were in preparing, they exercised their men in the feat of rowing. This they did after a strange fashion. They placed upon the Sea sands many seats, in order of the banks in Gallies, whereon they placed their water-men, and taught them to beat the sand with long poles, orderly, and so they were directed by the Master, that so they might learn the stroke of the Gally, and how to mount and draw their Oars.

When their fleet was finished, some rigging and other implements excepted, Cornelius, one of the new consuls (for they changed every year) was made Admiral: who being more in love with this new kind of warfare, than well advised, past over to Messana with seventeen Gallies, leaving the rest to follow him. There he stayed not, but would needs row along the coast to Lipara, hoping to do some piece of service. Hannibal a Carthaginian was at the same time Governor in Panormus; who being advertised of this new Sea-mans arrival, sent forth one Booder, a Senator of Carthage, with twenty Gallies, to entertain him. Booder, falling upon the Consul unawares, took both him and the fleet he commanded. When Hannibal received this good news, together with the Roman Gallies, and their Consul; he grew no less foolish hardy than Cornelius had been. For he, fancying to himself to surprize the rest of the Roman fleet, on their own coast, ere they were yet in all points provided; sought them out with a fleet of fifty sail: wherewith falling among them, he was well beaten, and leaving the greater number of his own behind him, made an hard escape with the rest: for of one hundred and twenty Gallies, the Romans under Cornelius had lost but seventeen, (so as one hundred and three remained, which were not easily beaten by fifty).

The Romans, being advertised of Cornelius's overthrow, make haste to redeem him, but give the charge of their fleet to his Colleague, Duilus. Duilus, considering that the Roman vessels were heavy and slow, the African Gallies having the speed of them, devised a certain Engine in the prow of his Gallies, whereby they might fasten or grapple themselves with their enemies, when they were (as we call it) boord and boord, that is, when they brought the Gallies sides together. This done the weightier ships had gotten the advantage, and the Africans lost it. For neither did their (wittness serve them, nor their Mariners craft; the vessels wherein both Nations fought, being open: so that all was to be carried by the advantage of weapon, and valour of the men. Besides this, as the heavier Gallies were accidentally likely to crush, and crack the sides of the lighter and weaker, so were they by the reason of their breadth, more steady; and those that best kept their feet, could also best use their hands. The example may be given between one of the long boats of his Majesties great ships, and a London Barge.

Certainly, he that will happily perform a fight at Sea, must be skilful in making choice of Vessels to fight in: he must believe that there is more belonging to a good man of War, upon the waters, than great daring; and must know, that there is a great deal of difference, between fighting loose or at large, and grappling. The Guns of a flow ship pierce as well, and make as great holes, as those in a swift. To clap ships together, without consideration, belongs rather to a mad man, than to a man of War: for by such an ignorant bravery was Peter Strasse lost at the Azores, when he fought against the Marquis of Santa Cruz. In like sort, had the Lord Charles Howard, Admiral of England, been lost in the year 1588, if he had not been better advised, than a great many malignant fools were, that found fault with his demeanour. The Spaniards had an Army aboard them; and he had none: they had more ships than he had, and of higher building and charging; so that, had he intangled himself with those great and powerful Vessels, he had greatly endangered this Kingdom of England. For twenty men upon the defences, are equal to an hundred that boord and enter; whereas then, contrariwise, the Spaniards had an hundred, for twenty ours to defend themselves withall. But our Admiral knew his advantage, and held it: which had he not done, he had not been worthy to have held his head. Here to speak in general of Sea-fights (for particulars are fitter for private hands than for the Press,) I say, that a fleet of twenty ships, all good sailers, and good ships, have the advantage, on the open Sea, of an hundred as good ships and of slower sailing. For if the fleet of an hundred fail keep themselves near together, in a gross Squadron; the twenty ships, charging them upon any angle, shall force them to give ground, and to fall back upon their own next fellows: of which so many as intangle, are made unserviceable or lost. Force them they may easily, because the twenty ships, which give themselves scope, after they have given one broad side of Artillery, by clapping into the wind, and slaying, they may give them the other: and so the twenty ships batter them in pieces with a perpetual volley; whereas those that fight in a troop, have no room to turn, and can always use but one and the same beaten side. If the fleet of an hundred fail give themselves any distance, then shall the lesser fleet prevail, either against those that are rear and hindmost, or against those, that by advantage of over-sailing their fellows keep the wind, and if upon a Lee-shore, the ships next the wind: be constrained to fall back into their own Squadron, then it is all to nothing, the whole fleet must suffer shipwreck, or render it self. That such advantage may be taken upon a fleet of unequal speed, it hath been well enough conceived in old time; as by the Oration of Hermocrates, in Thucydides, which he made to the Syracusan, when the Athenians invaded them, it may easily be observed.

Of the Art of War by Sea; I had written a Treatise, for the Lord Henry, Prince of Wales; a Subject, to my knowledge, never handled by any man, ancient or modern: but God hath spared me the labour of finishing it, by his loss; by the loss of that brave Prince; of which, like an Eclipse of the Sun, we shall find the effects hereafter. Impossible it is to equal words and sorrows; will therefore leave him in the hands of God that hath him. Cura leveis loquuntur, ingentes stupent.

But it is now time to return to the beaten Carthaginians; who by losing their advantage of swift boats, and boarding the Romans, have lost fifty sail of their Gallies: as on the other side, their enemies by commanding the Seas, have gotten liberty to sail about the West part of Sicily; where they raised the siege laid unto Segesta by the Carthaginians; and won the Town of Macella, with some other places.

S. V I I.

Divers Enterprizes of War, between the Romans and Carthaginians, with variable success. The Romans prepare to invade Africa: and obtain a great victory at Sea.

THE Victory of Dunius, as it was honoured at Rome, with the first Naval Triumph, that was ever seen in that City; so gave it unto the Romans great inco-agement, to proceed in their Wars by Sea; whereby they hoped, not only to get Sicily, but all the other Isles between Italy and Africa, beginning with Sardinia; whither soon after they sent a fleet for that purpose. On the contrary side, Amilcar, the Carthaginian, lying in Panormus, carefully waited for all occasions, that might help to recompence the late misfortune; and being adverted, that some quarrel was grown between the Roman Soldiers, and their Auxiliaries, being such as caused them to incamp apart, he sent forth Hannibal to set upon them; who taking them unawares, buried four thousand of them in the place. Now during the continuance of the Land-war in Sicily, Hannibal, who had lately been beaten by Sea, but escaped unto Carthage, meaning to make amends for his former error, obtained the trust of a new fleet, wherewith he arrived at Sardinia: the conquest of which Island, the Romans had entertained for their next enterprize. Now it so fell out, that the Romans, crossing the Sea from Sicily, arrived in the Port where Hannibal with his new fleet anchored. They let upon him unawares, and took the better part of the fleet which he conducted; himself hardly escaping the danger. But it little availed him to have escaped from the Romans. His good friends the Carthaginians, were so ill pleased with this his second unfortunate voyage, that they hanged him up for his diligence: for as it hath been said of old) Now est ibi in bello peccare; In War it is too much to offend twice.

After this, it was long ere any thing of importance was done by the Consuls, till Pe- is one of the first Cities that hath been built in all Europe. So whereas Thucydides seems to make it a Colony of the Phoenicians; Strabo, in his libro de Panormo, lib. 6. affirms that it was first and long time the time which Thucydides set down founded by the Chalcidians; and Diodorus. To prove which, he tells us of two inscriptions upon Marble in the following Character found at Panormus, in the time of Strabo the second year of Sicily, that were then held of all the Chalcidians and other foreigners, which being translated into Latine, say thus followeth; Phoenici filii Abrahæ, et eugentes in Idomea, æque in vallis Damascenæ, filii filii Isaac; ingressi Hierusalem nomen; quibus adjuvati sunt multi Damasceni; æque Phoenici; profecti in hanc insulam quæ vocatur Sicily, sedes populi locumque in hoc antiquissimum loco, quem Tinnomen nuncupantur. In the other Marble are found these words; Non est alius Deus præter eum Domini, qui est deus patris præter eum Domini, etc. Hinc Tinnon præfatus est Saphir filii Pharis, filii Isaac fratris Jacob filii Isaac, filii Abrahæ; et Tinnon quidem nomen est Raych; sed Tinnon hinc proxime nomen est Phorab. And this inscription (saith Facellus) was found intire in the Castle Raych, in the year 1716. Now whether these inscriptions were truly as ancient, as these men believe they were, I leave every man to his own faith. But that the City of great ages, it appears by Thucydides, who affirms; that the Carthaginians first into Sicily, that then the Phoenicians inhabited Panormus; which certainly it they did in the first Punic war; to wit, the Carthaginians who were Phoenicians; from whom the Romans (A. Appianus, and C. Cælius) commanding this Army) took it; And while Abrahæ besieged Syracusa, sent him in aid 3000 Soldiers. But it was rather considerate, than foolish to the Romans. For Cicero against Pisces, names it among the chief Cities of Sicily. After Syracusa destroyed, it became the first City, and Regium Seat; as well of the Gæthi and Syracusan in that Island, as of the Empire of Carthage, of the Numidians, Prætor, desertorum, which by now it holds this day, and is much frequented, for the excellent wine which grows about it.

norma was besieged; where, when the Romans had fought in vain to draw the Carthaginians into the field; being unable to force that great City, because of the strong Garrison therein belovved: they then departed from thence, and took certain Inland Towns, as Mystratum, Enna, Camerina, Hippana, and others, between Panormus and Messana.

The year following, C. Attilius the Consul who commanded the Roman fleet, discovered a company of the Carthaginian Gallies, ranging the coast: and, not staying for his whole number pursued them with ten of his. But he was well beaten for the haste he made, and lost all, save the Gally which transported him: wherein himself escaped with great labour. But ere all was done, the rest of Attilius his fleet was gotten up: who renewing the fight, recovered from the Carthaginians a double number of theirs; by which the Victory remaining doubtful, both challenge it. Now to try at once, which of these two Nations should command the Seas, they both prepare all they can. The Romans make a fleet of three hundred and thirty Gallies; the Carthaginians, of three hundred and fifty,  Triremes, Quadriremes, and Quinquiremes.*

* The Quinquiremes Gallies, wherein every Carr has five masts drawn in: the Quadriremes had five masts of Carrs, and one another; and the other Gallies (reasonably) fewer. But had this been so, they must then have had five decks each over others: which hath been done been seen in ships of a thousand tons; neither could the third, fourth, and fifth masts, have reached unto the waists with the Carrs.

The Romans resolve to transport the War into Africa, the Carthaginians, to arrest them on the coast of Sicily. The numbers, with which each of them fitted their fleet, was (perhaps) the greatest that ever fought on the waters. By Polybius his estimation, there were in the Roman Gallies an hundred and forty thousand men; and in those of Carthage, an hundred and fifty thousand: Reckoning one hundred and twenty Soldiers, and three hundred Rowers to every Gally, one with the other. The Roman fleet was divided into four parts, of which the three first made the form of a Wedge or Triangle; the two first Squadrons making the Flanks, and the third Squadron, the Base: the point thereof (wherein were the two Consuls as Admirals) looking toward the enemy, and the middle space lying empty. Their Vessels of carriage were towed by the third Squadron. After all came up the fourth, in form of a Crescent, very well manned, but exceeding thin: so that the horns of it inclosed all the third Squadron, together with the corner of the first and second. The order of the Carthaginian Fleet, I cannot receive by relation; but, by the manner of the fight afterwards, I conjecture, that the front of their Fleet was thin, and stretched in a great length, much like to that which the French call Combat en bœye, a long front of horse, and thin: which form, since the Pistol prevailed over the Lance, they have changed. Behind this first out-stretched front, their Battalions were more solid: for Amilcar, Admiral of the Carthaginians had thus ordered them, of purpose, his Gallies having the speed of the Romans; that, when the first Fleet of the Romans hastened to break through the first Gallies, they should all turn tail, and the Romans pursuing them (as after a victory) disorder themselves, and, for engerness of taking the Run-aways, leave their own three Squadrons far behind them: For so it must needs fall out; seeing that the third Squadron towed their horse-boats and victualers; and the fourth had the Rearward of all. According to Amilcar's direction it succeeded. For when the Romans had charged, and broken the thin front of the Carthaginian first Fleet, which ran away, they forthwith gave after them with all speed possible, not so much as looking behind them for the second Squadron. Hereby the Romans were drawn near unto the body of the Carthaginian Fleet, led by Amilcar; and by him (at the first) received a great loss, until the second Squadron came up, which forced Amilcar to betake him to his Oars. Hannibal also, who commanded the right wing of the Carthaginian Fleet, invaded the Roman Rearward, and prevailed against them. But Amilcar, being beaten off, Asdrubal fell back to their succour, and put the Carthaginians to their heels; as not able to sustain both Squadrons. The Reg being relieved, the Consuls came to the aid of their third Battalion, which towed their victualers, which were also in great danger of being beaten by the African; but the Consuls, joining their squadrons to it, put the Carthaginians on that part also to running.

This victory fell unto the Romans, partly by the hardiness of their Soldiers; but principally, for that Amilcar, being first beaten, could never after join himself unto any of his other squadrons; that remained, as yet in a fair likelihood of prevailing, so long as they fought upon equal terms, and but Squadron to Squadron. But Amilcar, forsaking the fight, thereby left a full fourth part of the Roman Fleet unengaged, and ready to give succour to any of the other parts that were oppressed. So as in conclusion, the the Romans got the honour of the day: for they lost but four and twenty of theirs; whereas the Africans lost thirty that were sunk, and three score and three that were taken.

Now, if Amilcar who had more Gallies than the Romans, had also divided his Fleet into four squadrons, (besides those that he ranged in the front to draw on the enemies, and to engage them) and that, whilst he himself fought with one squadron that charged him, all the rest of the enemies Fleet had been at the same time entertained, he had prevailed; but the second squadron, being sent, came to the rescue of the first, by which Amilcar was oppressed: and Amilcar, being oppressed and scattered, the Consuls had good leisure to relieve both the third and the fourth squadron, and got the victory.

Meanwhile the fifth, among other the Precepts to Philip the second his Son, where he advised him concerning War against the Turks, tells him, that in all battles between them and the Christians, he should never fail to charge the Infantry in the beginning of the fight, and to engage them at once with the rest: For (saith he) the Turks (who are always reserved intire in the Rear of the battle, and in whom the Turk reposes his greatest confidence; come up in a good body, when all the troops on both sides are disband'd and in confusion; where by they carry the Victory before them without resistance. By the same order of fight, and reservation did the Romans also prevail against other Nations. For they kept their Infantry in store (who were the choice of their Army) for the up-shot and last blow. A great and victorious advantage it hath even been found, to keep some one or two good troops to look on; when all others are disband'd and engaged.

Now the Romans, according to their further resolution, after they had repaid and recalled their Fleet, set sail for Capria; and arrived at the Promontory of Heraclea, a great Headland, somewhat to the East of the Port of Carthage, and some forty leagues from Heraclea in Sicily, where Amilcar himself as yet itaid. From this Headland, leaving the entrance into Carthage, they coasted the East-side of the Promontory, till they came to Clypea, a Town about fifty English mile from it. There they disembarked and prepared to besiege Clypea; which to ease them of labour, was yielded unto them. Now had they a Port of their own on Africa side; without which all invasions are foolish. By this time were the Africans also arrived at their own Carthage, fearing that the Roman Fleet and Army had directed themselves thither; but being advertised that they had taken Clypea, they made provisions of all sorts, both by Sea and Land, for their defence. The Romans sent to Rome for directions, and in the mean while wait all round about them. The order given for the Senate, was, That one of the Consuls should remain with the Army, and that the other should return with the Fleet into Italy. According to this direction, Manlius the Consul is sent home to Rome; whither he carried with him twenty thousand African Captains, with all the Roman Fleet and Army; except forty ships, fifteen thousand foot, and five hundred horse, that were left with Attilius.

With these forces, Regulus easily won some Towns and places that were unwall'd, and laid siege to others. But he performed no great matter before he came to Adis. Yet I hold it worthy of relation, that near unto the River of Braccada, he encountered with a Regiment of one hundred and twenty foot long, which he slew, not without loss of many Souldiers; being driven to use against it such engines of War, as served properly for the assaulting of Towns. At Adis he met with the Carthaginian Army, where of the Captains were Hannib and Bolser, together with Amilcar, who had brought over out of Sicily five thousand foot, and five hundred horse to succour his Country. These (be like) had an intent, rather to weary him out of Africa, by wary protraction of time, than to undergo the hazard of a main fight. They were careful to hold themselves free from necessity of coming to blows; yet had they a great desire to save the Town of Adis out of his hands. Intending therefore to follow their general purpose, and yet to disturb him in the siege of Adis, they incamp near unto him, and strongly (as they think) on the top of a hill; but thereby they lose the services both of their Elephants and of their horse-men. This disadvantage of theirs, Regulus discovers, and makes use of it. He assaults them in their strength, which they defend a while, but in time the Romans prevail; and force them from the place, taking the spoil of their Camp. Following this their good fortune at the heels, they

* This City they proceed to * Tunis a City within sixty miles of Carthage, which they assault and take.

† This was taken from the Turks and taken by Charles the fifth in the year 1536, and was one of the three Keys, which he gave in charge to Philip the second his son to keep safe; to wit, this Tunis, the Key of Africa; Fishing, the Key of the Netherlands; and Xeres, the Key of Spain. But two of these Philip lost, that he never found them again; the third our English were bold, in the time of the renowned Queen Elizabeth, to wring out of his hand; where we layed not to pick any lock, but brake open the doors, and having rifled all, threw it into the fire.

By the loss of this battail at Adis, and more especially by the loss of Tunis, the Carthaginians were greatly dismayed. The Numidians, their next Neighbours towards the West, insult upon their misfortunes; invade, and spoil their Territory, and force those that inhabit abroad, to forsake their villages and fields, and to hide themselves within the walls of Carthage. By reason hereof, a great famine at hand threatens the Citizens. Attilius finds his own advantage, and assures himself that the City could not long hold out: yet he feared lest he might defend it self, until his time of Office, that was near expired, should be quiterun out, whereby the new Consuls were like to reap the honour of obtaining it. Ambition therefore, that hath no respect but to it self, persuades him to treat of peace with the Carthaginians. But he propounded unto them so unworthy and base conditions, as thereby their hearts, formerly possessed with fear, became now so courageous and disdainful, that they resolved, either to defend their liberty, or die to the last man. To strengthen this their resolution, there arrived at the same time a great troop of Greeks, whom they had formerly sent to entertain. Among these was a very expert Souldier, named Xantippus, a Spartan: who being informed of what had passed, and of the overthrow which the Carthaginians received near unto Adis, gave it out publicly; that the same was occasioned by default of the Commanders, and not of the Nation. This bruit, ran till it came to the Senate; Xantippus is sent for; gives the reason of his opinion; and in conclusion, being made General of the African forces, he puts himself into the field. The Army which he led, consisted of no more than twelve thousand foot, and four thousand horse, with an hundred Elephants. No greater were the forces where with the Carthaginians fought for all that they had, Liberties, Lives, Goods, Wives, and Children: which might well make it suspected, that the Armies by Sea, before spoken of, were mis-numbered; the one consisting of an hundred and forty thousand, and the other of an hundred and fifty thousand, were it not commonly found that they which use the service of mercenary Souldiers, are stronger abroad, than at their own doors.

Xantippus, taking the field with his Army, marched directly towards the Romans; and ranging his troops upon fair and level ground, sitteth both for his Elephants and Horse, presented them battel. The Romans wondered much, whence this new courage of their enemies might grow: but confident they were, that it should soon be abated. Their chief care was, how to resist the violence of the Elephants. Against them they placed the Velites, or light-armed Souldiers, as a forlorn hope; that these might either with darts and other casting-weapons, drive back the beasts upon the enemies, or at least break their violence, and hinder them from rushing freely upon the Legions. To the same end, they made their battails deeper in file, than they had been accustomed to do. By which means, as they were the less subject unto the impression of the Elephants; so were they so much the more exposed unto the violence of the horse, wherein the enemy did far exceed them. The Elephants were placed by Xantippus, all in one rank, before his Army; which followed them at a reasonable distance: his horsemen, and some lightly-armed foot, of the Carthaginians Auxiliaries, were in the wings. The first onset was given by the Elephants, against which the Velites were so unable to make resistance, that they brake into the battalions following, and put them into some disorder. In this case, the depth of the Roman battail was helpful. For when the beasts had spent their force, in piercing through a few of the first ranks; the squadrons nevertheless persistered in their order, without opening. But the Carthaginian horse, having at the first encounter, by reason of their advantage in number, driven those of Attilius out of the field, began to charge the Roman battalions in flank, and put them in great distress; who being forced to turn face every way, could neither pass forward nor yet retire; but had very much ado to make good the ground whereon they stood. In the mean while, such of the Romans, as had escaped the fury of the Elephants, and left them at their backs, fell upon the Carthaginian Army, that met them in very good array. It was no even match. The one were a disordered Company, wearied with labour and hurt; the other, fresh, and well prepared, to have dealt with the enemy upon equal terms. Here was therefore a great slaughter with little fight; the Romans hastily recoiled to the body of their Army, which being surrounded with the enemy, and spent with travail, fell all to rout, upon the defeat of these troops, that open the way to a general overthrow. So the Carthaginians obtained a full victory; destroying the whole Roman Army, save two thousand, and taking five hundred prisoners, together with Attilius the Consul. Of their own they lost no more than eight hundred Mercenaries, which were slain when the fight began, by two thousand of the Romans: that wheeling about to avoid the Elephants, bare down all before them: and made way even to the Carthaginian trenches. These were the two thousand that escaped, when the whole Army behind them was routed. All the rest were either taken or slain. Hereby fortune made the Romans know, that they were no less her vassals, than were the Carthaginians: how insolent soever they had been in their proposition of peace, as if they had purchased from her the inheritance of their prosperity, which thenceforward gave not sold to any mortal man. With what joy these news were welcomed, when they came to Carthage, we may easily conjecture; and what great things the virtue of one man hath often brought to pass in the world, there are many examples to prove, no less than this of Xanthippus: all of them confirming that sentence of Eurypides, Mens una sapiens, plurimum vincit manus; Many mens hands equal not one wise mind.
H h h h h therefore

After this great service done to the Carthaginians, Xanthippus, returned into Greece: whether for that he was more envied than honoured, or for what other cause, it is unknown.

The death of Attilius Regulus the Consul, was very memorable. He was sent from Carthage to Rome, about the exchange and ransom of prisoners on both sides: giving his faith to return if the business were not effected. When he came to Rome, and plainly saw that his Country should lose by the bargain: so far was he from urging the Senate unto compassion of his own misery, that he earnestly perswaded to have the prisoners in Africa left to their ill destinies. This done, he returned to Carthage: where for his pains taken, he was rewarded with an horrible death. For this his constancy and faith, all Writers highly extoll him. But the Carthaginians seem to have judged him an obstinate and malicious enemy, that neither in his prosperity would hearken to reason, nor yet in his calamity would have the natural care, to preserve himself and others, by yielding to such an office of humanity, as is common in all wars (not grounded upon deadly hatred) only in regard of some small advantage. Whatsoever the Carthaginians thought of him; sure it is that his faithful observance of his word given, cannot be too much commended. But that grave speech, which he made in the Senate, against the exchange of prisoners, appears, in all reason, to have proceeded from a vain-glorious forwardness, rather than from any necessity of State. For the Exchange was made soon after his death: wherein the Romans had the worse bargain, by so much as Regulus himself was worth. As for the authority of all Historians, that magnify him in this point, we are to consider, that they lived under the Roman Empire: Philinus, the Carthaginian, perhaps did censure it otherwise. Yet the death which he suffered with extremest torments, could not be more grievous to him, than it was dishonourable to Carthage. Neither do I think that the Carthaginians could excuse themselves herein; otherwise than by recrimination: saying, that the Romans deserved to be no better treated, for as much as it is their ordinary practice to use others in the like sort. Cruelly doth not become more warrantable, but rather more odious, by being customary. It was the Roman fashion, to whip almost to death, and then to behead, the Captains of their enemies whom they took, yea, although they were such as had always made fair wars with them. Wherefore it seems not meet, in reason, that they should cry out against the like tyrannical insolency in others, as if it were lawful only in themselves.

The consideration both of this misfortune, that rewarded the pride of Attilius his intolerable demands; and of the sudden valour, whereinto the Carthaginians' fear was changed by meer desperation; calls to remembrance, the like insolency of others in prosperity, that hath bred the like resolution in those, to whom all reasonable grace hath been denied. In such cases I never hold it impertinent, to add unto one, more reimonies; approving the true rules, from which our passions carry us away.

In the year 1378. the Genovates won so fast upon the Venetians, as they not only drew their Gallies out of the Sea, but they brought their own fleet within two miles of Venice itself. This bred such an amazement in the City of Venice, that they offered unto the Genovates (their State reserved) whatsoever they would demand. But Peter Doria, blow blown up with many former victories, would hearken unto composition; save the yielding of their City and State to his discretion. Hereupon the Venetians, being filled with disdain, thrust out to Sea with all their remaining power, and assail Doria with such desperate fury, that they break his fleet, kill Doria himself, take nineteen of his Gallies, fourscore boats of padua, and four thousand prisoners, recover Chioggia, and all the places taken from them; and following their victory, enter the Port of Genoa, enforcing the Genovates barely to beg peace, to their extremest dishonour and disadvantage, being beaten; which, being victorious, they might have commanded, to their greatest honour and advantage. The like hapned to the Earl of Flanders, in the year 1380. when having taken a notable, and withal an over-cruel revenge upon the Gantois, he refused mercy to the rest, who in all humility, submitting themselves to his obedience, offered their City, goods, and estates, to be disposed at his pleasure. This when he had unduly refused, and was resolved to extinguish them utterly; they issue out of their City with five thousand chosen men, and armed with a desperate resolution, they charge the Earl, break his Army; enter Bruges (pell-mell) with his vanquished followers; and enforce him to hide himself under an heap of straw, in a poor cottage; out of which with great difficulty he escaped, and saved himself. Such are the fruits of Insolency.

How the affairs of Carthage prospered after the victory against Attilius: How the Romans, having lost their fleet by tempest, resolve to forsake the Seas: The great advantages of a good fleet in war, between Nations divided by the Sea.

BY the reputation of this late victory, all places that had been lost in Africa, return to the obedience of Carthage. Only Clypea stands out; before which the Carthaginians sit down, and assail it, but in vain: For the Romans, hearing of the loss of Attilius, with their forces in Africa, and withal, that Clypea was besieged, make ready a gross Army, and transport it in a fleet of three hundred and fifty Gallies, commanded by M. Eutolius, and Ser. Fulvius, their Consuls. At the Promontory of Mercury, two hundred Carthaginian Gallies, set out of purpose, upon the bruit of their coming, encounter them: but greatly to their cost. For the Romans took by force an hundred and fourteen of their fleet, and drew them after them to Clypea, where they staid no longer, than to take in their own men that had been besieged: and this done, they made amain toward Sicily, in hope to recover all that the Carthaginians held therein. In this hasty voyage they despise the advice of the Pilots, who pray them to find harbour in time; for that the season threatened some violent storms, which ever hapned between the rising of Orion, and of the Dog-star. Now although the Pilots of the Roman fleet had thus forewarned them of the weather at hand, and certified them withal, that the South coast of Sicily had no good Ports, wherein to save themselves upon such an accident: yet this victorious Nation was perswaded, that the wind and seas feared them no less, than did the Africans; and that they were able to conquer Elements themselves. So refusing to stay within some Port, as they were advised, they would needs put out to Sea; thinking it a matter much helping their reputation, after this victory against the Carthaginian fleet; to take a few worthless Towns upon the coast. The merciless in the winds in the mean while overtake them, and near unto Camerina, overturn and thrust headlong on the rocks; all but fourscore of three hundred and forty ships, so as their former great victory was devoured by the Seas, before the same thereof recovered Rome.

call the Nortes, or North winds; are very fearful: and therefore they that navigate in these parts, take Harbour till these months take end, chiefly the fifth being as ill advised, in passing the Seas towards Africa, in the Winter quarter contrary to the counsel of A. Doria; as he was in like unseasonable times to continue his siege before Misra in Laricia, lost an hundred and forty ships by tempests, and fifteen Gallies with all in sight in them, of many rich vessels, horses, and situation: a loss no less great, than his retreat, both from before the one and the other, was extremest disadvantage.

The Carthaginians, hearing what had hapned, repair all their warlike vessels hoping once again to command the Seas: they are also as confident of their land-forces since the overthrow of Attilius. They send Asdrubal into Sicily with all their old Souldiers, and an hundred and forty Elephants embarked in two hundred Gallies. With this Army and fleet he arrives at Lilybaeum; where he begins to vex the Partians of Rome. But adversity doth not discourage the Romans: They build in 3, months (a matter of great note) one hundred and twenty ships; with which, and the remainder of their late shipwrack, they row to Panormus, or Palerma, the chief City of the Africans in Sicily, and surround it by Land and Water: after a while they take it, and leaving a Garrison therein, return to Rome.

Very desirous the Romans were to be doing in Africa to which purpose they employed C. Scervilius, and C. Sempronius, their Consuls. But these wrought no wonders. Some spoil they made upon the coasts of Africa; but Fortune robbed them of all their gettings. For in their return, they were first set upon the sands, and like to have perished, near unto the lesser Syrtes, where they were fain to heave all over-board, that so they might get off: then, having with much ado doubled the Cape of Lilybæum, in their passage from Panormus towards Italy, they lost an hundred and fifty of their ships by foul weather. A greater discouragement never Nation had; the god of the wars favoured them no more, than the god of the waters afflicted them. Of all that Mars enriched them with upon the Land, Neptune robbed them upon the Seas. For they had now lost, besides what they lost in fight, four hundred and six Ships and Gallies, with all the munition and Souldiers transported in them.

The exceeding damage hereby received, perswaded them to give over their Navigation, and their fight by Sea, and to send only a Land-army into Sicily, under L. Cæcilius, and F. Furius, their Consuls. These they transport in some threecore ordinary passage boats, by the Straights of Messana, that are not above a mile and a half broad from land to land. In like sort, the overthrow which Attilius received in Africa, occasioned chiefly by the Elephants, made them less choicerick against the Carthaginians, than before; so that for two years after, they kept the high and woody grounds, not daring to fight in the fair and champion Countreys. But this late resolution of forsaking the Seas lasted not long. For it was impossible for them to succour those places which they held in Sicily, without a Navy, much less to maintain the War in Africa. For, whereas the Romans were to send forces from Messana to Eggesta, to Lilybæum, and to other places in the extrem West parts of Sicily, making sometime a march of above an hundred and forty English mile by land, which could not be performed without an Army, and the provisions that follow it, in less than 14. dayes; the Carthaginians would pass it with their Gallies, in eight and forty hours.

An old example we have, of that great advantage of transporting Armies by water, between Canninus, and Edmund Ironside. For Canninus, when he had entred the Thames with his Navy and Army, and could not prevail against London, suddenly imbarqued; and sailing to the West, landed in Dorset-shire, so drawing Edmund and his Army thither. There finding ill entertainment, he again shipst his men, and entred the Severn, making Edmund to march after him, to the succour of Worcester-shire, by him greatly spoiled. But when he had Edmund there, he sailed back again to London: by means whereof, he both wearied the King, and spoiled where he pleased, ere succour could arrive. And this was not the least help, which the Netherlands have had, against the Spaniards, in the defence of their liberty, that being Masters of the Sea, they could pass their Army from place to place, unwearied, and entire, with all the Munition and Artillery belonging unto it, in the tenth part of the time, wherein their enemies have been able to do it. Of this an instance or two. The Count Maurice of Nassau, now living, one of the greatest Captains, and of the worthiest Princes, that either the present or preceding Ages have brought forth, in the year 1590. carryed his Army by Sea, with forty Canons to Breda: making countenance either to besiege Boisleduc, or Geytrivenden Berg; which the enemy (in prevention) filled with Souldiers, and victuals. But as soon as the wind served, he suddenly set sail, arriving in the mouth of the Menne, turned up the Rhine, and thence to Issel, and late down before Zutphen. So before the Spaniards could march over land round about Holland, above fourscore mile, and over many great Rivers, with their Cannon and carriage, Zutphen was taken. Again, when the Spanish Army had overcome this wearisome march, and were now far from home, Prince Maurice, making countenance to sail up the Rhine, changed his course in the night, and sailing down the stream, he was set down before Hulst in Brabant, ere the Spaniards had knowledge what was become of him. So this Town he also took, before the Spanish Army could return. Lastly, the Spanish Army was no sooner arrived in Brabant, than the Prince Maurice, well attended by his good fleet, having fortified Hulst, fell sail again, and presented himself before Nymegen in Gelders, a City of notable importance, and mastered it.

And to say the truth; it is impossible for any maritime Countrey, not having the coasts admirably fortified, to defend it self against a powerful enemy, that is master of the Sea. Hereof I had rather, that Spain than England should be an example. Let it therefore be supposed, that King Philip the second had fully resolved to hinder Sir John

Norris

Norris in the year 1589. from presenting Don Antonio, King of Portugal, before the gates of Lysborn; and that he would have kept off the English, by power of his land-forces; as being too weak at Sea, through the great overthrow of his mighty Armado, by the fleet of Queen Elizabeth, in the year foregoing. Surely, it had not been hard for him, to prepare an Army, that should be able to resist our eleven thousand. But where should this his Army have been bestowed? If about Lysborn; then would it have been easie unto the English, to take, ransack, and burn the Town of Croin, and to waste the Country round about it. For the great and threatening preparations of the Earl of Alenteira, the Marquels of Sebalva, and others did not hinder them from performing all this. Neither did the hasty levy of eight thousand under the Earl of Andrada, serve to more effect, than the increase of honour to Sir John Norris, and his Associates: considering that the English charged these, at Puente de Burgos, and passing the great Bridge, behind which they lay, that was flanked with shot, and barricadoed at the further end, routed them, took their camp; took their General standard with the Kings Arms, and pursued them over all the Country, which they fired. If a Royal Army, and not (as this was) a Company of private adventurers, had thus begun the war in Galicia, I think it would have made the Spaniards to quit the guard of their St. Jago's, whose Temple was not far from the danger. But, had they held their first resolution, as knowing, that Sir John Norris his main intent was, to bring Don Antonio, with an Army into his Kingdom, whilst coming strong, he expected to be readily and joyfully welcomed: could they have hindered his landing in Portugal? Did not he land at Peniche, and march over the Country to Lysborn, six dayes journey? Did not he (when all Don Antonio his promises failed) pass along by the River of Lysborn to Calisalva, and there, having won the Fort, quietly imbarque his men, and depart? But these, though no more than an handful, yet were they Englishmen. Let us consider of the matter it self; what another Nation might do, even against England, in landing an Army, by advantage of a fleet, if we had none. This question, Whether an invading Army may be resisted at their landing upon the coast of England, were there no fleet of ours at the Sea to impeach it; is already handled by a learned Gentleman of our Nation, in his observations upon Cæsars

Commentaries, that maintains the affirmative. This he holds only upon supposition; in absence of our shipping: and comparatively, as that it is a more safe and easie course, to defend all the coast of England, than to suffer any enemy to land, and afterwards to fight with him. Surely I hold with him, that it is the best way, to keep our enemies from treading upon our ground; wherein, if we fail, then must we seek to make him will, that he had stayed at his own home. In such a case, if it should happen, our judgements are to weigh many particular circumstances, that belongs not unto this discourse. But making the question general, and positive. Whether England, without the help of her fleet, be able to debar an enemy from landing; I hold that it is unable so to do: and therefore I think it most dangerous to make the adventure. For the encouragement of a first victory to an enemy, and the discouragement of being beaten to the invaded, may draw after it almost perilous consequence.

It is true, that the Marshal Montec, in his Commentaries, doth greatly complain, that by his wanting forces, wherewith to have kept the frontier of Guyenne, they of the Protestant Religion, after the battel of Moncontour, entred that Country, and gathered great strength and relief thence; so for if the King (saith he) would have given me but reasonable means, j'en eusse bien gardé à Monsieur l'Admiral de faire boire ses Chevaux en la Garonne; I would have kept the Admiral from watering his horses in the River of Garonne. Monsieur de Lungey, on the contrary side, prefers the not fighting upon a frontier with an invading enemy, and commends the delay; which course the Constable of France held against the Emperour Charles, when he invaded Provence. Great difference I know there is, and a diverse consideration to be had, between such a country as France is, strengthened with many fortified places: and this of ours, where our Rampars are but of the bodies of wien. And it was of invasions upon firm land, that these great Captains spake: whose entrances cannot be uncertain. But our question is of an Army to be transported over Sea; and to be landed again in an enemies country, and the place left to the choice of the invader. Hereunto I say, That such an Army cannot be resisted on the coast of England, without a fleet to impeach it; no, nor on the coast of France, or any other Countrey; except every Creek, Port, or sandy Bay, had a powerful Army, in each of them, to make opposition. For let his whole supposition be granted; granted; That Kent is able to furnish twelve thousand foot, and that those twelve thousand be layed in the three best landing places within that Country, to wit, three thousand at Margat, three thousand at the Nesse, and 6000. at Foulkstone, that is somewhat equally distant from them both; as also that two of these troops (unless some other order be thought more fit) be directed to strengthen the third, when they shall see the enemies fleet to bend towards it: I say, that notwithstanding this provision, if the enemy, setting sail from the Isle of Wight, in the first watch of the night, and towing their long boats at their sterns, shall arrive by dawn of day at the Nesse, and thrust their Army on shore there; it will be hard for those three thousand that are at Margat, (twenty and four long miles from thence) to come time enough to re-enforce their fellows at the Nesse. Nay, how shall they at Foulkstone be able to do it, who are nearer by more than half the way? seeing that the enemy, at his first arrival, will either make his entrance by force, with three or four hundred shot of great Artillery, and quickly put the first three thousand, that were intrenched at the Nesse, to run; or else give them so much to do, that they shall be glad to fend for help to Foulkstone, and perhaps to Margat: whereby those places will be left bare. Now let us suppose, that all the twelve thousand Kentish Souldiers arrive at the Nesse, ere the enemy can be ready to dis-embarque his Army, so that he will find it unsafe, to land in the face of so many, prepared to withstand him; yet must we believe, that he will play the best of his own game; (having liberty to go which way he list) under covert of the night, set sail towards the East, where what shall hinder him to take ground, either at Margat, the Downes, or elsewhere, before they at the Nesse can be well aware of his departure? Certainly, there is nothing more easie than to do it. Yea, the like may be said of Waymouth, Portbeck, Poole, and of all landing places on the South Coast. For there is no man ignorant, that ships, without putting themselves out of breath, will easily out-run the Souldiers that coast them. Les armées ne volent point en poste, Armes neither flye, nor run poss, saith a Marshal of France. And I know it to be true, that a fleet of ships may be seen at Sun-set, and after it, at the Lizard; yet by the next morning they may recover Portland; whereas an Army of foot shall not be able to march it in six dayes. Again, when those troops lodged on the Sea-shores, shall be forced to run from place to place in vain, after a fleet of ships; they will at length sit down in the mid-way; and leave all at adventure. But say it were otherwise; that the invading enemy will offer to land in some such place, where there shall be an Army of ours ready to receive him; yet it cannot be doubted, but that when the choice of all our Trained Bands, and the choice of our Commanders and Captains, shall be drawn together (as they were at Tilbury in the year 1588.) to attend the person of the Prince, and for the defence of the City of London: they that remain to guard the coast can be of no such force, as to encounter an Army like unto that wherewith it was intended, that the Prince of Parma should have landed in England.

The Isle of Terceira hath taught us by experience, what to think in such a case. There are not many Islands in the world, better fenced by nature, and strengthened by art; it being every where hard of access; having no good harbour wherein to shelter a Navy of friends, and upon every cove or watering place a Fort erected, to forbid the approach of an enemies boat. Yet when Emanuel de Sylva, and Monsieur de Châties, that held it to the use of Don Antonio, with five or six thousand men, thought to have kept the Marques of Santa Cruz, from setting foot on ground therein; the Marques having shewed himself in the Road of Aveira, did set sail, ere any was aware of it, and arrived at the Port des Moles, far distant from thence, where he wan a Fort, and landed ere Monsieur de Châties, running thither in vain, could come to hinder him. The example of Philip strossie, slain the year before, without all regard of his worth, and of three hundred French prisoners murdered in cold blood; had instructed de Châties, and his followers, what they might expect at that Marques his hands: Therefore it is not like, that they were slow in carrying in relief to Port des Moles. Whether our English would be perswaded to make such diligent haste, from Margat to the Nesse, and back again, it may be doubted. Sure I am, that it were a greater march than all the length of Terceira; whereas the French-men had not measured the one half when they found themselves prevented by the more nimble Ships of Spain.

This may suffice to prove, that a strong Army, in a good fleet, which neither foot, nor horse is able to follow, cannot be denied to land where it list, in England, France, or elsewhere, unless it be hindered; encountered, and thrust together, by a fleet of equal or answerable strength.

The

The difficult landing of our English, at Fayal, in the year 1597. is alledged against this: which example moves me no way to think, that a large Coast may be defended against a strong Fleet. I landed those English in Fayal my self, and therefore ought to take notice of this instance. For whereas I find an Adion of mine cited, with omission of my name; I may, by a civil interpretation, think, that there was no purpose to defraud me of any honour; but rather an opinion, that the enterprize was such, or so ill managed, as that no honour could be due unto it. There were indeed some which were in that voyage, who advised me not to undertake it: and I hearkened unto them somewhat longer than was requisite, especially, whilst they desired me to reserve the title of such an exploit (though it were not great) for a greater person. But when they began to tell me of difficulty; I gave them to understand, the same which I now maintain, that it was more difficult to defend a coast, than to invade it. The truth is, that I could have landed my men with more ease than I did; yea, without finding any resistance, if I would have rowed to another place; yea even there where I landed, if I would have taken more company to help me. But, without fearing any imputation of rashness, I may say, that I had more regard of reputation in that business, than of safety. For I thought it to belong unto the honour of our Prince and Nation, that a few Islanders should not think any advantage great enough, against a Fleet set forth by Elizabeth; and further, I was unwilling, that some Low-Country Captains, and others, not of mine own Squadron, whose assistance I had refused, should please themselves with a sweet conceit (though it would have been shore, when I had landed in some other place) that for want of their help I was driven to turn tail. Therefore I took with me none, but men assured, Commanders of mine own Squadron, with some of their followers, and a few other Gentlemen, volunteers, whom I could not refuse, as, Sir William Brooke, Sir William Harcey, Sir Arthur Gorges, Sir John Skot, Sir Thomas Ridgeway, Sir Henry Times, Sir Charles Morgan, Sir Walter Clute, Marcellus Throckmorton, Captain Laurence Kemis, Captain William Morgan, and others such as well understood themselves and the enemy: by whose help, with Gods favour, I made good the enterprize I undertook. As for the working of the Sea, the steepness of the Cliffs, and other troubles that were not new to us, we overcame them well enough. And these (notwithstanding) made five or six companies of the enemies, that sought to impeach our landing, abandon the wall, whereon their Muskettiers lay on the Rest for us, and won the place of them without any great loss. This I could have done with less danger, so that it should not have served for example of a Rule, that failed even in this example: but the reasons before alledged, (together with other reasons well known to some of the Gentlemen above-named, though more private than to be here laid down) made me rather follow the way of bravery, and take the shorter course; having it still in mine own power to fall off when I should think it meet. It is easily said, that the Enemy was more than a Coward; (which yet was more than we knew) neither will I magnifie such a small piece of service, by seeking to prove him better: whom had I thought equal to mine own followers, I would otherwise have dealt with. But for so much as concerns the proposition in hand, he that beheld this, may well remember that the same enemy troubled us more in our march towards Fayal, than in our raking the shore; that he sought how to stop us in place of his advantage, that many of our men were slain or hurt by him, among whom Sir Arthur Gorges was shot in that march; and that such, as (thinking all danger to be past, when he had won good footing) would needs follow us to the Town, were driven by him, to forsake the pace of a man of war, and betake themselves to an hasty trot.

For end of this Digression, I hope that this question shall never come to tryal; his Majesties many movable Forts will forbid the experience. And although the English will no less disdain, than any Nation under Heaven can do, to be beaten upon their own ground, or elsewhere by a forain enemy; yet to entertain those that shall assail us, with their own Bief in their bellies, and before they eat of our Kentish Capons, I take it to be the wisest way. To do which, his Majesty after God, will employ his good ships on the Sea, and not trust to any intrenchment upon the shore.

§. X.

How the Romans attempt again to get the Mastery of the Seas. The Victory of Cæcilius the Roman Consul at Panormus: The siege of Lilybæum. How a Rhodian Gally entered Lilybæum at pleasure, in despite of the Roman Fleet. That it is a matter of great difficulty to stop the passage of good ships. The Romans, by reason of grievous losses recovered under Claudius and Junius their Consuls, abandon the Seas again.

When, without a strong Navy, the Romans found it altogether impossible, either to keep what they had already gotten in Sicily, or to enlarge their Dominions in Africa, or elsewhere; they resolved once again, notwithstanding their late misadventures, to strengthen their Fleet: and Ships of war. So causing fifty new Gallies to be built, and the old to be repaired, they gave them in charge (together with certain Legions of Souldiers) to the new Consuls, C. Attilius, and L. Manlius. On the other side, Asdrubal perceiving that the Romans, partly by reason of the shipwreck which they had lately suffered, partly by reason of the overthrow which they received by Xanthippus in Africa, were less daring than they had been in the beginning of the war: and withal, that one of the Consuls was returned into Italy, with the one half of the Army, and that Cæcilius, with only the other half, remained at Panormus; he removed with the Carthaginian forces from Lilybæum towards it, hoping to provoke Cæcilius to fight. But the Consul was better advised. For when Asdrubal had made his approaches somewhat near the Town, Cæcilius caused a deep trench to be cut, a good distance without the ditch of the City: between which and his trench he left ground sufficient, to embattel a Legion of his Souldiers. To these he gave order that they should advance themselves, and pass over the new trench, till such time as the African Elephants were thrust upon them. From those beasts he commanded them to retire by slow degrees till they had drawn on the Elephants to the brink of the new trench, which they could by no means pass. This they performed accordingly. For when the Elephants were at a stand, they were so gawled and beaten, both by those Souldiers that were on the inside of the trench, and by those that lay in the trench it self, that being injured by their many wounds, they brake back furiously upon their own foot-men, and utterly disordered them. Cæcilius espying his advantages, called with all the force he had; and charging the other troops, that stood embattailed, he utterly brake them, and put them to their heels; making a great slaughter of them, and taking all their Elephants.

The report of this Victory being brought to Rome; the whole State filled with courage, prepared a new Fleet of two hundred sail, which they sent into Sicily, to give end to that war, that had now lasted fourteen years. With this Fleet and Army the Romans resolved to attempt Lilybæum, the only place of importance which the Carthaginians held in Sicily; and all (indeed) save Drepanum, that was near adjoining. They set down before it, and possessed themselves of all the places of advantage near unto it, especially of such as command the Haven, which had a very difficult entrance. They also beset to the ground six Towers of defence; and by forcible engines weaken to many other parts of the City, as the defendants begin to despair. Yet Himilco, Commander of the place, faileth not in all that belongs to a man of War. All that is broken he repaireth with admirable diligence; he maketh many furious sallies, and giveth to the Romans all the affronts that possibly could be made. He hath in Garrison (besides the Citizens) ten thousand Souldiers; among which there are certain Lieutenants, and other petty officers, that conspire to render and betray the Town. But the matter is revealed by an Achean, called Alexon, who had formerly in danger of the like treason, saved Agrigentum. Himilco useth the help of Alexon, to assure the hired Souldiers, and employs Hannibal to appease the troops of the Gauls, which did waver, and had sent their agents to the enemy. All promise constancy and truth; so that the Traitors, being unable to perform what they had undertaken, are fain to live in the Roman Camp as fugitives: that had wrought no good whereby to deserve their bread. In the mean while, a supply of ten thousand Souldiers is sent from Carthage to their relief, having Hannibal the Son of Amilcar for their Conductor: who, in despite of all resistance, entered the Port and City, to the incredible joy of the besieged. The old Souldiers, together with the new Companies, (thereto perswaded by Himilco with hope of great reward) resolved to set upon the Romans in their trenches, and either force them to abandon the siege, or (at least) to take from them, or set on fire their engines of battery. The attempt is presently made, and pursued to the uttermost, with great slaughter on both sides. But the Romans, being more in number, and having the

the advantage of the ground, hold still their places, and with extreme difficulty defend their engines.

They of Carthage desire greatly to understand the state of things at Lilybæum; but know not how to send into the Town. A certain Rhodian undertakes the service; and having received his dispatch, sails with one Gally to Agusa, a little Island near Lilybæum. Thence, taking his time he steered directly with the Port; and having a passing swift Gally, he past through the best of the Channel, and recovered the water-gate ere any of those which the Romans had to guard the Port, could thrust from the shores on either side.

The next day, neither attending the covert of the dark night, nor dreading to be boarded by the Roman Gallies, who waited his return, he set sail, and shipped his Oars (his Gally being exceeding quick of steerage, and himself expert in all parts of the Channel) recovered the Havens mouth, and the Sea, in despite of all the pursuit made after him. Then, finding himself out of danger of being encompassed by many, he turned again towards the mouth of the Haven, challenging any one, if any one durst come forth to undertake him. This enterprise, and the well performing of it, was very remarkable, and much wondered at in those days: and yet, where there was no great Artillery, nor any other weapons of fire, to kill afar off, the adventure which this Rhodian made was not greatly hazardous. For in this Age, a valiant and judicious man of war will not fear to pass by the best appointed Fort of Europe, with the help of a good Tide, and a leading gale of wind: no, though forty pieces of great Artillery open their mouths against him, and threaten to tear him in pieces.

In the beginning of our late Queens time, when Denmark and Sweden were at war, our East-land Fleet, bound for Liff-land, was forbidden by the King of Denmark to trade with the subjects of his enemies, and he threatened to sink their ships if they came through the straits of Elfenour. Notwithstanding this, our Merchants (having a ship of her Majesties, called the Minion to defend them) made the adventure, and sustaining some Volleys of shot, kept on their course. The King made all the provision he could to stop them, or sink them at their return. But the Minion, commanded (as I take it) by William Burrough, leading the way, did not only pass out with little loss, but did beat down, with Artillery, a great part of the Fort of Elfenour; which at that time was not so well rampard, as now perhaps it is: and the Fleet of Merchants that followed him, went through without any wound received. Neither was it long, since that the Duke of Parma, believing Antwerp, and finding no possibility to master it, otherwise than by famine, laid his Cannon on the bank of the River, so well to purpose, and so even with the face of the Water, that he thought it impossible for the least boat to pass by. Yet the Hollanders and Zealanders, not blown up by any wind of glory, but coming to find a good market for their Butter and Cheese, even the poor men, attending their profit when all things were extreme dear in Antwerp, passed in boats of ten or twelve Tun, by the mouth of the Dukes Cannon, in despite of it; when a strong Westerly wind, and a Tide of flood favoured them; as also with a contrary wind, and an ebbing water, they turned back again: so as he was forced, in the end, to build his Stockado overthwart the River, to his marvellous trouble and charge.

The Fort Saint Philip terrified not us in the year 1596. when we entered the Port of Caliz, neither did the Fort at Puntal, when we were entered, beat us from our anchoring by it; though it plaid upon us with four demi-cannons within point-blank, from six in the morning till twelve at noon. The siege of Ostend, and of many other places, may be given for proof, how hard a matter it is to stop the passage of a good ship, without another as good to encounter it. Yet this is true, that where a Fort is so set, as that of Angra in Tercera, that there is no passage along beside it, or that the ships are driven to turn upon a bow-line towards it, wanting all help of wind and tide; there, and in such places, it is of great use, and fearful: otherwise not.

But to return to our adventurous Rhodian: He arrives in safety at Carthage, and makes them know the estate of Lilybæum. Others also, after this, take upon them to do the like, and perform it with the same success. The Romans therefore labour to choak the Channel; and, for that purpose, fill many Merchants ships with great stones, and sink them therein. The force of the Tides clears it again in part: but they grounded so many of those great belied-boats in the best of the entrance, as at last it made manifest rising and heap, like a ragged hill in the passage. Hereby it came to pass, that a Carthaginian Gally, taking her course at night, and not suspecting any such impediment, ran her self aground thereon.

was taken. Now comes that brave Rodian, thinking to enter, as he had done before: but this Carthaginian Gally, a little before taken, gave him chase, and gathered upon him, he finds what she is, both by her form, and by her swiftness: and being not able to run from her, resolved to fight with her. But she is too well manned for him, so that he is beaten and taken.

Lilybaum, after this, is greatly distressed, the Souldiers being worn with labour and watching. But in this despair there rose so violent a tempest, as some of the Romans Wooden-Towers, by which they overtopped the walls of Lilybaum, were overturned. A Greek Souldier undertakes to fire those that were fallen, and performs it: for the fire was no sooner kindled, but being blown unto by the bellows of a tempest, it increased so fast, as it became irresistible, and in the end burned all to ashes, and melted the brazen heads of the battering Rams; Herupon, despair and weariness hinder the Romans from repairing their Engines: so that they resolve, by a long siege, to starve the defendants.

Upon relation of what had past, a supply of ten thousand Souldiers is sent from Rome, under M. Claudius, the Consul. He arrives at Messana, and marcheth over Land to Lilybaum: where having re-inforced the Army, and supplied the Gallies with new Rowers, he propounds the surprise of Drepanum, a City on the other side of the Bay of Lilybaum. This service the Captains and Souldiers willingly embrace. So the Consul embarks his troops, and arrives on the sudden in the mouth of the Port. Adherbal is Governour of the Town, a valiant and prudent man of war, who being ignorant of the new supply arrived at Lilybaum, was at first amazed at their sudden approach; but having recovered his spirits, he persuades the Souldiers rather to fight abroad, than to be enclosed. Herewithall he promiseth great rewards to such, as by their valour shall deserve them; offering to lead them himself, and to fight in the head of his Fleet. Having sufficiently encouraged his men, he thrust into the Sea towards the Romans. The Consul, deceived of his expectation, calls back the foremost Gallies, that he might now Marshall them for defence. Herupon some row backward, some forward, in great confusion. Adherbal finds and follows his advantage, and forceth the Consul into a Bay at hand, wherein he rangeth himself, having the Land on his back: hoping thereby to keep himself from being compassed. But he was thereby, and for want of Sea-room, so straitened, as he could not turn himself any way from his enemies, nor range himself in any order. Therefore when he found no hope of resistance, keeping the shore on his left hand, he thrust out of the Bay with thirty Gallies, besides his own, and so fled away: all the rest of his Fleet, to the number of ninety and four ships, were taken or sunk by the Carthaginians. Adherbal for this service is greatly honoured at Carthage; and Claudius, for his indiscretion and flight, as much disgraced at Rome.

The Romans, notwithstanding this great loss, arm threecore Gallies, with which they send away L. Junius, their Consul, to take charge of their business in Sicily. Junius arrives at Messana, where he meets with the whole remainder of the Roman Fleet, whose exception which rode in the Port of Lilybaum. One hundred and twenty Gallies he had; and besides these, he had gotten together almost eight hundred ships of burthen, which were laden with all necessary provisions for the Army. With this great Fleet he arrives at Syracuse, where he stays a while, partly to take in Corn, partly to wait for some that were too slow of sail to keep company with him along from Messana. In the mean time he dispatcheth away towards Lilybaum his Quellers or Treasurers; to whom he commits the one half of his victuallers, with some Gallies for their Convoy.

Adherbal was not careless after his late victory: but studied how to use it to the best advantage. The ships and prisoners that he had taken, he sent to Carthage. Of his own Gallies he delivered thirty to Carthalo, who had threecore and ten more under his own charge; and sent him to try what good might be done against the Roman Fleet in the Haven of Lilybaum. According to his direction, Carthalo suddenly enters the mouth of that Haven, where he finds the Romans more attentive to the keeping in of the besieged Carthaginians, than to the defence of their own against another Fleet. So he chargeth them, boards, and takes some, and fires therewith. The Roman Camp takes alarm, and hastens to the rescue. But Himilco, Governour of the Town, is not behind hand; who falls out at the same time, and putting the Romans to great distress, gives Carthalo good leisure to go through with his enterprise.

After this exploit, Carthalo ran all along the South coast of Sicily, devising how to work mischief to the enemy; wherein Fortune presented him with a fair occasion, which he wisely managed. He was advertised tified by his Scouts, that they had discovered, near at hand, a great fleet, consisting of all manner of Vessels. These were the victuallers, which the Consul Junius, more hastily than providently, had sent before him towards Lilybaum. Carthalo was glad to hear of their coming: for he and his men were full of courage, by reason of their late victories. Accounting therefore the great multitude of Roman Hulks, approaching, to be rather a prey than a fleet likely to make strong opposition, he hastens to encounter them. It fell out according to his expectation. The Romans had no mind to fight: but were glad to seek shelter in an open Road, full of Rocks under the covert of a poor Town, belonging to their party; that could help to save them only from the present danger, by lending them engines and other aid, wherewith to beat off the Carthaginians that assailed them. Carthalo therefore, having taken a few of them, lay waiting for the rest; that could not long ride under those Rocks, but would be forced by any great change of wind, either to put out into the deep, or to save their men how they could, by taking land, with the loss of all their shipping. Whilst he was busy in this care, the Consul Junius drew near, and was discovered. Against him Carthalo makes out, and finds him altogether unprepared to fight as being wholly ignorant of that which had happened. The Consul had neither means to fly, nor ability to fight. Therefore he likewise ran into a very dangerous Creek; thinking no danger to great as that of the enemy. The Carthaginian seeing this, betakes himself to a station between the two Roman fleets; where he watcheth, to see which of them would first stir, with a resolution to assault that, which should first dare to put it self into the Sea. So as now all the three fleets were on the South coast of Sicily, between the Promontory of Pachinus and Lilybaum; a Tract exceeding dangerous, when the wind stormed at South. The Carthaginians, who knew the times of tempest, and their signs, finding (belike) some swelling billow (for so we do in the West of England, before a Southern storm) halted to double the Cape of Pachinus, thereby to cover themselves from the rage at hand. But the Romans, who knew better how to fight than how to Navigate, and never found any foul weather in the entrails of their beasts, their South-fayers being all land-Propethers, were suddenly overtaken with a boisterous South-wind, and all the Gallies forced against the rocks, and utterly wracked.

This calamity so discouraged the Romans, that they resolved again to forsake the Seas, and trust only to the service of their Legions upon firm ground. But such a resolution cannot long hold. Either they must be strong at Sea, or else they must not make war in an Island, against those that have a mightier fleet. Yet are they to be excused, in regard of the many great calamities which they had suffered through their want of skill. Here I cannot forbear to commend the patient virtue of the Spaniards. We seldom or never find, that any Nation hath endured so many misadventures and miseries, as the Spaniards have done, in their Indian Discoveries. Yet persisting in their enterprizes with an invincible constancy, they have annexed to their Kingdom so many goodly Provinces, as bury the remembrance of all dangers past. Tempests and shipwracks, famine, overthows, mutinies, heat and cold, pestilence, and all manner of diseases both old and new, together with extreme poverty, and want of all things needful, have been the enemies wherewith every one of their most noble discoverers, at one time or other, hath encountered. Many years have passed over some of their heads in the search of not so many leagues: yea more than one or two have spent their labour, their wealth, and their lives, in search of a golden Kingdom, without getting further notice of it, than what they had at their first setting forth. All which notwithstanding, the third, fourth, and fifth undertakers, have not been disheartened. Surely, they are worthily rewarded with those Treasures and Paradises which they enjoy; and well they deserve to hold them quietly, if they hinder not the like virtues in others, which (perhaps) will not be found.

§. XI.

The City of Eryx is surprised by the Romans, and recovered by Amilcar, who stoutly holds war with them five years. The Romans, having emptied their common treasury, build a new fleet at the charges of private men. The great victory at Sea of Lucatius the Consul; whereby the Carthaginians are forced to crave peace. The conditions of the peace between Rome and Carthage.

THE Romans were careful to supply with all industry, by land, the want of strength at Sea. Therefore they continue the siege of Lilybaum, and seek to make sure to themselves all places, whither the enemies ships could not bring relief. The Consul Junius, to cure the wound of dishonour, which he had received, be thought him what enterprises to undertake. In the end he resolved to attempt the Mountain and City of Eryx, with the Temple of Venus Erycina: which was the fairest and richest of all the Island; and of these, by cunning or treason, he got possession. Eryx was commodiously seated between Drepanum and Panormus; so that it seemed a fit place for a Garrison, that should restrain the Carthaginians from making roads into the Country. Wherefore Junius fortified both the top of the Mountain, and the first entrance of the passage from the bottom, (both of which places were very defensible) with a good strength of men. But shortly after, in the eighteenth year of this war, the Carthaginians set forth Amilcar, surnamed Barcas, Father of the great Hannibal, with a Fleet and Army, who sailing to the coasts of Italy, did thoroughly repay the spoils which the Romans made in Africa. For he first of all wasted and destroyed the Territories of the Locrians, and of the Bruttians, that were dependants of Rome. Then entered he into Sicily, and finding there no walled City in the Carthaginians power, that served fitly to insult the Romans, he occupied a piece of ground of great advantage, and lodged his Army thereon; to confront as well the Romans, that were in Panormus, as those that kept about Eryx, putting himself between both Armies with admirable resolution.

The place that Amilcar had seized upon, was not only very strong by situation, but had the command of a Port: whereby it gave him opportunity to scour all the coast of Italy with his Fleet, waiting all along as far as to Cuma. In the Isle of Sicily he held the Romans to hard work, lying near unto Panormus: where in three years abode, he did many notable acts, though not of much consequence, for that the enemy could never be drawn to hazard the main chance. Having wearied himself and the Romans long enough about Panormus, he undertook a strange piece of work at Eryx. The Roman Garrisons, placed there by Junius, on the top, and at the bottom of the Mountain, were very strongly lodged. Nevertheless Amilcar found a way, lying towards the Sea-side, by which he conveyed his men into the City of Eryx, that was about the midst of the ascent, ere the enemy knew of it. By this it came to pass, that the Romans which kept the top of the mountain, were straightly held (as it were) besieged. And no less was Amilcar himself restrained, by both of these Garrisons, and such as came to relieve them. There he found them pastime about two years more, hoping still to weary out those that lay over his head, as they on the contrary did their best, to thrust him out of those quarters.

At this time, all the care, both of the Romans and of the Carthaginians, was bent unto the prosecuting of this business at Eryx. Wherein it seems true (as Hannibal at Liue, spake unto Scipio) that the affairs of Carthage never stood in better terms, since the beginning of the war, than now they did. For whereas the Romans had utterly forsaken the Seas, partly by reason of their great losses; partly upon confidence of their land-forces, which they held refitless; Amilcar, with a small Army, had so well acquitted himself, to the honour of his Country, that by the trial of five years war, the Carthaginian Soldier was judged equal, if not superior to the Roman. Finally, when all, that might be, had been devised and done, for the dislodging of this obstinate Warrior: no way seemed better to the Senate of Rome, than once again to build a fleet; whereby, if the mastery of the Sea could once be gotten, it was likely that Amilcar, for lack of supply, should not long be able to hold out. But in performing this, extreme difficulty was found. The common treasury was exhausted: and the cost was not little, that was requisite unto such an enterprise. Wherefore there was none other way left, than to lay the burden upon private purses. Divers of the principal Citizens undertook to build (each at his own charges) one Quinquereme, which example wrought so well, that they, whose ability would not serve to do the like, joyned with some others, and laying their money together, concurred two or three of them, in building of another; with condition to be repayed, when the war was finished. By this voluntary contribution, they made and finished two hundred new Quinqueremes: taking for their pattern, that excellent shift rowing Gally which they had gotten from the Rhodian, in the Port of Libeum, as was shewed before. The charge of this fleet was committed to C. Lutatius Catulus; who past with the same into Sicily the Spring following; and entered the Port of Drepanum; endeavouring by all means to have forced the City. But being advertised that the Carthaginian fleet was at hand, and being mindful of the late losses which his Predecessors had received; he was careful to put himself in order, against their arrival.

Hanno was Admiral of the Carthaginian fleet; a man (as his actions declare him) wife

in picture, exceedingly formal, and skilful in the art of seeming reverend. How his reputation was first bred, I do not find; but it was upheld by a factious contradiction, of things undertaken by men more worthy than himself. This quality procured unto him (as it hath done to many others) both good liking among the ancient sort, whose cold temper is averse from new enterprises; and therewithall an opinion of great foresight, confirmed by every loss received. More particularly, he was gracious among the people, for that he was one of the most grievous oppressors of their subject Provinces; whereby he procured unto the Carthaginians much wealth, but therewithall such hatred, as turned it all to their great loss. He had ere this been employed against the Numidians and wild Africans, that were more like to Rovers than to Souldiers, in making War. Of those fugitive Nations he learned to neglect more manly enemies, to his own great dishonour, and to the great hurt of Carthage; which lost not more by his bad conduct, than by his malicious counsel, when, having shewed himself an unworthy Captain, he betook himself to the long Robe. Yet is he much commended in Roman Histories, as a temperate man, and one that studied how to preserve the League between Carthage and Rome. In which regard, how well he deserved of his own Country, it will appear hereafter: how beneficial he was to the Romans, it will appear, both hereafter, and in his present voyage; wherein he reduced the Carthaginians to a miserable necessity of accepting, upon hard conditions, that peace which he thenceforth commended.

Hanno had very well furnished his Navy, with all needful provisions for the Souldiers at Eryx (for dexterity in making preparation was the best of his qualities): but he had neither been careful in training his Mariners, to the practice of Sea-fight, nor in manning his Gallies with stout fellows. He thought, that the same of a Carthaginian fleet was enough, to make the unexpert Romans give way: forgetting, that rather the refitless force of tempests, than any other strength of opposition, had made them to forsake the Seas. Yet in one thing he had either conceived aright, or else was sent forth well instructed. It was his purpose, first of all to sail to Eryx, and there to discharge his ships of their lading: and having thus lightened himself, he meant to take aboard some part of the Land-army, together with Amilcar himself, by whose helpe he doubted not, but that he should be able to make his enemy repent of his new adventure to Sea. This was a good course, if it could have been performed. But Catulus used all possible diligence, to prevent the execution of this design: not because he was informed of the enemies purpose, but that he knew it to be the best for them, and for that he feared no danger so greatly, as to encounter with Amilcar. Wherefore although the weather was very rough, and the Seas went high, when the Carthaginian fleet was despatched; yet he rather chose to fight with the enemy, that had the wind of him, than to suffer his convoy to pass along to Eryx, upon unlikely hope of better opportunity in the future. All that Hanno should have done, Catulus had performed. He had carefully exercised his men in Rowing; he had lightened his Gallies of all unnecessary burthens, and he had taken aboard the choicest men of the Roman Land-Souldiers. The Carthaginians therefore, at the first encounter were utterly broken and defeated, having fifty of their Gallies stemmed and sunk, and seventy taken, wherein were few less than ten thousand men, that were all made prisoners: the rest, by a sudden change of wind, escaping to the Isle of Sicily.

The state of Carthage, utterly discouraged by this change of fortune, knew not whereon to resolve. Means to repair their fleet in any time, there were none left; their best men of war by Sea were consumed; and Amilcar, upon whose valour and judgement the honour and safety of the Common-weal rested, was now surrounded by his enemies in Sicily, where he could not be relieved. In this extremity, they make dispatch unto Amilcar himself, and authorized him to take what course should seem best unto his excellent wisdom, leaving all conclusions to his election and sole counsel.

Amilcar, whom no adversity, accompanied with the least hope or possibility of recovery, had ever vanquished, looking over every promise, true or false, that the present time could make him, (for to attend any thing from the future he was not able) resolved to make trial, whether his necessity might be compounded upon any reasonable terms. He therefore sent to Lutatius the Consul an overture of peace: who considering it well, gathered so many arguments from the present poverty of the Roman State, waited beyond expectation in the former war, that he formerly hardened unto it. So in conclusion, an accord was made, but with provision, That it should hold none otherwise, than if the Senate and People of Rome would ratify it with their allowance.

The

The conditions were: First, that the Carthaginians should clearly abandon the Isle of Sicily. Secondly, that they should never undertake upon Hieron King of Syracuse, nor invade any part of his Territories, nor the Territories of any of his Friends and Allies. Thirdly, that they should set at liberty, and send back into Italy, all the Romans, whom they held prisoners, without ransom. Lastly, that they should pay unto the Romans two thousand and two hundred talents, which make, as the French reckon the talent, thirteen hundred and twenty thousand crowns: the same to be delivered within twenty years next following.

These Articles were sent to Rome, where they were not thoroughly approved: but ten Commissioners were sent into Sicily, to make perfect the agreement. These Commissioners added a thousand talents to the former sum; and required a shorter time of payment. Further also they took order, that the Carthaginians should not only depart out of Sicily itself, but should also withdraw their Companies out of all other Islands between it and Italy, renouncing their whole interest therein.

Such was the end of the first Punick War, that had lasted about twenty four years without intermission; in which time the Romans had lost, by fight or shipwreck, about seven hundred Quinquereines; and the Carthaginians about five hundred: the greatness of which losses, doth serve to prove the greatness both of these two Cities, and of the War it self; wherein I hold good the judgement of Polybius. That the Romans, in general, did shew themselves the braver Nation; and Amilcar, the most worthy Captain.

Of divers actions passing between the first and second Punick Warrs.

§. I.

Of the cruel War begun between the Carthaginians and their own Mercenaries.

THE Romans having partly by force, and partly by composition, thrust the Carthaginians out of Sicily, and all the little Islands thereunto adjacent, gave them rather means and leisure to help themselves in a following war, than cause to hold themselves contented with the present peace. It is an ancient and true rule, Quid leges à victoribus dicuntur, accipiuntur à victis; That laws are given by the Conquerors, and received of the conquered. But the Romans had either forgotten the answer that was made unto them, by one of the Privernates, or else had forgotten to follow it in this weighty business. For when one of Privernum, after a rebellion, defending in the Senate the cause of his City, was demanded by a Senator, What peace the Romans might hope for, or assure themselves of, if they quitted their present advantage over them; he answered in those words, Si bonam dederint, & fidam & perpetuam; si malam, haud diuturnam; If the peace be good and faithful, that you give us, it will be perpetual, if it be ill, then of little continuance. To this answer the Senate, at that time gave such approbation, that it was said, Viri & liberi vocem audiamus; An credi posset, ulum populum, aut hominem denique in ea conditione, cuius eum permitat, diutius quam necesse sit mansurum? That it was the speech of a manly, and free man; for who could believe, that any people, or indeed any one man, would continue longer in an over-burdened estate, than meer necessity did enforce? Now, if the Romans themselves could make this judgement of those Nations, who had little else besides their manly resolution, to defend their liberty; surely, they grossly flattered themselves, in presuming that the Carthaginians, who neither in power nor in pride, were any way inferior unto themselves, would sit down any longer by the loss and dishonour received, than until they could recover their legs, and the strength which had a while failed them to take revenge. But occasion, by which (while well entertained) not only private men, but Kings and publick States, have more prevailed, than by any proper prowess or virtue, with-held the tempest from the Romans for a time, and turned it most fearfully upon Africa, and the Carthaginians themselves.

For

For after the first Punick war was ended, Amilcar, leaving Eryx, went to Lilybaeum, from whence most conveniently the Army might be transported into Africa: the care of which business he committed unto Gesco, to whom, as to a man of approved sufficiency, he delivered over his charge. Gesco had an especial consideration of the great summs, wherein Carthage was indebted unto these Mercenaries; and withall, of the great disability to make payment. Therefore he thought it the wisest way, to send them over (as it were) by hand, a few at a time; that so the first might have their dispatch, and be gone, ere the second or third Companies arrived. Herein he dealt providently. For it had not been hard to persuade any small number, lodged within so great a City as Carthage, unto some such reasonable composition, as the present emptiness of the common Treasury did require: so that the first might have been friendly discharged, and a good president left unto the second and third, whilst their disjunction had made them unable to recover their whole due by force. But the Carthaginians were of a contrary opinion. They thought to find, in the whole Army, some that would be contented to gratifie the Publick State, by remitting a great part of their own due: and hoped, by such an example, to draw all the multitude to the like agreement and capitulation. So they detained the first and second companies, telling them, that they would make an even reckoning with all together. Thus every day the number increased, and many disorders (a thing incident among Souldiers) were committed; which much disquieted the City, not accustomed unto the like. In this regard it was thought fit, to remove them all to some other place, where they might be less troublesome. This must be done by some colourable words of persuasion: for their number was already so great, that it was not safe to offend them too far. Wherefore it is devised, that they should all attend the coming of their fellows, at Sicca: receiving every one a piece of gold, to bear his charges in the mean while.

This motion is accepted, and the Souldiers began to dis-lodge; leaving behind them their wives, their children, and all their baggage, as meaning shortly to fetch away all, when they came back for their pay. But the Carthaginians have no fancy to their returning into the Town; and therefore compel them to trust up their fardels, that they might have none occasion left to make any errands thither. So to Sicca they removed, with all their goods: and there lay waiting for news of their fellows arrival, and their own pay. Business they had none to do, and therefore might easily be drawn to mutiny: the whole argument of their discourse inclining them to nothing else. Their daily talk was, how rich they should be, when all their money came in; how much would fall to every single share, and for how long time the City was behind hand with them in reckoning. They were all grown Arithmeticians; and he was thought a man of worth, that could find most reason to increase their demands, to the very highest, even beyond their due. No part of their long service was forgotten; but the comfortable words and promises of their Captains, leading them forth to any dangerous fight, were called to mind, and so many obligations, not to be cancelled without satisfying their expectation by some extraordinary largess.

Thus the time passeth away, until the whole Army being arrived, and lodged in Sicca, Hanno comes thither to clear the account. Now is the day come, wherein they shall all be made rich; especially if they can hold together, in maintaining stoutly the common cause. So think they all, and assemble themselves to hear what good news this messenger had brought: with a full resolution to help his memory; in case he should happen to forget any part of the many promises made to them; all which were to be considered in their Donative. Hanno begins a very formal Oration; wherein he bewails the poverty of Carthage, tells them how great a sum of money is to be paid unto the Romans; reckons up the excessive charges, whereas the Common-wealth had been in the late War; and finally desires them to hold themselves contented with part of their pay, and out of the love which they bare unto the City, to remit the rest. Few of them understood his discourse: for the Carthaginian Army was composed of sundry Nations, as Greeks, Africans, Gauls, Ligurians, Spaniards, and others; all of different languages. Yet they stared upon him, and were (as I think) little pleased with his very gesture. But when such as conceived the whole tenour of his speech, had informed the rest what cold comfort he brought; they were all enraged, and fared like mad-men, so that nothing would serve to appeale them.

Hanno would fain have asswaged their fury, but he knew not how: for he less understood their dissonant loud noises, than they did his Oration. An Army collected out of so many Countries, that have no one language common to all, or to the greater part of

Thus the time passeth away, until the whole Army being arrived, and lodged in Sicca, Hanno comes thither to clear the account. Now is the day come, wherein they shall all be made rich; especially if they can hold together, in maintaining stoutly the common cause. So think they all, and assemble themselves to hear what good news this messenger had brought: with a full resolution to help his memory; in case he should happen, to forget any part of the many promises made to them; all which were to be considered in their Donative. Hanno begins a very formal Oration; wherein he bewails the poverty of Carthage, tells them how great a sum of money is to be paid unto the Romans; reckons up the excessive charges; whereat the Common-wealth had been in the late War; and finally desires them to hold themselves contented with part of their pay, and out of the love which they bare unto the City, to remit the rest. Hanno would fain have asswaged their fury, but he knew not how: for he less understood their dissonant loud noises, than they did his Oration. An Army collected out of so many Countries, that have no one language common to all, or to the greater part of them, is neither easily stirred up to mutiny, nor easily pacified, when once it is broken into out-rage. The best that Hanno can do, is to use the help of Interpreters and Messengers. But these Interpreters mistake his meaning (some for want of skill; others of set purpose; and such as deliver his errands in the worst sense, are best believed. Finally, they think themselves much abused by the Carthaginians, and resolve to demand their own in peremptory terms, at a nearer distance. In this mood they leave Sicca, and march as far as Tunx, that is within a very little of Carthage, and there they encamp.

Now begin the Carthaginians to find their own error. It is a good Rule,

*Curandam imprimis, ne magna injuria fiat
Fortibus & miseris.*

Have special care, that valiant poverty
Be not oppress'd with too great injury.

But this proud City, having neglected the Rule, hath also been careless in providing to secure her self against the inconvenience that might follow. She had suffered the whole multitude, whereupon the war was like to give cause of discontent, to join it self to one body, when the several troops might easily have been dispersed: she hath turned out of her gates the wives, children, and goods of these poor men, which had the retained in shew of kindness, she might have used them as Hostages for her own safety; and by employing a miserable penny-father, in her negotiation with men of War, she hath weakened the reputation of her bravest Captains, that might best have served to free her from the threatening danger. Yet likely it is, that Amilcar had no desire to be used as an instrument in defrauding his own Souldiers of their wages: especially considering, that as he best could bear witness of their merits, so was he not ignorant, that means to content them were not wanting, if the Citizens had been willing thereunto. Hereupon may be added a probable conjecture that Hanno, with his complices, who at this very time was a bitter enemy to Amilcar, had the boldness to impose the blame of his own wretched counsel upon the liberal promises made by the Captains. Amilcar therefore did wisely, in suffering those that malign'd him, to have the managing of their own plot, and to deal the cards which themselves had shuffled. This they continue to do as foolishly as they had at first begun. They furnish a market at Tunis, for the Souldiers; whom they suffer to buy what they list, and at what price

they list. They send ever and anon some of their Senators into the Camp; who promise to satisfy all demands, as far forth as it should be possible. And thus by shifting from one extreme to another, they make the Souldiers understand into what fear the City was driven; which cannot chuse but add much insolency to the passions already stirred up.

This sudden change of weather, and the true cause of it, is quickly found by the Army, which thereupon grows wild, and finding the season fit, labours to make a great harvest. Money must be had, and without any abatement. This is granted. Many have lost their horses in publick service of the State. The State shall pay for them. They had lived some years by making hard shift, without receiving their allowance of victuals from Carthage. If they had lived, they wanted not meat; therefore what was this to the Carthaginians? Was it not all one, whether the ships did bring in provision, or their Captains direct them where to fetch it? But this would not serve. They said that they had been sometimes driven to buy; and that (since they could not remember how much, or at what rate they bought) they would be paid for their provision during the whole time; and according to the dearest price that Wheat had born; whilst the War lasted. Such are now the demands of these Mutiniers; who might easily have been satisfied with far less charges, and far more honour, by receiving their due at the first. But now they make no end of craving. For whilst the Carthaginians are perplexed about this Corn-mony; the Souldiers have devised many more tricks, whereby to extort a greater sum of money, without all regard of shame. Since therefore no good end could be found of these controversies which daily did multiply, it was thought convenient, that one of the Carthaginians, which had commanded in Sicil, should be chosen by the Souldiers to reconcile all differences. Hereunto the Army consented, and made choice of Gesco: partly out of good liking to him, who had shew'd himself at all times, a friendly man to them, and careful of their good, especially when they were to be transported into Africk: partly out of a dislike which they had conceived of Amilcar; for that he had not visited them in all this busy time. So Gesco comes among them; and to please them the better, comes not without money: which might give better countenance to his proceedings, than barren eloquence had done to the negotiation of Hanno. He calls unto him first of all the Captains, and then the several Nations apart, rebuking them gently for that which had passed; advising them temperately concerning the present; and exhorting them to continue their love unto the State, which had long entertained them, and would needs alwaies be mindful of their good services. After this he began to put hand to his purse, offering to give them their whole pay in hand; and then after to consider of other reckonings at a more convenient time. This had been well accepted, and might have served to bring all to a quiet pass, if two seditious Ring-leaders of the multitude had not stood against it.

There was in the Camp one Spendius, a sturdy fellow, and audacious, but a slave; that in the late war had fled from a Roman, whom he served, and therefore stood in fear, lest he should be delivered back to his Master; at whose hands he could expect no less, than to be whipt and crucified. This wretch could find no better way to prolong his own life, than by raising such troubles as might serve to withdraw men from care of private matters, and make his own restitution impossible, were his Master never so importunate. With Spendius there associated himself one Matho, an hot-headed man, that had been so forward in stirring up the tumult, as he could not chuse but fear, lest his own death should be made an example, to deter others from the like seditious behaviour. This Matho deals with his Countrymen the Africans; telling them, that they were in far worse condition, than either the Gauls, the Greeks, the Spaniards, or any foreign Mercenaries. For (saith he) The our companions have no more to do, than to receive their wages, and so get them gone: but we that are to stay behind in Africa, shall be called to another manner of account, when we are left alone; so that we shall have cause to wish that we had returned home beggars, rather than laden with the money, which (little though it be) shall break our backs. We are not ignorant, how tyrannically these our hangy Masters of Carthage do reign over us. They think it reasonable, that our lives and goods should be at their disposition; which they have at other times been accustomed to take from us even without apparent cause, as it were to declare their sovereignty: What will they now do, seeing that we have demeaned our selves as free-men, and been bold to set a good face on the matter, demanding our own, as others have done? We all do know, that it were a very shame for us, if having been as forward in every danger of war, as any other men, we should now stand quaking like slaves, and not dare to open our mouths, when others take liberty to require their due. This notwithstanding, ye may assure your selves, that we are like to be taught better manners, as soon as our fellows are gone: in regard of whom they are content to shadow their indignation with a good, but a forced countenance. Let us therefore be wise, and consider that they hate and fear us: their hatred will shew it self when their fear is once past: unless we take our time, and whilst we are the stronger, cuffeble them so greatly, that their hatred shall not be able to do us wrong. All their strength consisteth in money, where-withall they have hired others against us, and us against others. At the present they have neither money nor friends. The best Army that ever served them, whereof we are no small part, lies at their gates, ready to help us if we be men. A better opportunity cannot be expected; for were our swords once drawn, all Africk would rise on our side. As for the Carthaginians, whether can they send for help? The case it self is plain. But we must quickly resolve. Either we must prevent the diligence of Gesco, by incensing these Gauls and Spaniards, and procuring them to draw blood; or else it behoveth us to please our good Masters, by joyning with them against our fellows, yea by offering to forgive unto them all our wages, if so (peradventure) they may be won to forgive us, or not over-cruelly to punish our faults committed. He is most worthily a wretched slave, that neither hath care to win his Masters love, nor the courage to attempt his own liberty.

By such persuasions Matho wins the African Souldiers to his own purpose. They are not now so greedy of money, as of quarrel, which he that seeketh will not miss to find. When Gesco therefore offered to pay them their whole stipend presently, but referred their other demands, for horses and victuals, to some other more convenient time; they broke into great outrage, and say, that they will have all, even all at once, and that out of hand. In this tumult, the whole Army flock together about Matho and Spendius; whose diligence is not wanting to add more fuel to the fire already blazing. Matho and Spendius are the only men to whom the Souldiers will hearken: if any other stand up to make a speech, a shower of stones, flying about his ears, puts him to silence, that he shall never afterwards speak word more. Neither stay they to consider what it is that any man would say: enough hath been said already by those good spokes-men; so that no other word (though perhaps to the same purpose) can be heard, save only Throm, Throm.

Now

Now the rebellion begins to take form. Matbo and Spendius are chosen Captains; who, followed by a desperate crew of Rufians, will suffer no man to make his own peace, but pursue their own ends, under fair pretence of the common cause. All which notwithstanding, Geso is not wanting to the good of his Country, but adventures himself upon their fury. One while he deals with the Captains, and other principal men; taking them by the hand, and giving gentle words: another while, he works with the several Nations; putting them all in hope of their own hearts desire, if any reason would content them. None of them are so fullen as the Afficans: indeed none of them had so good cause. They require him peremptorily to give them their own, and not to feed them with words. The truth is, that they are not so covetous as they seem: but will be more glad of an ill answer, than of a good payment. This is more than Geso knows: he sees not that Matbo hath any more than bare words to bestow upon them. Wherefore, as rebuking their inconsiderate heat, he tells them, That they may do well, if they stand in want of money, to seek it of their Captain Matbo. This is enough. Shall he both defraud them and decide them? They stay no longer, but lay violent hands upon the treasure that he had brought; yea upon him also, and all that are with him: as intending to take this in part of payment, and, for the rest, to take another course. Matbo and Spendius are glad of this. It had little pleased them to see their fellows begin to grow calm, by his fair language: wherefore they cast into bonds both him, and all the Carthaginians that they can find; that so the Army may be freed from danger of good admonition, which they call Treason. After this follows open war. Matbo solicits all Afficks, and his Embassadors are every where well entertained. Neither is it needful to use persuasion: the very fame of this rebellion (suffice to draw the whole Country into it. Now must the Carthaginians be plagued for those oppressions, with which they have plagued others. It is true that adversity hath never been untold of her errors: and as she is ever assured to hear her own, so commonly with her own she undergoes those of other men. The Afficans finding the Carthaginians hang under the wheel, tell them boldly, that their Impositions were mercilefs; that they took from them the one half of their Corn; that they doubled their tributes in all things else; and that they inflicted upon their vassals the greatest punishment for the least offences. These cruelties the Carthaginians themselves have forgotten: but the people, that have suffered so much, retain all in perfect memory. Wherefore not only such as can bear arms, are ready to do service in this great commotion; but the very women bring forth their Jewels, and other ornaments, offering all to sail for the maintenance of so just a quarrel. By this great forwardness, and liberal contribution, Matbo and Spendius are supplied with money, not only to satisfy the present appetite of their men; but sufficient to continue the war begun, though it should be of long endurance.

§. II.

Divers Observations upon this War with the Mercenaries.

I. I.

Of Tyranny, and how Tyrants are said to use the help of Mercenaries.

HERE let us rest a while, as in a convenient place, whence we may take a prospect of the subject, over which we travel. Behold a tyrannical City, persecuted by her own Mercenaries with a deadly war. It is a common thing, as being almost necessary, that a tyranny should be upheld by Mercenary forces: it is common that Mercenaries should be false: and it is common that all war made against Tyrants, should be exceeding full of hate and cruelty. Yet we seldom hear, that ever the ruine of a tyranny is procured or sought by those that were hired to maintain the power of it: and seldom or never do we read of any war that hath been prosecuted with such inexplicable hatred, as this that is now in hand.

That which we properly call Tyranny, is, A violent form of Government, not respecting the good of the subject, but only the pleasure of the Commander. I purposely forbear to say that it is, the unjust rule of one, over many: for very truly doth Cleon in Thucydides tell the Athenians, that their dominion over their subjects, was none other, than a meer tyranny; though it were so, that they themselves were a great City, and a popular estate. Neither is it peradventure greatly needful, that I should call this form of commanding, violent: since it may well and easily be conceived, that no man willingly performs obedience to one regardless of his life and welfare: unless himself be either a mad man, man, or (which is little better) wholly possessed with some extreme passion of love. The practice of tyranny is not always of a like extremity: for some Lords are more gentle than others, to their very slaves; and he that is most cruel to some, is mild enough towards others, though it be but for his own advantage. Nevertheless, in large Dominions, wherein the Rulers discretion cannot extend it self unto notice of the difference which might be found between the worth of several men, it is commonly seen, that the taste of sweetness drawn out of oppression, hath so good a relish, as continually inflames the Tyrants appetite, and will not suffer it to be restrained with any limits of respect. Why should he seek out bounds to prescribe unto his desires, who cannot endure the face of one so honest, as may put him in remembrance of any moderation? It is much that he hath gotten by extorting from some few: by sparing none, he should have riches in goodly abundance. He hath taken a great deal from every one: but every one could have spared more. He hath wrung all their Pursets, and now he hath enough: but (as Covetousness is never satisfied) he thinks that all this is too little for a stock; though it were indeed a good yearly Income. Therefore he deviseth new tricks of robbery, and is not better pleased with the gains, than with the Art of getting. He is hated for this, and he knows it well: but he thinks by cruelty to change hatred into fear. So he makes it his exercise, to torment and murder all whom he suspecteth: in which course, if he suspect none unjustly, he may be said to deal craftily; but if Innocency be not safe; how can all this make any Conspirator to stand in fear, since the Traitor is no worse rewarded than the quiet man? Wherefore he can think upon none other security, than to disarm all his Subjects; to fortifie himself within some strong place; and, for defence of his Person and State, to hire as many lusty Souldiers as shall be thought sufficient. These must not be of his own Country: for if not every one, yet some one or other may chance to have a feeling of the publick misery. This considered, he assures unto him a desperate rabble of strangers, the most dishonest that can be found; such as have neither wealth nor credit at home, and will therefore be careful to support him, by whose only favour they are maintained. Now, left any of these, either by detestation of his wickedness, or (which in wicked men is most likely) by promise of greater reward than he doth give, should be drawn to turn his sword against the Tyrant himself: they shall all be permitted to do as he doth; to rob, to ravish, to murder, and to satisfy their own appetites, in most outrageous manner, being thought so much the more assured to their Master, by how much the more he sees them grow hateful to all men else. Considering in what age, and in what language I write; I must be fain to say, that these are not dreams: though some Englishmen perhaps that were unacquainted with History, lighting upon this leaf, might suppose this discourse to be but little better. This is to shew, both how tyranny grows to stand in need of mercenary Souldiers, and how those mercenaries are, by mutual obligation, firmly assured unto the Tyrant.

I. II.

That the Tyranny of a City over her Subjects is worse than the tyranny of one man: and that a tyrannical City must likewise use mercenary Souldiers.

NOW concerning the tyranny wherein with a City or State oppresseth her subjects; it may appear some wayes to be more moderate, than that of one man: but in many things it is more intolerable. A City is jealous of her Dominion; but not (as is one man) fearful of her life: the self need hath the therefore to secure her left by cruelty. A City is not luxurious in consuming her treasures, and therefore needs the less to pluck from her Subjects. If War, or any other great occasion drive her to necessity of taking from her Subjects more than ordinary sums of money; the same necessity makes either the contribution easie, or the taking excusable. Indeed no wrongs are so grievous and hateful, as those that are insolent. Remember (saith Caligula the Emperour, to his Grand-mother Antonia) that I may do what I list, and to whom I list: these words were accounted horrible, though he did her no harm. And Juvenal reckons it, as the complement of all torments, inflicted by a cruel Roman Dame upon her slaves; that whilst she was whipping them, she painted her face, talked with her Gossips, and used all signs of neglecting what those wretches felt. Now seeing that the greatest grievances wherewith a domineering State offendeth her Subjects, are free from all sense of indignity; likely it is, that they will not extremely hate her, although desire of liberty make them weary of her Empire. In these respects it is not needfull that she should keep a Guard of licentious cut-throats, and maintain them in all villany, as a Dionysius or Agathocles

Agathocles must do: her own Citizens are able to terrifie and to hold perforce in obedience, all male-contents. These things, considered alone by themselves, may serve to prove, That a City is scarce able to deserve the name of a Tyranny, in the proper signification.

All this notwithstanding, it shall appear, that the miseries wherewith a Tyrant loadeth his people, are not so heavy, as the burdens imposed by a cruel City. Not without some appearance of truth, it may be said, that Lust, and many other private passions, are no way incident to a City or Corporation. But to make this good, we shall have need to use the help of such distinctions, as the Argument in hand doth not require. Was not Rome lascivious, when Cato was slain to rise and leave the Theater, to the end, that the reverend regard of his gravity might not hinder the people from calling for a show of naked Courtians, that were to be brought upon the open stage? By common practice, and general approved custom, we are to censure the quality of a whole State, not by the private virtue or vice of any one man, nor by metaphysical abstraction of the universal from the singular; or of the Corporation, from those of whom it is compounded: I say therefore, (as I have said elsewhere) That it were better to live under one pernicious Tyrant, than under many thousands. The reasons proving this, are too many to set down, but a few may suffice. The desires of one man, how inordinate soever, if they cannot be satisfied, yet they may be wearied; he is not able to search all corners; his humour may be found, and soothed; age or good advice, yea, or some unexpected accident may reform him: all which failing; yet is there hope, that his successour may prove better.

Many Tyrants have been changed into worthy Kings; and many have ill used their ill-gotten Dominion, which, becoming hereditary to their posterity, hath grown into the most excellent form of Government, even a lawful Monarchy. But they that live under a tyrannical City, have no such hope: their Mistress is immortal, and will not slacken the reins, until they be pulled out of her hands, and her own mouth receive the bridle of a more mighty Chariotter. This is wofull: yet their present sufferings make them less mindful of the future. New flies, and hungry ones, fall upon the same sore, out of which others had already sucked their fill. A new Governour comes yearly among them, attended by all his poor kindred and friends, who mean not to return home empty to their hives, without a good lading of wax and honey. These fly into all quarters, and are quickly acquainted with every mans wealth, or whatsoever else, in all the Province, is worthy to be desired. They know all a mans enemies, and all his fears: becoming themselves, within a little space, the enemies that he feareth most. To grow into acquaintance with these masterful guests, in hope to win their friendship, were an endless labour, (yet it must be undergone) and such as every one hath not means to go about: but were this effected, what availeth it? The love of our Governour is purchased with gifts: the Successour of this man, he is more loving than could be wished in respect of a fair Wife or Daughter, then comes the third, perhaps of the contrary faction at home, a bitter enemy to both his fore-goers, who seeks the ruine of all that have been inward with them. So the miseries of this tyranny are not simple, but interlaced (as it were) with the calamities of civil War. The Romans had a Law De Reptundis, or, Of Recovery, against extorting Magistrates: yet we find, that it served not wholly to restrain their Provincial Governours; who presuming on the favour of their own Citizens, and of their kindred and friends at home, were bold in their Provinces, to work all these enormities rehearsed; though somewhat the more sparingly, for fear of judgement. If the Subjects of Rome groaned under such oppressions, what must we think of those that were Vassals unto Carthage? The Romans imposed no burthenfome tributes; they loved not to hear, that their Empire was grievous; they condemned many noble Citizens for having been ill Governours. At Carthage all went quite contrary: the rapines newly devised by one Magistrate, served as precedents to instruct another; every man resolved to do the like, when it should fall to his turn; and he was held a notable States-man, whose robberies had been such, as might afford a good share to the common treasure. Particular examples of this Carthaginian practice are not extant: the Government of Verres the Roman in Sicily, that it is lively set out by Tully, may serve to inform us, what was the demeanour of these Punic Rulers, who stood in fear of no such condemnation, as Verres underwent. By prosecuting this discourse, I might infer a more general proposition; That a City cannot govern her subject Provinces so mildly as a King: but it is enough to have shewed, That the tyranny of a City is far more intolerable, than that of any one most wicked man.

Suitable

Suitable to the cruelty of such Lords, is the hatred of their subjects: and again, suitable to the hatred of the subjects, is the jealousy of their Lords. Hence it followed, that, in wars abroad, the Carthaginians durst use the service of African Souldiers; in Africa it self they had rather be beholding to others, that were farther fetcht. For the same purpose did Hannibal, in the second Punic war, shift his Mercenaries out of their own Countries; Ut Afri in Hispania, Hispani in Africa, melior procul ab domo futurus uterq; miles, velut mutuis pignoribus obligati stipendia facerent; that the Africans might serve in Spain, the Spaniards in Africa, being each of them like to prove the better Souldiers, the farther they were from home, as if they were obliged by mutual pledges. It is disputable, I confess, whether these African and Spanish hirelings could properly be termed Mercenaries: for they were subject unto Carthage, and carried into the field, not only by reward, but by duty. Yet seeing their duty was no better than enforced, and that it was not any love to the State, but meer desire of gain, that made them fight; I will not nicely stand upon propriety of a word, but hold them, as Polybius also doth, no better than Mercenaries.

†. III.

The dangers growing from the use of mercenary Souldiers, and forraign Auxiliaries.

THE extream danger, growing from the employment of such Souldiers, is well observed by Machiavel: who sheweth, that they are more terrible to those whom they serve, than to those against whom they serve. They are seditious, unfaithfull, disobedient, devourers, and destroyers of all places and Countries, whereinto they are drawn; as being held by no other bond, than their own commodity. Yea, that which is most fearful among such hirelings, is, that they have often, and in time of greatest extremity, not only refused to fight, in their defence, who have entertained them, but revolted unto the contrary part; to the utter ruine of those Princes and States that have trusted them. Those mercenaries (saith Machiavel) which filled all Italy when Charles the eighth of France did pass the Alpes, were the cause that the said French King won the Realm of Naples with his Buckler without a Sword. Notable was the example of Sforza the Father of Francis Sforza, Duke of Attilan; who being entertained by Queen Joan of Naples, abandoned her service on the sudden, and forced her to put her self into the hands of the King of Aragon. Like unto his father was Francis Sforza, the first of that race, Duke of Attilan; who being entertained by the Millanois, forced them to become his slaves, even with the very same army which themselves had levied for their own defence. But Lodowick Sforza, the son of this Francis by the just judgement of God, was made a memorable example unto posterity, in losing his whole estate by the treachery of such faithless Mercenaries, as his own Father had been. For having waged an army of Switzers, and committed his Dutchy, together with his person, into their hands, he was by them delivered up unto his enemy the French King, by whom he was inclosed in the Castle of Loches unto his dying day.

The like inconvenience is found, in using the help of forraign Auxiliaries. We see, that when the Emperour of Constantinople had hired ten thousand Turks against his neighbour Princes; he could never, either by perswasion or force, set them again over the Sea upon Asia side; which gave beginning to the Christian servitude, that soon after followed. Alexander the Son of Cassander, sought aid of the great Demetrius: but Demetrius, being entred into his Kingdom, slew the same Alexander, who had invited him, and made himself King of Macedon. Syracum the Turk was called into Egypt by Salar Soldan, against his opposit: but this Turk did settle himself so surely in Egypt, that Saladin his successor became Lord thereof; and of all the holy Land, soon after. What need we look about for examples of this kind? Every Kingdom, in effect, can furnish us. The Britains drew the Saxons into this our Country; and Mac Murrough drew the English into Ireland; but the one and the other soon became Lords of those two Kingdoms.

Against all this, may be alledged the good success of the United Provinces of the Netherlands, using none other than such kind of Souldiers, in their late war. Indeed these Low-Countries have many goodly and strong Cities, filled with Inhabitants that are wealthy, industrious, and valiant in their kind. They are stout Sea-men, and therein is their excellency: neither are they bad at the defence of a place well fortified: but in open field they have seldom been able to stand against the spaniard. Necessity therefore compelled them to seek help abroad: and the like necessity made them forbear to arm any great numbers of their own. For, with money raised by their Trade, they maintained the War: and therefore could

ill spare unto the Pike and Musket, those hands, that were of more use in helping to fill the common purse. Yet what of this? they sped well. Surely they sped as ill as might be, whilest they had none other than mercenary Souldiers. Many fruitless attempts, made by the Prince of Orange, can witness it: and that brave Commander Count Lodowick of Nassau, felt, to his grief, in his retreat from Gravelingham; when, in the very instant that required their service in fight, his Mercenaries cried out aloud for money, and so ran away. This was not the only time, when the hired Souldiers of the States, have either sought to hide their cowardize under a shew of greediness; or at least, by meer covetousness, have ruined in one hour, the labour of many months. I will not stand to prove this by many examples: for they themselves will not deny it. Neither would I touch the honour of Monsieur the Duke of Anjou, brother to the French King; save that it is folly to conceal what all the world knows. He that would lay open the danger of forraign Auxiliaries, needeth no better pattern. It is commonly found, that such Aiders make themselves Lords over thoe, to whom they lend their succour: but where shall we meet with such another as this Monsieur, who, for his protection promised, being rewarded with the Lordship of the Countrey, made it his first work, to thrust by violence a galling yoke upon the peoples neck? Well, he lived to repent it, with grief enough. Even whilest he was counterfeiting unto those about him, that were ignorant of his plot, an imaginary sorrow for the poor Burghers of Antwerp, as verily believing the Town to be surpris'd and wone; the death of the Count Sr. Aignan, who fell over the wall, and the Cannon of the City, discharged against his own troops, informed him better what had hapned; shewing, that they were his own French who stood in need of the pity. Then was his feigned passion changed into a very bitter anguish of mind, wherein, smiting his breast, and wringing his hands, he exclaimed, Helas, mon dieu, que vœux tu faire de moy? Alas, my God, what wilt thou do with me? So, the affairs of the Netherlands will not serve to prove, that there is little danger in using Mercenary Souldiers, or the help of forraign Auxiliaries. This notwithstanding, they were obedient unto necessity, and sought help of the English, Scots, and French; wherein they did wisely, and prospered. For when there was in France a King, partaker with them in the same danger; when the Queen of England refused to accept the Sovereignty of their Country, which they offered, yet being provoked by the Spaniard their enemy, pursued him with continual war; when the heir of England reigned in Scotland, a King too just and wife (though not engaged in any quarrel) either to make profit of his neighbours miseries, or to help those that had attempted the conquest of his own inheritance: then might the Netherlands very safely repose confidence in the forces of these their Neighbour Countries. The Souldiers that came unto them from hence, were (to omit any other commendations) not only regardfull of the pay that they should receive, but well affected unto the cause that they took in hand: or, if any were cold in his devotion, unto the side whereon he fought, yet was he kept in order, by remembrance of his own home, where the English would have rewarded him with death, if that his faith had been corrupted by the Spaniard. They were therefore trusted with the custody of Cities; they were held as friends, and patrons; the necessity of the poorer sort was relieved, before the pay-day came, with lendings, and other helps, as well as the ability of the States could permit. When three such Princes, reigning at one time, shall agree so well, to maintain against the power of a fourth, injurious (or at the least so seeming) to them all, a Neighbour-Country of the same Religion, and to which they all are lovingly affected: then may such a Country be secure of her Auxiliaries, and quietly intend her Trade, or other business, in hope of like success. But these circumstances meet so seldom, as it may well hold true in general: That mercenary and forraign auxiliary forces are no less dangerous, than the enemy against whom they are entertained.

That the moderate government of the Romans, gave them assurance to use the service of their own subjects in their Wars. That in mans nature there is an affection breeding tyranny, which hindereth the use and benefit of the like moderation.

HERE it may be demanded, whether also the Romans were not compelled to use the service of other Souldiers in their many great wars, but performed all by their own Citizens? for if it were their manner to arm their own subjects, how hapned it, that they feared no rebellion? if strangers, how then could they avoid the inconveniences above rehearsed? The answer is, that their Armies were compounded usually of their

their own Citizens, and of the Latines in equal number: to which they added, as occasion required, some companies of Campanians, Histrians, Samnites, or other of their subjects, as were either interested in the quarrel, or might best be trusted. They had, about these times, (though seldom they did employ so many) ten Roman Legions; a good strength, if all other help had been wanting; which served to keep in good order their subjects, that were alwaies fewer in the army than themselves. As for the Latines, if consanguinity were not a sufficient obligation; yet many privileges and immunities, which they enjoyed, made them assured unto the State of Rome: under which they lived almost at liberty, as being bound to little else, than to serve it in war. It is true, that a yoke how easie soever, seems troublesome to the neck that hath been accustomed to freedom. Therefore many people of Italy have taken occasion of several advantages, to deliver themselves from the Roman subjection. But still they have been reclaimed by war, the Authors of rebellion have sharply been punished, and the people by degrees have obtained such liberty, as made them esteem none otherwise of Rome, than as the common City of all Italy. Yea, in process of time it was granted unto many Cities, and thoe far off removed, even to Tarsus in Cilicia, where St. Paul was born, that all the Burghesses should be free of Rome it self. This favour was conferred absolutely upon some; upon some, with restraint of giving voice in election of Magistrates, or with other such limitation as was thought fit. Herunto may be added, that it was their manner, after a great conquest, to release unto their new subjects half of their tribute which they had been wont to pay to their former Lords, which was a ready way to bring the multitude into good liking of their present condition; when the review of harder times past, should rather teach them to fear a relapse, than to hope for better in the future, by seeking innovation. Neither would it be forgotten, as a special note of the Romans good Government, That when some, for their well-deserving, have had the offer to be made Citizens of Rome, they have refused it, and held themselves better contented with their own present estate. Wherefore it is no marvel, that Petelia, a City of the Brutians in Italy, chose rather to endure all extremity of war, than, upon any condition, to forsake the Romans; even when the Romans themselves had confessed, that they were unable to help these their subjects, and therefore willed them to look to their own good, as having been faithful to the utmost. Such love purchased these mild Governors, without impairing their Majesty thereby. The sum of all is; they had, of their own, a strong army; they doubled it by adjoining thereto the Latines; and they further increased it, as need required, with other help of their own subjects; all, or the most of their followers, accounting the prosperity of Rome to be the common good.

The moderate use of sovereign power being so effectual, in assuring the people unto their Lords, and consequently in the establishment or enlargement of Dominion: it may seem strange, that the practice of Tyranny, whose effects are contrary, hath been so common in all ages. The like, I know, may be said of all Vice and Irregularity, whatsoever. For it is less difficult, (whatsoever think otherwise) and more safe, to keep the way of Justice and Honesty, than to turn aside from it; yet commonly our passions do lead us into by-paths. But where Lust, Anger, Fear, or any the like Affection, seduceth our reason; the same unruly appetite, either bringeth with it an excuse, or, at least-wise, taketh away all cause of wonder. In tyranny it is not so: for as much as we can hardly descry the passion, that is of force to inordinate it self into the whole tenour of a Government. It must be confessed, that lawless desires have bred many Tyrants: yet so that these desires have seldom been hereditary, or long-lasting; but have ended commonly with the Tyrants life, sometimes before his death; by which means the government hath been reduced to a better form. In such cases, the saying of Aristotle Arif. pol. holds, That tyrannies are of a short continuance. But this doth not satisfy the question in hand. Why did the Carthaginians exercise tyranny? Why did the Athenians? Why have many other Cities done the like? If in respect of their general good; how could they be ignorant, that this was an ill course for the safety of the Weal publick? If they were led hereto by any affection; what was that affection wherein so many thousand Citizens, divided and subdivided within themselves by factions, did all concur, notwithstanding the much diversity of temper, and the vehemency of private hatred among them? Doubtless, we must be faine to say, That Tyranny is, by it self, a vice distinct from others. A Man, we know, is Animal politicus, apt even by Nature, to command or to obey; every one in his proper degree. Other desires of Mankind, are common likewise unto brute beasts; and

and some of them, to bodies wanting sense: but the desire of rule belongeth unto the nobler part of reason; whereunto is also answerable an appetite to yield obedience. Now as hunger and thirst are given by nature not only to Man and Beast, but unto all sorts of Vegetables, for the sustentation of their life: as Fear, Anger, Lust, and other affections are likewise natural, in convenient measure, both unto Mankind, and to all Creatures that have sense, for the shunning or repelling of harm, and seeking after that which is requisite: even so is this desire of ruling or obeying, ingrafted by Nature in the race of Man, and in Man only as a reasonable creature, for the ordering of his life, in a civil form of Justice. All these in-bred qualities are good and useful. Nevertheless, Hunger and Thirst are the Parents of Gluttony and Drunkenness, which, in reproach, are called beastly, by an improper term: since they grow from appetites, found in less worthy creatures than beasts, and are yet not so common in beasts, as in men. The effects of Anger, and of such other Passions as defend no lower than unto brute beasts, are held less vile; and perhaps not without good reason: yet are the more pernicious. But as no corruption is worse by sharper Laws, as being in general more horrible, and punished more grievously, than of that which is best; there is not any passion, that nourisheth a vice more hurtful unto Mankind, than that which issueth from the most noble root, even the depraved Affection of Ruling. Hence arise those two great mischiefs, of which hath been an old question in dispute; whether be the worse; That all things, or that nothing should be lawful. Of these, a dull spirit and overloaded by fortune with power, whereof it is not capable, occasioneth the one; the other proceedeth from a contrary distemper, whose vehemency the bounds of Reason cannot limit. Under the extremity of either, no Country is able to subsist, yet the defective dulness, that permiteth any thing, will also permit the execution of Law, to which meer necessity doth enforce the ordinary Magistrate; whereas Tyranny is more active, and pleaseth it self in the excess, with a false colour of Justice. Examples of stupidity, and unaptness to rule, are not very frequent, though such natures are every where to be found: for this quality troubles not it self in seeking Empire; or if by some error of fortune, it encounter therewithall, (as when Cladius, hiding himself in a corner, found the Empire of Rome) some friend, or else a wife, is not wanting to supply the defect, which also cruelty doth help to shadow. Therefore this Vice, as a thing unknown, is without a name. Tyranny is more bold, and feareth not to be known, but would be reputed honourable: for it is prosperum & felix scilicet, a fortunate mischief, as long as it can subsist. There is no reward or honour (saith Peter Charron), assigned unto those, that know how to increase, or preserve humane nature: all honour, greatness, riches, dignities, Empire, triumphs, trophies, are appointed for those, that know how to assist, trouble, or destroy it. Cæsar and Alexander, have un-made and slain, each of them; more than a million of men: but they made none, nor left none behind them. Such is the error of Mans judgement in valuing things according to the common opinion. But the true name of Tyranny, when it grows to ripeness, is none other than Feritie: the same that Aristotle saith to be worse than any vice. It exceedeth indeed all other vices, issuing from the passions incident both to Man and Beast; no less, than Perjury, Murder, Treason, and the like horrible crimes, exceed in villany, the faults of Gluttony and Drunkenness, that grow from more ignoble appetites. Hereof Scribon, Procrustes, and Philocamper, that used their bodily force to the destruction of Mankind, are not better examples, than Phalaris, Dionysius, and Agathocles, whose malicious heads were assisted by the hands of detestable Ruffians. The same barbarous desire of Lordship, transported those old examples of Feritie, and these latter Tyrants, beyond the bounds of Reason: neither of them knew the use of Rule, nor the difference between Freeman and slaves.

The rule of the husband over the wife, and of Parents over their children, is natural, and appointed by God himself; so that it is always, and simply, allowable and good. The former of these, is as the dominion of Reason over Appetite; the latter is the whole authority, which one Freeman can have over another. The rule of a King is no more, nor none other, than of a common Father over his whole Country: which he that knows what the power of a Father is, or ought to be, knows to be enough. But there is a greater and more Masterly rule, which God gave unto Adam, when he said; Have dominion over the fish of the Sea, Gen. 1. 28. and over the fowl of the air, and every living thing that moveth upon the earth: which also he continued unto Noah and his children, saying, The fear of you, and the dread of you, Gen. 9. 1. shall be upon every beast of the earth, and upon every fowl of the air, upon all that moveth upon upon the earth, and upon all the fishes of the Sea: into your hands are they delivered. He who gave this dominion unto Man, did give also an aptitude to use it. The execution of this power hath since extended it self, over a very great part of Mankind. There are indeed no small numbers of men, whose disability to govern themselves, proves them, according to Aristotles doctrine, to be naturally slaves.

Arist. polit. 1. 5.

Yet find I not in Scripture any warrant to oppress men with bondage: unless the lawfulness thereof be sufficiently intimated, where it is said, That a man shall not be punished for the death of a servant; whom he hath slain by correction, if the servant live a day or two, because he is his money: or else by the captivity of the Midianitish girls, which were made bond-slaves, and the Sanctuary had a part of them for the Lords tribute. Doubtless the custom hath been very ancient; for Noah laid this curse upon Canaan, that he should be a servant of servants; and Abraham had of Pharaoh, among other gifts, men-servants and maid-servants, which were none other than slaves. Christian Religion is said to have abrogated this old kind of servility: but surely they are deceived that think so. Saint Paul desired the liberty of Onesimus, whom he had won unto Christ: yet wrote for this unto Philemon by way of request, craving it as a benefit, not urging it as a duty. Agreeable hereto is the direction, which the same Saint Paul giveth unto servants: Let every man abide in the same calling wherein he was called: art thou called, being a servant? care not for it, but if thou mayst be made free, use it rather. It is true, that Christian Religion hath procured liberty unto many; not only in regard of piety, but for that the Christian Masters stood in fear of being discovered by their slaves, unto the persecutors of Religion. Mahomet likewise, by giving liberty to his followers, drew many unto his impiety: but whether he forbade it, as unlawful, unto his sectators, to hold one another of them in bondage, I cannot tell; save that by the practice of the Turks and Moors, it seems he did not. In England we had many bond-servants, untill the time of our last civil wars; and I think that the Laws concerning Villenage are still in force, of which the latest are the sharpest. And now, since slaves were made free, which were of great use and service, there are grown up a rabble of Rogues, Cutpurves, and other the like trades; slaves in Nature, though not in Law.

But whether this kind of dominion be lawful, or not; Aristotle hath well proved, that it is natural. And certainly, we find not such a latitude of difference in any creature, as in the nature of man; wherein (to omit the infinite distance in estate of the Elect and Reprobate) the wisest excel the most foolish, by far greater degree, than the most foolish of men doth surpass the wisest of beasts. Therefore when Commiseration hath given way to reason, we shall find, that nature is the ground even of Masterly power, and of servile obedience, which is therefore correspondent. But it may be truly said, that some Countries have subsisted long without the use of any servility; as also it is true, that some Countries have not the use of any tame Cattel. Indeed the affections which uphold civil rule, are (though more noble) not so simply needful, unto the sustentation either of our kind, as are Lust, and the likes or of every one, as are Hunger and thirst; which notwithstanding are the lowest in degree. But where most vile and servile dispositions have liberty to shew themselves begging in the streets, there may we more justly wonder, how the dangerous toil of Sea-faring men can find enough to undertake them, than how the swarm of idle vagabonds should increase, by access of those, that are weary of their own more painful condition. This may suffice to prove, that in Mankind there is found, ingrafted even by Nature, a desire of absolute dominion: whereunto the general custom of Nations doth subscribe; together with the pleasure which most men take in flatterers, that are the basest of slaves.

This being so, we find no cause to marvel, how Tyranny hath been so ripe in all ages, and practised, not only in the single rule of some vicious Prince, but ever by consent of whole Cities and Estates: since other vices have likewise gotten head, and born a general sway, notwithstanding that the way of virtue be more honourable, and commodious. Few there are that have used well the inferior Passions: how then can we expect, that the most noble affections should not be disordered? in the government of wife and children, some are utterly careless, and corrupt all by their dull connivency; others, by masterly rigour, hold their own blood under condition of slavery. To be a good Governour is a rare commendation: and to prefer the Weak publick above all respects whatsoever, is the Virtue justly termed Hierocical. Of this Virtue many ages afford not many examples. Hecior is named by Aristotle as one of them; and deservedly, if this praise be due to extraordinary height of fortune, used in defence of a mans own Country. But if we consider, that a love of the general good cannot be perfect, without reference unto the fountain of all goodness: we shall find, that no moral virtue, how great soever, can by it self, deserve the commendation of more than Virtue, as the Heroical doth. Wherefore we must search the Scriptures, for patterns hereof; such as David, Josaphat, and Jehoiada were. Of Christian Kings, if there were many such, the world would soon be happy. It is not my purpose to wrong the worth of any, by denying the praise where it is due, or by preferring a less excellent. But he that can find a King religious, and zealous in Gods cause, without enforcement, either of adversity, or of some regard of State; a procurer of general peace and quiet; who not only useth his authority, but adds the travel of his eloquence, in admonishing his Judges to do justice; by the vigorous influence of whose Government, civility is infused, even into those places, that have been the dens of savage Robbers and Cut-throat; one that hath quite abolished a slavish Breken Law, by which a whole Nation of his subjects were held in bondage; and one, whose higher virtue and wisdom doth make the praise not only of Nobility and other ornaments, but of abstinence from the blood, the wives, and the goods of those that are under his power, together with a world of chief commendations belonging unto some good Princes, to appear less remarkable: he, I say, that can find such a King, findeth an example, worthy to add unto virtue an honourable title, if it were formerly wanting. Under such a King, it is likely, by Gods blessing, that a Land shall flourish, with increase of Trade, in Countries before unknown; that Civility and Religion shall be propagated, into barbarous and heathen Countries; and that the happiness of his subjects, shall cause the Nations far off removed, to wish him their Sovereign. I need not add hereunto, that all the actions of such a King, even his bodily exercises, do pertain to the perfection of his life and health, or to the mollifying of his cares, (who fixing his contemplation upon God, seeketh how to imitate the unspeakable goodness, rather than the inaccessible majesty, with both of which himself is induced, as far as humane nature is capable) do also belong to the furtherance of that common good, which he procreth. Let any man should think me transported with admiration, or other affection, beyond the bonds of reason; I add hereunto, that such a King is nevertheless a man, must dye, and may err: yet wisdom and fame shall set him free, from error, and from death, both with and without the help of time. One thing I may not omit, as a singular benefit (though there be many other besides redounding unto this King, as the fruit of his goodness,) The people that live under a pleasant yoke, are not only loving to their Sovereign Lord, but free of courage; and no greater in muster of men, than of stout fighters, if need require: whereas on the contrary, he that ruleth as over slaves, shall be attended in time of necessity, by slavish minds, neither loving his person, nor regarding his or their own honour. Cowards may be furious, and slaves outrageous; for a time: but among spirits that have once yielded unto slavery, universally it is found true, what Homer saith, God bereaveth a man of half his virtue, that day when he casteth him into bondage.

Of these things, I might perhaps more seasonably have spoken, in the general discourse of Government; but where so lively an example of the calamity following a tyrannical rule, and the use of Mercenaries, thereupon depending, did offer it self, as is this present business of the Carthaginians: I thought that the note would be more effectual, than being barely delivered, as out of a common place.

§. III.

How the war against the Mercenaries was diversely managed by Hanno and Amilcar, with variable success. The bloody councils of the Mercenaries; and their final destruction.

Being now to return unto those Mercenaries, from whom I have thus far digressed, I cannot readily find, by what name henceforth I should call them. They are no longer in pay with the Carthaginians; neither care they to pretend, that they seek their wages already due; so that they are neither Mercenaries, nor Mutineers. Had they all been subjects unto Carthage, then might they justly have been termed Rebels: but Spendius, and others, that were the principal part of them, ought none allegiance to that State, which they endeavoured to subvert. Wherefore I will borrow the name of their late occupation, and still call them Mercenaries, as Polybius also doth.

These, using the advantage of their present strength,

 Utica* is situated in the great bay that enters towards Carthage, not far within the promontory of Apollis. At this time it is called Yeni Viki, or Yeni, and by the Africans themselves, Gord Mokka. Night saith, that the Town is self ruined, and the place whereon it stood, now called Machatus. It was very ancient, and built before Carthage, saith Silvius. As it flourished before Carthage was laid dry; so did it after Carthage was thrown down by the Romans in the third Punic war. Famous it was by the death of Caesar the younger, who held it against Caesar Piscator that worthy Divine, was Bishop thereof in the time of Gracian, the Africas, who lived all the time that Titian; and hath written the story of his cruelties.

strength, besieged.  Utica* and Hippagreta Cities of great importance, as being seated upon the western Haven of Carthage, where it is divided by a neck of land; Hippagreta standing towards upon the great Lake, Utica farther out upon the Sea. Neither was the Camp at Utica abandoned, which lay fitly to hinder the Carthaginians from passing up into the Country: for Mattho and Spendius wanted not men to follow: the war in all parts at once.

How the Carthaginians were amazed with this unexpected peril, any man may conceive. But the business is self awakes them hastily. They are hardly prest on all sides; and therefore travelled their brains the uttermost, how to shake off these furious dogs from their shoulders, who sometimes by night, sometimes by day, came unto the very walls of their City. In this exigent, Hanno was made their General: who failed not in his unbounded diligence of making all good preparation; but had gotten together whatsoever was needful; as well to relieve as to defend the Town, as to batter and assail any place defended against him. With these provisions, and with an hundred Elephants, he came to Utica, so suddenly, that the enemies men surprised a forlorn their Trenches, and retired themselves unto a rising piece of woody ground; where they might be safe against the violence of his beats.

Hanno, thinking that he had to do with Nimrodians, whose outcome was after any loss, to sit two or three whole daies journey off presently attend the Town; to shew himself after this his victory. But these good fellows, against whom he was so war, had learned of Amilcar, to retire and so fight again, many times in one day, as need required. Therefore as soon as they perceived, that he knew not how to use a victory; they assailed their own Camp, and with great slaughter, drove the Carthaginians out of it, forced them to hide themselves within Utica; and got possession of all the shore: that Hanno had brought for the relief of the Town. This had beginning Hanno followed with suitable inclination, losing the benefit of many fair opportunities, and suffering the enemies to take possession of all the entrance from Carthage to the firm land.

The Carthaginians perceiving this, were exceedingly troubled, and did therefore let fall their thete-anchor; sending to the field their great Captain Amilcar, whom they furnished with ten thousand foot of supply, and seventy Elephants. Amilcar had work enough to do, before he should be able to meet with the enemy upon equal ground. For, besides other places of advantage that the Mercenaries had occupied, Hanno had suffered them to win the only Bridge; by which the River Macra, or Bagradas, was passable unto these, that were to travel into the Continent. This River had not many fords, nor those easie for a single man to get over: but upon them all was kept such guard, as gave to Amilcar little hope of prevailing in seeking way by force! As for the Bridge it self, Mattho and his followers were there lodged: and had there built a Town, wherein to lye commodiously, intensive only to the custody thereof. But Amilcar had observed, that the very mouth of Bagradas used to be sometimes cloyed with sand and gravel, that was driven in by certain customary winds, and could not be driven out again, by force of that flow River, till the wind failing, or changing suffered the weight of the waters, to disburden their channel. Hereof he made use; and taking his opportunity passed the River, contrary to all expectation, either of the enemy, or of his own Citizens.

There was no need to bid Spendius look about him, when once it was heard, that Amilcar was come over Bagradas: all the Mercenaries were troubled with the news; knowing that they were no longer to deal with the improvident gravity of Hanno, but with an able spirit, even with their own Master in the Art of War, whom they admired, though they hated him. But this fear was soon changed into presumption; when more than fifteen thousand of their own society, were come from Utica, and other ten thousand from the guard of the Bridge. Their Army was far greater, than that of Amilcar; and they were in their own judgement, the better men; upon which confidence, they resolved to charge him on all sides, and beat him down, in despite of his worth and reputation. With this resolution they attend upon him, watching for some advantage, and still exhorting one another to play the men, and give the onset. Especially they that followed him in the Rear, had a great mind to begin the fight; whereunto their promptness was such, as took from them their former circumspection. Amilcar held his way toward the Bridge, keeping himself on plain grounds, that were fit test for the service of his Elephants, which he placed in front of his Army. Neither made he shew of any desire to fight, but suffered the rashness of his enemies to increase, till it should break into some disorder. At length perceiving, that with more boldness than good heed, they followed him so near, as would be little for their good, if he should turn unto them, he halted his march, even to such a pace, as made a shew little differing from plain fight. The Mercenaries presently fell upon his skirts; believing, that for fear of them he was ready to run away. But whilst they confusedly, as in sudden opinion of victory, were driven at the heels of those that had the Rear; Amilcar wheeled about, and met them in the face, charging them hotly, but in very good order, so that amazed, with the apprehension of unexpected danger, they fled without making any resistance. In this overthrow there were six thousand of the Mercenaries slain, and about two thousand taken, the rest fled, some to the Camp at Utica, others to the Town at the Bridge; whither Amilcar followed them to fast, that he wan the place easily; the enemies being thence also fled unto Tunis, as not having recollected their spirits to make it good.

The fame of this victory, together with the diligence of Amilcar in pursuing it, caused many Towns revolted, partly by fear, partly by force, to return to their former obedience. Yet was not Matho wanting to himself in this dangerous time. He sent about Numidia and Africa, for new supplies; admonishing the people, now or never, to do their best, for the recovery of their freedom: he persuaded Spendius, and Antarius, that was a Captain of the Gauls, to wait upon Amilcar, and always to keep the higher grounds, or at least, the foot of some hills, where they might be free from the Elephants; and he himself continued to press the Town of Hippagreta with an hard siege. It was necessary for Amilcar, in passing from place to place, as his business required, to take such ways as there were: for all the Country lay not level. Therefore Spendius, who still coaxed him, had once gotten a notable advantage of ground; the Carthaginians lying in a plain, surrounded with hills, that were occupied by the Mercenaries, with their Numidian and African succours. In this difficulty, the fame of Amilcar's personal worth did greatly benefit his Country. For Narvajus, a young Gentleman commanding over the Numidians, was glad of his occasion, serving to get the acquaintance and love of so brave a man, which he much desired: and therefore came unto Amilcar signifying his good affection to him, with offer to do him all service. Amilcar joyfully entertained this friend, promised unto him his own daughter in marriage; and so wan from the enemies 2000. horse, that following Narvajus turned unto the Carthaginians side. With this help he gave battle unto Spendius: wherein the Numidian laboured to approve his own valour to his new friend. So the victory was great: for there were slain ten thousand of Spendius's fellows, and four thousand taken prisoners; but Spendius himself, with Antarius the Gaul, escaped to do more mischief. Amilcar dealt very gently with his prisoners: pardoning all offences past, and dismissing as many as were unwilling to become his followers; yet with condition, that they should never more bear arms against the Carthaginians; threatening to take sharp revenge upon all that should break this Covenant.

This humanity was vehemently suspected by Matho, Spendius, and Antarius, as tending to win from them the hearts of their Souldiers. Wherefore they resolved to take such order, that no man among them should dare to trust in the good nature of Amilcar, nor to hope for any safety whilst Carthage was able to do him hurt. They counterfeited letters of advertisement, wherein was contained, that some of their company, respective only of their private benefit, and careless of the general good, had a purpose to betray them all unto the Carthaginians; with whom they held intelligence; and that it was needfull to look well unto Gefco, and his companions; whom these traitors had a purpose to enlarge. Upon this Theme Spendius makes an Oration to the Souldiers, exhorting them to fidelity; and shewing with many words, that the seeming humanity of Amilcar, toward some, was none other than a bait; wherewith to intrap them all at once together; as also telling them what a dangerous enemy Gefco would prove, if he might escape their hands. Whilst he is yet in the midst of his tale, were letters come to the same purpose. Then steps forth Antarius, and speaks his mind plainly: saying, that it were the best, yea, the only way, for the common safety, to cut off all hope of reconciliation with Carthage; that if some were desirous to make their own peace, it would go hard with those that had a care of the war; that it were better to make an end of Gefco his life, than to trouble themselves with looking to his custody; that by such a course every one should be engaged in the present Action, as having none other hope left, than in victory alone; finally, that such as would speak here-against, were worthy to be reputed Traitors. This Antarius was in great credit with the Souldiers, and could speak sundry languages, in such sort, that he was understood by all. According to his motion therefore it was agreed, that Gefco, and all the other prisoners, should forthwith be put to horrible death, by torments. Nevertheless there were some, that for love of Gefco sought to alter his intended cruelty; but they were forthwith stoned to death, as a Document unto others; and so the Decree was put in execution. Neither were they therewithall contented, but further ordained, that all Carthaginian prisoners which they took, should be served in like sort: to want the subjects or friends of Carthage, should lose their hands, and so be sent home, which rule they observed ever afterwards.

Of this cruelty I need say no more, than that it was most execrable ferity. As for the counsel of using it, it was like unto the counsel of Achitophel; All Israel shall bear, that thou art abhorred of thy father, then shall the hands of all that are with thee be strong. Such are the fruits of desperation. He that is past all hope of pardon, is afraid of his own fellows, if they be more innocent; and to avoid the punishment of less offences, committeth greater. The cowardize of Spendius and the revengeful spirits of those that have been wronged, are breeders of this desperation: to which may be added some deficiency of Laws, in distinguishing the punishments of malefactors, according to the degree of their several crimes. A coward thinks all provision too little for his own security. If Phocas be a coward (said the Emperor Mauritius) then is he murderous. To be steadfast and sure, in taking revenge, is thought a point of honour; and a defensive against new injuries. But wrongfully: for it is opposite to the rule of Christianity; and such a quality discovered, makes them deadly enemies, who otherwise would have repented; and sought to make amends, for the wrong done in passion. This was it which wrought so much wrong to the Carthaginians; teaching Matho, and his Associates, to suspect even their gentleness, as the introduction to extremity. Like unto the errors of Princes and Governors, are the errors of Laws. Where one and the same punishment is awarded unto the less offence, and unto the greater, he that hath adventured to rob a man, is easily tempted to kill him, for his own security.

Against these inconveniences, Mercy and Severity, used with due respect are the best remedies. In neither of which Amilcar failed. For as long as these his old Souldiers were any way likely to be reclaimed by gentle courses, his humanity was ready to invite them. But when they were transported with beauly outrage, beyond all regard of honesty and shame, he rewarded their villany with answerable vengeance, casting them unto wild beasts to be devoured.

Until this time Hanno, with the Army under his command, had kept himself apart from Amilcar, and done little as may seem, for that nothing is remembered of him since his late losses. Neither was Amilcar sorry to want his help; as being able to do better without him. But when the war grew to such extremity, as threatened utter ruine to the one or the other side: then was Hanno sent for, and came to Amilcar, with whom he joyined his forces. By this access of strength Amilcar was not enabled to do more than in former times; rather he could now perform nothing: such was the hatred between him and his unworthy Colleague. The Towns of Utica and Hippagreta, that had stood always firm to the Carthaginian party, did now revolt unto the enemy, murdering all the Souldiers that they had in Garrison, and casting their bodies forth, without suffering them to be buried. The provisions brought by sea, for maintenance of the Army, were lost in foul weather; and Carthage it self stood in danger of being besieged, about which Matho and Spendius consulted; whilst one of the Carthaginian Generals did (as it were) bind the others hands.

It hath in all Ages been used as the safest course, to send forth, in great Expeditions, two generals of one Army. This was the common practice of those two mighty Cities Athen and Rome, which other States and Princes have often imitated; persuading themselves, that great Armies are not so well conducted by one, as by two: who out of emulation to excell each other, will use the greater diligence. They have also joyined two chief Commanders in equal commission, upon this further consideration; the better to restrain the ambition of any one, that should be trusted with so great a strength. For hereof all Common-weals have been jealous, having been taught by their examples that have made themselves Tyrants over those Cities and States that have employed them. In this point the Venetians having been so circumspect, as they have, for the most part, trusted strangers, and not their own in all the wars which they have made. It is true, that the equal authority of two commanding in chief, serveth well to bridle the ambition of one or both, from turning upon the Prince or State that hath given them trust: but in managing the war it self, it is commonly the cause of ill success. In wars made near unto Rome it self, when two good friends were Consuls, or such two at least, as concurred in one desire of Triumph, which honour (the greatest of any that Rome could give) was to be obtained by that one years service; it is no marvel, though each of the Consuls did his best, and inferred all his thoughts unto none other end than victory. Yet in all dangerous cases, when the Consuls proceeded otherwise than was desired, one Dictator was appointed, whose power was neither hindered by any partner, nor by any great limitation. Neither was it indeed the manner, to send forth both the Consuls to one war; but each went whither his lot called him, to his own Province; unless one business seemed to require them both, and they also seemed fit to be joyned in the administration. Now although it was so, That the Romans, did many times prevail with their joyned Generals: yet was this never so seldom, without as much concord, as any other virtue of the Commanders. For their modesty hath often been such, that the less able Captain, though of equal authority, hath willingly submitted himself to the other, and obeyed his directions. This notwithstanding, they have many times by obtaining two Commanders of one Army, received great and most dangerous overthrows; wherefore in the second Punic War we shall find examples. On the contrary side, in their wars most remote, that were alwayes managed by one, they seldom failed to win exceeding honour, as hereafter shall appear. Now of those ten Generals, which served the Athenians at the battle of Marathon, it may be truly said, that had not their temper been better than the judgement of the people that sent them forth, and had not they submitted themselves to the conduction of Miltiades; their affairs had found the same success which they found at other times, when they coupled Nicias and Aleibides together in Sicily: the one being so over-wary, and the other so hasty, as all came to nought that they undertook; whereas Cimon alone, as also Aristides, and others, having sole charge of all, did their Country and Common-weal most remarkable service. For it is hard to find two great Captains of equal discretion and valour; but that the one hath more of fury than of judgement, and so the contrary, by which the best occasions are as often overslippt, as at other times many actions are unseasonably undertaken. I remember it well, that when the Prince of Conde was slain after the battle of Jarnac, (which Prince, together with the admiral Chastillon, had the conduct of the Protestant Army) the Protestants did greatly bewail the loss of the said Prince, in respect of his Religion, person, and birth; yet comforting themselves, they thought it rather an advancement, than an hindrance to their affairs. For so much did the Valour of the one out-reach the advisableness of the other, as whatsoever the Admiral intended to win by attending the advantage, the Prince adventured to lose, by being over-confident in his own courage.

But we need no better example, than of the Carthaginians in this present business: who, though they were still sick of their ill-grounded love to Hanno, and were unwilling to disgrace him; yet seeing that all ran towards ruine, through the discord of the Generals, committed the decision of their Controversies, unto the Army that served under them. The judgement of the Army was, that Hanno should depart the Camp: which he did, and Hannibal was sent in his stead, one that would be directed by Amilcar, and that was enough.

After this, the affairs of Carthage began to prosper somewhat better. Matho and Spendius had brought their Army near unto the City, and lay before it, as in a Siege. They might well be bold to hope and adventure much, having in their Camp above fifty thousand, besides those that lay abroad in Garrisons. Nevertheless, the City was so strong for them to win by assault, and the entrance of victuals they could not hinder, if any should be sent in by friends from abroad.

Hieron King of Syracuse, though during the wars in Sicily he assisted the Romans; and still continued in their alliance, yet now fell succours to the Carthaginians: fearing their fall, and consequently his own; because if no other State gave the Romans somewhat to trouble their digestion, the Principality of Syracuse would soon be devoured by them. The Romans all gave them some slender assistance, and, for the present, refused good offers made unto them by the Mercenaries. This they did to shew a noble kind of disposition; which was indeed but counterfeit, as the sequel manifestly proved.

Whilst Matho and his followers were busily pressing the City, Amilcar was as diligent in waiting at their backs, and cutting off

off all that came to their supply: so that finding themselves more straightly besieged by him, than Carthage was by them, they purposed to desist from their vain attempt, and try some other course. Hereupon they issued into the field: when Spendius, and one Zarcas an African Captain assisting the rebellion, take upon them to find Amilcar work; leaving Matho in Tunis, to negotiate with their friends, and take a general care of the business. The Elephants of Carthage, and horse of Naravajus, made Spendius fearful to descend into the Plains. Wherefore he betook himself to his former method of war, keeping the mountains, and rough grounds, or occupying the straightest passages, wherein the desperate courage of his men might shew it self, with little disadvantage. But Amilcar had more skill in this Art, than could be matched by the labour of Spendius. He drew the enemy to many skirmishes; in all which the success was such, as added courage to his own men, and abated the strength and spirit of the Rebels. Thus he continued, provoking them night and day: still intrapping some of them, and sometimes giving them the overthrow in plain battle: until at length he got them into a straight, whence ere they should get out, he ment to take of them a good account. Their judgement was enough to perceive their own disadvantage; and therefore they had the less stomach to fight; but awaiting for help from Tunis, Amilcar prudently foreseeing, that necessity might teach them to dare impossibilities, used the benefit of their present fear, and shut them close up with Trench and Rampart. There they waited miserably, for succour there came not: and having spent all their victuals, were so pinched with hunger, that they fed upon the bodies of their prisoners. This they suffered patiently, as knowing that they had not deserved any favour from Carthage: and hoping that their friends at Tunis would not be unmindful of them. But when they were driven to such extremity, that they were fain to devour their own companions; and yet saw none appearance or likelihood of relief: their obstinacy was broken, and they threatened their Captains with what they deserved, unless they would go forth to Amilcar, and seek such peace as might be gotten. So Spendius, Zarcas, and Antarius, fell to consultation, wherein it was resolved to obey the multitude, and yield themselves, if it were so required, unto the death, rather than perish by the hands of their own companions. Hereupon they sent to crave parley, which is granted; and these three come forth to talk with Amilcar in person. What they could say unto him it is hard to conjecture: yet by the conditions which Amilcar granted, it seems that they took the blame upon themselves, and craved pardon for the multitude. The conditions were, that the Carthaginians should chuse, out of the whole number of these enemies, any ten whom they pleased, to remain at their discretion; and that the rest should all be dismissed, each in his shirt, or in one single coat. When the peace was thus concluded, Amilcar told these Ring-leaders, that he chose them presently, as part of the ten, and so commanded to lay hands on them: the rest he forthwith went to fetch with his whole Army in order. The Rebels, who knew not that peace was concluded upon so gentle Articles, thought themselves betrayed: and therefore amazedly ran to Arms. But they wanted Captains to order them; and the same astonishment that made them break the Covenants of peace, whereof they were ignorant, gave unto Amilcar both colour of Justice, in accomplishing revenge and ease in doing the execution. They were all slain: being forty thousand, or more, in number.

This was a famous exploit: and the news thereof exceeding welcome to Carthage; and terrible to the revolted Cities of Africa. Henceforward Amilcar, with his Naravajus, and Hannibal, carried the war from Town to Town, and found all places ready to yield: Utica & Hippagreta only standing out, upon fear of deserved vengeance; and Tunis, being held by Matho, with the remainder of his Army. It was thought fit to begin with Tunis, wherein lay the chief strength of the enemy. Coming before this Town, they brought forth Spendius, with his fellows, in view of the defendants, and crucified them under the walls; to terrifie those of his old companions, that were still in Arms. With this rigour the siege began; as if speedy victory had been assured. Hannibal quartered on that part of Tunis, which lay toward Carthage. Amilcar on the opposite side: too far asunder to help one another in sudden accidents: and therefore it behoved each to be the more circumspect.

Matho from the walls beheld his own destiny, in the misery of his companion, and knew not how to avoid it otherwise than by a cast at dice with fortune. So he brake out upon that part of the Carthaginian Army, that lay secure, as if all danger were past, under the command of Hannibal; and with so great and unexpected fury he sallied, that after an exceeding slaughter, he took Hannibal prisoner:

prisoner; on whom, and thirty the most noble of the Carthaginian prisoners, he presently revenged the death of Spendius; by the same torture. Of this, Amilcar knew nothing, till it was too late; neither had he strength enough remaining, after this great loss, to continue the siege; but was fain to break it up, and remove unto the mouth of the River Bagradas, where he incamped.

The terror was no less within Carthage, upon the same of this loss, than had been the joy of the late great victory. All that could bear arms, were sent into the field, under Hanno; whom, it seems, they thought the most able of their Captains surviving the late accidents of War. If there were any Law among them forbidding the employment of one sole General near unto their City (for they are known to have trusted one man abroad) the time did not permit, in this hasty exigent, to devise about repealing it. But thirty principal men are chosen by the Senate, to bring Hanno to Amilcar's Camp, and by all good persuasions to reconcile them. This could not be effected in one day. It nearly touched Amilcar in his honour, that the carelessness of Hannibal seemed to be imputed unto him, by sending his enemy to moderate his proceedings. Nevertheless after many conferences, the authority of the Senators prevailed; Amilcar and Hanno were made friends; and thenceforth, whilst this war lasted, Hanno took warning by Hannibal's calamities, to follow good directions, though afterwards he returned to his old and deadly hatred.

In the mean season Matho was come abroad, as meaning to use the reputation of his late success, whilst it gave some life unto his business. He had reason to do as he did; but he wanted skill to deal with Amilcar. The skirmishes, and light exercises of war, wherein Amilcar trained his Carthaginians, did so far abate the strength, and withal diminish the credit of Matho; that he resolved to try the fortune of one battle: wherein either his own desire should be accomplished, or his cares ended. To this conclusion the Carthaginians were no less prone, than Matho; as being weary of these long troubles, and insupportable expences; confident in the valour of their own men, which had approved it self in many trials; and well assured of Amilcar's great worth, whereunto the enemy hath not what to oppose. According to his determination, each part was diligent in making provision: inviting their friends to help; and drawing forth into the field, all that lay in Garrison.

The issue of this battle might have been foretold, without help of witchcraft. Matho, and his followers, had nothing whereon to presume, save their daring spirits, which had been well cooled by the many late skirmishes, wherein they had learned how to run away. The Carthaginians had reason to dare, as having been often victorious; and in all points else they had the better of their enemies; especially (which is worth all the rest) they had such a Commander, as was not easily to be matched in that Age. Neither was it likely that the desire of liberty should work so much, in men accustomed to servitude; as the honour of their State would, in Citizens, whose future and present good lay all at once engaged in that adventure. So the Carthaginians won a great victory, wherein most of the Africans their enemies were slain; the rest fled into a Town, which was not to be defended, and therefore they all yielded; and Matho himself was taken alive. Immediately upon this victory, all the Africans that had rebelled, made submission to their old Masters: Utica only, and Hippagreta stood out, as knowing how little they deserved of favour. But they were soon forced to take what conditions best pleased the victors. Matho and his fellows were led to Carthage in triumph; where they suffered all torments that could be devised, in recompence of the mischiefs which they had wrought in this war. The war had lasted three years, and about four months, when it came to this good end: which the Carthaginians, whose subjects did not love them, should with less expence, by contenting their Mercenaries, have prevented in the beginning.

§. IV.

How the Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, that were in Sardinia, rebelled: and were afterwards driven out by the Islanders. The faithless dealing of the Romans with the Carthaginians, in taking from them Sardinia, contrary to the peace.

WHILST Matho and Spendius were making terrible combustion in Africa; other Mercenaries of the Carthaginians had kindled the like fire in Sardinia: where murdering Bostar the Governour, and other Carthaginians, they were in hope to get, and hold that Island to their own use. Against these, one Hanno was sent with a small Army (such as could be spared in that busy time) consisting likewise of Mercenaries, levied on the sudden. But these companies that followed Hanno, finding it more for their safety, safety, and present profit, to join themselves with those that were already revolted, than to endanger themselves by battle, for the good of that Common-wealth, of which they had no care; began to enter into practice with the Sardinian Rebels, offering to run one course of fortune with them in their enterprise. This their offer was kindly taken; but their faith was suspected. Wherefore to take away all jealousy and distrust, they resolved to hang up their Commander Hanno, and performed it. A common practice: it hath been in all Ages, with those that have undertaken the quarrel of an unjust war, to enjoy the performance of some notorious and villainous act, to those that come in to them as seconds, with offer to partake, and to assist the impious purposes which they have in hand. It is indeed the best pawn, that desperate men can deliver to each other, to perform some such actions, as are equally unpardonable to all.

By such a kind of cruelty did the ungrateful Mantineans murder a Garrison of Achaians, sent unto them for their defence against the Lacedaemonians, by Aratus; who, when he had formerly possessed himself of their City, by right of war, did not only spare the sack and spoil thereof, but gave them equal freedom, with the rest of the Cities united. These revolts are also common in our Court-wars; where, in the Conquests of new fortunes, and making of new parties, and factions, without the depression or destruction of old friends, we cannot be received and trusted by old enemies. Cesont les coups de vieille escrime. These (say the French) be the blows of the old Art of fencing.

These Mercenaries in Sardinia were no whit less violent in their purpose, than were Spendius, and his associates: only they wanted a Matho among them, to negotiate with the inhabitants of the Province. The Islanders were no less glad, than the Souldiers, that the Carthaginians were expelled the Country: but they could not agree about the profit of the victory. The Sardinians thought that it was enough, if they rewarded the souldiers for their pains taken. Contrariwise, the souldiers were of opinion, that the title of the Carthaginians to that Isle, was devolved unto themselves, by right of Conquest. The same quarrel would (in likelihood) have risen between Spendius with his Mercenaries, and their African friends; if the common desire of both had once taken effect: unless the riches of Carthage had served to content them all. But in Sardinia, where there was none other valuable reward, than possession and rule of the Country, the matter was not easily taken up. So they fell to blows; which how they were decided, I know not; but finally the Mercenaries were driven out, and compelled to leave the island in Italy. Before their departure out of Sardinia, they had invited the Romans into it, with a good right, as the Amerines had called them into Sicily. Yet this offer was refused, upon reasons that follow.

Some Italian Merchants had relieved Matho and Spendius with Coin: of whom the Carthaginians took almost five hundred, and held them in prison. Hereof was made a great complaint: so that the Romans sent Embassadors to Carthage, requiring satisfaction. It was no time for the Carthaginians to dispute: they quietly yielded to release them all. This was so kindly taken, that they forbade all their Merchants to trade thenceforth with the Rebels; admonishing them to carry all provisions to Carthage. And upon the same reason did they forbear to meddle with Sardinia, or to accept the City of Utica, offering it self unto their subjection. This might have served as a notable example of the Roman Faith, to all posterity: had not the issue proved, that it was meer regard of greater profit, which kept them so temperate, no longer than the hope lasted of thriving better thereby, than they should have done by open breach of Faith. The whole estate of Carthage depended at that time, upon the virtue of Amilcar: who, had he been overthrown by Spendius or Matho, in one main battle, that mighty City must either have fallen into the barbarous hands of merciless villains, or have humbled her self under protection of the Romans, with whom she had lately striven for superiority. That extreme necessity, wherein Matho reduced the City, by the fortune of one fall made out of Tunis, is enough to prove, that Carthage was not far from such a miserable choice. Wherefore it was not unwise done of the Romans, to make such demonstration of kindness, and honourable dealing, as might invite a rich, but sinking ship, to run her self aground upon their shore. But when all was well ended in Africa, and the Carthaginians began to prepare for the recovery of Sardinia, then did Ambition put off her goodly vizor. The Romans perceiving that Carthage, beyond their hope, had recovered her teer again; began to strike at her head. They entertained the proffer of those Mercenaries, that were fled out of Sardinia; and they denounced war against this enfeebled and impoverished City, under a shameful pretence, that the preparations made for Sardinia, were made indeed against Rome itself. The Carthaginians knew themselves unable to resist, and therefore yielded to the Romans demand; renouncing unto them all their right in Sardinia. But this was not enough. They would have twelve hundred talents, in recompence belike (for I see not what reason they could alledge) of the great fear which they had endured, of an invasion from Carthage. It is indeed plain, that they impudently sought occasion of war. But necessity taught the Carthaginians patience; and the money was payed, how hardly soever it was raised. From this time forward, let not Rome complain of the Punick faith, in breach of Covenants: she herself hath broken the peace already, which Amilcar purposed to make her dearly repent; but what Amilcar lives not to perform, shall be accomplished by Hannibal his renowned Son.

How the Affairs of Carthage went, between the African Rebellion, and the second Punick War.

THE injurious dealings of the Romans, expressing their desire to pick a quarrel; served to instruct the Carthaginians in a necessary lesson; That either they must make themselves the stronger, or else resolve to be obedient unto those that were more mighty. In a City long accustomed to rule, the braver determination easily took place: and the best means were thought upon, for the increase of Puissance and Empire. The strength, and the jealousy of the Romans, forbade all attempts upon the Mediterranean Sea; but the riches of Spain, that lay upon the Ocean, were unknown to Rome: wherefore that Province might serve both to exercise the Carthaginians in war, and to repair their decayed forces, with all needful supplies. Of the Spanish Expedition, the charge and sovereign trust was committed unto Amilcar: upon whom his Country did wholly repose itself; in hope to recover strength by his means, that had saved it from ruin.

Hanno, with some other envious men that were of his faction, took little pleasure in the general love and honour, which daily increased towards Amilcar and his friends. Yet could they not deny him to be the most worthy of command in all the City: only they commended peace and quietness; advising men to beware of provoking the Romans, in whose amity they said, that the felicity of Carthage did consist. By such discourses, harsh to the ears of good Citizens, who had feeling of the wrong done to their Common-weal, they got none other reputation, than of singularity: which the ignorant sort suspected to be wisdom.

But the glory of Amilcar was continually upheld and enlarged, by many notable services that he did, to the singular benefit of his Country. He passed the Straights of Hercules, (now called the Straights of Gibraltar) and landed on the Western coasts of Spain; in which Country, during nine years that he lived there, he subjected unto the State of Carthage the better part of all those Provinces. But finally in a battle that he fought with a Nation in Portugal, called the Vestones, (defending himself a long time with an admirable resolution) he was invironed and slain: carrying with him to the grave the same great honour and fame, by which in many signal victories, he had acquired the name of a second Mars.

After the death of Amilcar, Asdrubal his Son-in-law was made General of the Carthaginian forces in Spain. This was good man of war; but far better in practice and cunning than in deeds of arms. By his notable dexterity in matter of negotiation, he greatly enlarged the Dominion of Carthage: adding to many subjects and confederates thereunto, that the Romans began to grow jealous again of this hasty increase. He built a goodly City upon a commodious Haven, in the Kingdom of Granada, opposite to that of Oran in Africa, and gave it the name of New Carthage, which to this day it nearly retaineth, being called now

* Carthagena. With this success of the Carthaginians in Spain, the Romans were not a little troubled; but began to accuse their own negligence. For whereas they had formerly taken so much pains to beat them out of the Isle of Sicily, as suspecting their neighbourhood there; they had now, by bringing themselves in a war of far less importance, (whereof I shall speak anon) given them leisure without interruption, to recover upon their own Continent, a Dominion by far exceeding both in the bodies of men, and in revenue, that which the Romans had taken from them. But how to help this, at the present they know not; for they daily expected to be invaded by the Gauls, their ancient enemies, and nearest neighbours to the West. But he needeth little help of force, that knoweth himself to be feared: it is enough if he request, request, request shall have the virtue of a command.

Yet were the Romans utterly destitute of all good colour, that might help them to intermeddle in Spain. The Spaniards were then unacquainted with Rome, whereof (in probability) they scarce had heard the name: so that there were no Mutineries, nor other such Rebels, to call in Roman succours; but in the enterprise of Sardinia, the Romans had learned an impudent pretence, that might also serve their turn in Spain. For though it were apparent, that the Spanish affairs had no relation to the peace between these two Cities; and though it were nothing likely, that Asdrubal had any purpose to extend his victories unto the gates of Rome, or to any of the Roman frontiers: yet (as if some such matter had been suspected) they sent unto him, requiring that he should forbear to proceed any further, than to the River of Iberus. In addressing their messengers, rather to Asdrubal, than to the City of Carthage; they seem to have hoped, that howsoever the generality of the Carthaginians had sweetly swallowed many bitter pills, to avoid all occasion of war with Rome, yet the bravery of one man might prove more fastidious, and resenting the injury, return such answer, as would intangle his whole Country in the quarrel, that they so much desired; and might embrace at leisure, when once they had found apparent cause. But Asdrubal finely deluded their expectation. He pretended no manner of dislike at all: and whereas they would have this insolent covenant inserted into the Articles of peace; he took upon him to do it of his own power, with such appearance of conformity to their will, that they went their ways contented, and fought no further.

If it had been so, that the State of Carthage, thereunto pressed by the Romans, for fear of present war, had ratified this new compulsion made by Asdrubal; yet should it not have stood bound in honour, to observe the same carefully, unless an oath had also been extorted, to make all sure. But since all passed quietly, under the bare authority of Asdrubal, this Capitulation was none other in effect than a second breach of peace; whereof the Romans might be accused more justly, than they could accuse the Carthaginians of perjury, (as they after did) for refusing to stand to it.

By this Treaty with Asdrubal, the Romans won some reputation in Spain. For when it was once conceived by the Spaniards, that the City which would needs be Mistress over them, stood in fear herself of receiving blows from a bolder Dæmone; there were soon found some, that by offering themselves to the protection of Rome, became (as they thought) fellow-servants with Carthage. But the Carthaginians will shortly reach them another lesson. The Saguntines, a people on the South-side of Iberus, entered into confederacy with the Romans, and were gladly accepted. Surely it was lawful unto the Romans to admit the Saguntines, or any other people (neither subject, nor open enemy in war to the Carthaginians) into their society: and unlawful it was unto the Carthaginians, to use violence towards any that should thus once become confederate with Rome. Nevertheless, if we consider the late agreement made with Asdrubal, we shall find that the Romans could have none other honest colour of requiring it, than an implicit covenant of making the River Iberus a bound, over which they themselves would not pass, in any Discovery or Conquest by them intended to be made upon Spain: in which regard, they might have some honest pretence to require the like of the Carthaginians; though Rome, as yet, had no foot on the one side of Iberus, whereas Carthage on the other side of that River, held almost all the Country. Howsoever it were, this indignity was not so easily digested, as former injuries had been. For it was a matter of ill consequence, that the Nations which had heard of no greater power than the Carthaginians, should behold Saguntum resting securely among them, upon confidence of help from a more mighty City. Wherefore either in this respect, or for that the sense is most feeling of the latest injuries; or rather for that now the Carthaginians were of power to do themselves right: war against Saguntum was generally thought upon, let the Romans take it how they list. In such terms were the Carthaginians, when Asdrubal dyed, after he had commanded in Spain eight years (being slain by a slave, whose Master he had put to death) and the Great Hannibal, Son of the Great Amilcar, was chosen General in his stead.

§. VI.

The state of Greece from the death of Pyrrhus, to the reign of Philip the Son of Demetrius in Macedon.

IN the long term of the first Punick war, and the vacation following, between it and the second; the estate of Greece, after the death of Pyrrhus, was grown somewhat like unto that, wherein Philip of Macedon had found it; though far weaker, as the

M m m m m 2 after

after spring. The whole Country had recovered by degrees, a form of liberty: in petty tyrannies (bred of those inferiour Captains, which in the times of general combustion, had seized each upon such towns as he could get) were, by force or accident, extirpated, and reformed; and some States were risen to such greatness, as not only served to defend themselves, but to give protection to others. This conversion to the better, proceeded from the like dissensions and tumults in Macedon, as had been in Greece, when Philip first began to encroach upon it. For after many quarrels and great wars, about the Kingdom of Macedon, between Antigonus the elder, Cassander, Demetrius, Lysimachus, Seleucus, Pyrrius, and the Gauls: Antigonus the son of Demetrius, finally got and held it, reigning six and thirty years; yet so, that he was divers times thence expelled, not only by the Gauls, and by Pyrrius, as hath been already shewed, but by Alexander the Son of Pyrrius the Epirot from whose father he had hardly won it. This happened unto him, by the revolt of his Souldiers, even at such time, as having overthrown with great slaughter an Army of the Gauls, he was converting his forces against the Athenians, whom he compelled to receive his Garrisons. But his young son Demetrius raised an Army, wherewith he chased Alexander, not only out of Macedon, but out of his own Epirus, and restored his Father to the Kingdom.

By the help of this young Prince Demetrius (though in another kind) Antigonus got into his possession the Citadel of Corinth; which was justly termed the fetter of Greece. This Citadel called Acrocorinthus, stood upon a steep rocky hill on the North side of the Town, and was by nature and art so strong, that it seemed impregnable. It commanded the Town; which was of much importance, as occupying the whole breadth of the Isthmus, that running between the Aegean and Ionique Seas, joyneth Peloponnesus to the Main of Greece. Wherefore he that held possession of this Castle was able to cut off all passage by land, from one half of Greece unto the other; besides the commodity of the two Seas, upon both of which, this rich and goodly City had commodious havens. Alexander, the son of Polyperchon; and after his death, Crateipolis his wife, had gotten Corinth in the great shuffling of Provinces and Towns, that was made between Alexander Princes. Afterwards it passed from hand to hand, until it came, I know not how, to one Alexander; of whom I find nothing else, than that he was thought to be poisoned by this Antigonus, who deceived his wife Nicea thereof, and got it from her by a trick. The device was this: Antigonus sent his young son Demetrius to Corinth, willing him to court Nicea, and seek her marriage. The foolish old widow perceived not how unfit a match she was for the young Prince, but entertained the fancy of marriage; whereto the old King was even as ready to consent, as was his son to desire, and came thither in person to solemnize it. Hereupon all Corinth was filled with sacrifices, feasts, plaies, and all sorts of games: in the midst of which, Antigonus watched his time, and got into the Castle, beguiling the poor Lady, whose jealousy had been exceeding diligent in keeping it. Of this purchase he was so glad, that he could not contain himself within the gravity befitting his old age. But as he had stolen it; so was it again stolen from him: neither lived he to revenge the loss of it, being already spent with age.

Demetrius, the son of this Antigonus, succeeding unto his Father, reigned ten years. He made greater proof of his virtue before he was King, than after. The Dardanians, Ætolians, and Acheans, held him continually busied in war; wherein his fortune was variable, and for the more part ill. About these times the power of the Macedonians began to decay; and the Græcians to cast off their yoke.

Philip, the only son of Demetrius, was a young child when his Father dyed; and therefore Antigonus, his Uncle, had the charge of the Kingdom, during the minority of the Prince; but he assumed the name and power of a King, though he respected Philip as his own son, to whom he left the Crown at his death; This Antigonus, was called the Tutor, in regard of his Protectorship; and was also called Doson, that is as much as, Will-give, because he was slow in his liberality. He repressed the Dardanians and Chæsalians, which molested his Kingdom, in the beginning of his reign. Upon confidence of this good service, he took state upon him, as one that rather were King in his own right, than only a Protector. Hereupon the people fell to mutiny; but were soon appeased by fair words, and a seeming unwillingness of his to meddle any more with the Government. The Achaïans took from him the City of Athens, soon after Demetrius his death; and likely they were to have wrought him out of all, or most that he held in Greece, if their own estate had not been endangered by a nearer enemy. But civil dissension, which had overthrown the power of Greece, when it flourished most, overthrew it easily now again, when it had scarcely recovered strength after a long sickness; and gave to this Antigonus no less authority therein, than Philip the Father of Alexander, got by the like advantage.

These Achaïans from small beginnings, had increased in short time to great strength and fame: so that they grew the most redoubted Nation of all the Greeks. By the equality of their Laws, and by their clemency (notwithstanding that they were a long time held under by the Macedonians and Spartans) they did not only draw all others by their love and alliance, but induced, through their example, the rest of the Cities of Peloponnesus, to be governed by one Law, and to use one and the same sort of weights, measure, and money.

Aratus, the Sicyonian, was the first that united them again; and gave them courage, after that they had been by the Macedonian Captains divided into many Principalities. In elder times they were governed by Kings, as most of the great Cities of Greece were; to which kind of rule they first subjected themselves, after the descent of the Heracleide, when Tisamenus the son of Orestes possessed the Territory of Achaia. In this estate they continued to the time of Gyges, after whom, when his sons sought to change the Legal Government of their Predecessors unto Tyranny, they expelled them, and made their State popular; as seeming most equal. This form of Common-weal had continuance, with some small changes according to the diversity of times, till the reign of Philip and Alexander Kings of Macedon: who tempest-like overturned all things in that part of the world. For those twelve Cities, called the Cities of Alliance (whereof, Helice, and Bura or Olenus, the Sea had eaten up a little before the Battel of Leuctres) were, by disturbance of the Macedonians, divided from each other, and trained into a war, no less foolish than cruel, among themselves. But in the one hundred and four and twentieth Olympiad (in which, or near it, Ptolemy the son of Lagus, Lysimachus, Seleucus, and Ptolemy Ceraneus, left the world) two of ten remaining Cities and people, namely, the Patrenses and the Dimeis, united themselves, and laid the foundation of the general accord, and re-union, which after followed. For having been, some of them Partisans with sundry Macedonian Captains, and others having been governed by petty Kings; they began to fasten themselves in a strong league of amity, partly, in the Olympiad before spoken of, and partly, at such time as Pyrrius made his first voyage into Italy. Now after the uniting of the Patrenses and Dimeis, to whom also the Cities of Tiræa, and Phara, joyned themselves; Agira chased out her Garrisons; and the Burians, killing their Kings, entered with the Ceraneians into the same Confederacy. These Cities, for twenty and five years, used the same form of Government with the Achaïans; who by a Senator and two Prætors, ordered all things in their Common-weal; and soon after by one Prætor, or Commander: of which, Marcus Caryneus was the first, and Aratus the second.

This Aratus was a noble young Gentleman of Sicyon, who, living at Argos in exile, whilst his Country was oppressed by Tyrants, found means, through the help of other banished men, to enter their own City by night, with ladders; whence they chased the Tyrant, and restored the people to liberty. This was in the time of Antigonus Gonatas King of Macedon, a Prince more busie in watching what to get among the Greeks, than wise in looking to his own. For fear of Antigonus, the Sicyonians enter into the Achaïan league: which though at that time it received more increase by their accession than it added strength to them; yet the benefit of this conjunction served well enough against Antigonus, whose subtlety was somewhat greater than his valour. As the industry and counsel of Aratus delivered his County from bondage, and fortified it by the Achaïan league; so further, by his great liberality, with the exceeding great cost of 150. talents, he pacified the inexplicable controversies, between the banished Sicyonians, which returned with him, and the other Citizens that had possession of these mens Lands; as also with the same money he drew many others to assist him in those enterprises following, that redounded to the singular good of all Achaia. The money he obtained of Ptolemy Evergetes King of Ægypt; who partly had a desire to hold some strong and sure friendship in Greece, partly was delighted with the conversation of Aratus himself, that made a dangerous voyage to him into Ægypt, and fed his pleasure in goodly pictures, with the gift of many curious pieces, wherein the workmen of Sicyon excelled.

The first of Aratus his great attempts, was the surprize of the Acrocorinthus or Citadel of Corinth; which he was by night, being thereto guided by some thieves that he had hired for the purpose, who living in the place, had practised to rob Antigonus his his treasury, passing in and out by a secret path among the rocks. Yet was he fain to fight for it, ere he could get it: though indeed Antigonus his Souldiers were rather overcome by their own fear, than by any force of the assailants; as mistrusting lest the Achaïans were more in number, than in truth they were, and having lost the advantages of the place already, upon which they had presumed, before they were aware of any enemy.

In these kinds of night-services, ambushments, surprises, and practices, Aratus was very cunning, adventurous, and valiant: in open field, and plain battail, he was as timorous. By this strange mixture of cowardize and courage, he mixtured argument of disputation, to Philosophers and others: Whether a valiant man (as he was esteemed, and in some cases approved) might look pale and tremble, when he began battail; and Whether the virtue of Fortitude were diversified, by the sundry natures of men, and in a manner confined unto several sorts of action. In resolving which doubts it may be said, that all virtue is perfected in men by exercise, wherein they are trained by occasion: though a natural inclination standeth in need of little practice; whereas the defect hereof must be supplied with much instruction, use, good success, and other help, yet hardly shall grow absolute in general: Such was Aratus in matter of War. In sincere affection to his Country he was unprovable, and so acknowledged: as his following actions will truly testify.

When Acrocorinthus was taken, and joynted unto the Common-wealth of Achaia, the Megarians revolted soon after from Antigonus, and entred into the same Corporation. So did the Trachinians, and the Epidaurians: whereby this new erected State grew so powerful, that it adventured to take Athens, from the Macedonians, and Argos and Megalopolis, from tyrants that held them. The enterprise upon the Athenians was of none effect. For though Aratus wasted the Isle of Salamis, to shew his strength, and sent home the Athenian prisoners, without ranfome, to allure the City by shew of love; yet the Athenians stirred neither against him, nor for him, as being now grown honest slaves to the Macedonians. Upon Argos the adventure was carried more strongly. The Achaïans came sometimes to the gates of the City, but the people stirred not: once they entred it, and might have won it, if the Citizens would have lent any help to the recovery of their own freedom; 3 sundry times, and with divers events, they fought with the Tyrants, (who rose up one after another in Argos) in open field, and slew one of them in battail; but all sufficed not: untill at length Aristomachus the Tyrant was so terrified, periwaded, and hired by Aratus, that he consented to resign his Estate. The like did Xenon the Tyrant of Hermione, and Cleonymus, that had oppressed the Phliasians.

Whilst this business with the Argives was on foot, Lysidas the Tyrant of Megalopolis, was so well handled by Aratus, that, without compulsion, he gave liberty to his City, and annexed it to the Council of Achaia: whereby he got such credit, that he was chosen General of their forces (which was a yearly Office, and might not be held two years together by one man:) every second year, for a certain while, he and Aratus succeeded one another by turns. But those late Tyrants, and new Citizens; Lysidas and Aristomachus, were carried with private passion from care of the general good; in which courses they opposed Aratus, to the great hurt of Achaia, as shall appear in due time.

The Achaïans having obtained so much puissance and reputation, that Ptolemy King of Egypt was become Patron of their Alliance, and (in title of honour) General of their forces by Sea and Land; made open War upon Demetrius the son of Antigonus Gonatus, for the liberty of Athens. It is strange and worthy of noting, That when Aratus in this quarrel had lost a battail, the Athenians wore Garlands, in sign of joy, to flatter their good Lords the Macedonians, that had won the victory. Such were now the Athenians become; in whom the rule was verified, that holds true in general of the multitude, Aut humiliter servit, aut superbe dominatur; It is either base in service, or insolent in command. Nevertheless when Demetrius was dead, Aratus performed that by money, which he could not by force; and corrupting the Captain of the Macedonian Garrison, purchased liberty to the Athenians, who thenceforth held good correspondence with the Achaïans, loving them, and speaking well of them, which was all that they could do: but into their Corporation they entred not, scorning it belike, in regard of their own out-worn glory.

Now as the Common-wealth of Achaia daily increased within Peloponnesus, by justice and honesty; so did the Ætolians, in the utter part of Greece, yea and within Peloponnesus it self, wax very powerful, by strictness of body, and rude courage in fight, without help of any other virtue. They had stoutly defended themselves against Antipater and Craterus; partly by daring to do and suffer much, partly by the natural strength and fastness of their Country; but especially by the benefit of the time, which called away these famous Captains to other business, as hath been related. They had molested Cassander, in favour of Antigonus, and were themselves as much plagued by him, and by the Acarnanians, a little, but a stout Nation, that took his part. Afterwards they had to do with Demetrius, the Son of the first Antigonus, and more or less with all the Kings of Macedon succeeding him. They likewise held often war with the Acarnanians, Atthamanians, Epirots, and many Cities in Peloponnesus: so that they were hardened with a perpetual travail; seldom putting off their Armour. But their hardiness ill deserved the name of valour, seeing they had no regard of honesty or friendship, measuring all things by their own insolent wills, and thinking all people base-minded, that were not as fierce and outrageous as themselves.

These Ætolians had lately made great spoils in Peloponnesus, and occupied a good part of the Country. They had invaded the friends of the Achaïans; taken and sacked Palene; where, although they were soundly beaten by Aratus, yet their desire of gain made them make a new voyage thither, as to a Country wherein somewhat was to be gotten. But they were forced to look another way, by Demetrius the Son of Antigonus Gonatus: who pressed them so hardly, that they were driven to seek help of the Achaïans, which they obtained. The war which the Achaïans made upon Demetrius, without Peloponnesus, in Attica, though it tended to expelling the Macedons out of Greece, yet the benefit thereof redounded chiefly unto the Ætolians, at whose instance it was set on foot: for thereby were the Macedonian forces diverted from them. Neither was this good turn unacknowledged; though very basely the Ætolians, giving thanks in words, devised how to requite the benefit with some great mischief. They saw that the Achaïans were desirous to bring all Peloponnesus into their Alliance and Corporations: of which intent, the Lacedemonians were very jealous. Wherefore these Ætolians laboured earnestly to set the Lacedemonians and Achaïans together by the ears: hoping that if this might come to pass, they themselves should be called in to help (it skilled not on what side) and so get no small share, both in booty and Territory. Neither did they forbear to communicate this their device unto Antigonus; offering to make him partaker of their gain, whom they knew to be offended with the many losses, that this Kingdom hath sustained by the Achaïans. Of this plot Aratus was aware: who therefore determined to suffer many indignities, rather than to give the Lacedemonians cause to take Arms. But this resolution was taken somewhat too late: and not altogether in his own power to hold. He had been meddling with the Acadians, that were dependants of Lacedemon: and thereby had provoked the Lacedemonians to look about them; seeing that all Peloponnesus, excepting themselves, the Eleans, and a few Acadians their friends (who also were attempted) was already become Achaean.

The City of Sparta was in ill case about these times; and subject to the injuries of any stronger neighbour. Pyrrhus had greatly weakened it; The Ætolians entering Liconia with an Army, had carried away fifty thousand slaves; and, which was worse, their discipline was corrupted, Avarice and Luxury reigned among them, the poor was oppressed by the rich, and the generosity of spirit, that had sometime been their general virtue, was hardly now to be found among the best of them. There was left in Sparta no more than seven hundred natural Citizens; of whom not above one hundred had Lands: all the rest were needy people, and desirous of innovation. Hereupon followed intestine sedition; which endangered the City most of all. Agis a good King, who sought to reform the disorders of the State, exhorted the people to a strict observation of Lycurgus his Laws. To which purpose he caused them to pass an Act, for the abolishing of all debts, and equal division of Lands. All the younger, and poorer sort were glad of this: but the rich men opposed it. These had recourse unto Leonidas the other King, (for in Sparta were two Kings) who took their part: being himself a dissolute man, as one trained up in the Court of Syria, whence also he had his wife. In this contention Leonidas was expelled the City, and a new King chosen in his stead. But Agis his friends and Counsellors in this enterprise, abused his good meaning to their own private commodity. They were hasty to take away all debts, and cancel all bonds, for they themselves were deeply indebted: but the division of Lands they afterwards hindered, because their own possessions were great. Hence arose a tumult in Sparta, which these men increased by their foul oppression of the poorer Citizens. So that in fine, Leonidas was brought home, and restored to his Kingdom, and the two adverse Kings driven to take Sanctuary; out of which, Cleombrotus, the late-made King, was dismissed into exile: but Agis was trained forth, drawn into prison, and there by his enemies condemned and strangled, together with his Mother, and his old Grand-mother. The like to this was never known in sparta: and (which is the more odious) this cruelty proceeded from the Ephori, Magistrates that should have given Patronage to the Laws, using their power, and more power than to them belonged, against a King, that had proceeded orderly in reforming the City as the Law required.

The death of Agis was much lamented by all good Citizens; and served to establish the impotent rule of a few tyrannical oppressors. In which case Aratus might well hope to adjoin Lacedæmon to the Acheans Commonwealth: though it were great injustice to take such advantages, and attempt by force, that which would have redounded to the general good of Peloponnesus, and to the benefit of Sparta itself, if it could have been wrought by perswasion.

But the same man who redressed the disorders of Sparta, and revenged the death of Agis, did also requite the unjust attempts of the Acheans, even in their own kind: obstructing upon them by force an union of all Peloponnesus, though little to their good liking, for that the Lacedæmonians and their King, should have been the principal; not they and their Prætor. Leonidas having thus caused Agis to be slain, took his wife that was very rich and beautiful, and gave her in marriage (perforce) to his own Son Cleomenes. This young Prince fell greatly inamoured on his wife, and sought to win her affection, as well as he had her person. He discoursed much with her about the purpose of her former husband Agis, and by pitying his misfortune, began to entertain a desire of accomplishing that, wherein Agis had failed. So coming himself to be King, whilst he was very young, he gladly embraced all occasions of War: for that he hoped by strong hand to effect that, which Agis by proceeding formally in so corrupt an estate of the City, had attempted to his own ruine. Therefore when the Ephori gave him in charge, to take and fortifie Atheneum, a Temple on the marches of Liconia, to which both they and the Megalopolitans pretended title; he readily performed it. Hereof Aratus made no complaint, but sought to take by surprize Tægea and Orthomenus, Cities then Confederate with the Lacedæmonians: wherein, his intelligence failing, he lost the labour of a painful night travel, and discovered his enmity to Sparta; of which Cleomenes was nothing sorry. By these degrees the war began. In the entrance whereto Aratus had discovered the Ætolian practice, and therefore would have stayed the quarrel from proceeding too far. But Lysidas and Aristomachus would needs fight, and he could do none other than be ruled by them; especially seeing Cleomenes was so urgent. Aristomachus was at that time General of the Acheans, (He and Lysidas being of great account, since they had abandoned their tyranny) who sent unto Aratus, lying then in Athens, and required his assistance in a journey to be made into Laconia. No dissuasions of Aratus would serve, therefore he came in person, and took part of a business, little pleasing him in the present, and less in the future. When he met with Cleomenes, he durst not fight; but opposed himself against Aristomachus, who desired to give battel. Yet had the Acheans twenty thousand foot; and one thousand horse, in their Army: whereas Cleomenes had no more than five thousand in all. This gave reputation to the Lacedæmonians, and raised an ill report upon Aratus; which Lysidas helped to make worse, by accusing his cowardize. Nevertheless the Acheans would not fall out with Aratus their Benefactor, but chose him their General the year following; against Lysidas his accuser that sued for the place. Being General himself, it behoved him to confute with deeds, the slanderous words of Lysidas. Therefore he purposed to set upon the Eleans: but was met withal on the way, near unto the Mount Lycæus, by Cleomenes, who vanquished him in a great battel; and drave him to hide himself all night for fear, so that he was thought to have been slain. This misadventure Aratus recompenced by a trick of his own more natural occupation: performing with his broken Army, that which could hardly have been expected, had been victorious. For whilst there was no suspicion of any great matter that he could undertake; he suddenly wrought with some of the Mantineans, who did let him into their City. These Mantineans, (whom he had thus brought to his purpose) had once before joyned themselves with the Acheans; but shortly upon fear, or some other passion, they gave themselves to the Ætolians; and from the Ætolians, presently after this victory, to Cleomenes, from whom immediately they were thus won. For this their levity they were not punished, but freely admitted now again into the Achean society. As this good good success repaired the credit of Aratus; to another battel almost ruined it. Cleomenes and he encountered near unto Megalopolis; where the Acheans had somewhat the better at the first, but their General durst not follow his advantage. Thereupon Lysidas, of whom we spake before, grew somewhat impatient with anger; and taking with him all the horse, brake upon the Lacedæmonians whom he routed at the beginning, but pursuing them too far into places of hard passage, he was slain by them, and his followers driven back upon their own Compansions: in such sort, that finally all the Army was disordered and put to flight. This was a great loss, and incensed the Acheans against Aratus; yet their indignation proceeded no further, than that they refused to make any longer contribution, towards the pay of those Mercenaries which he had waged. This Aratus took patiently, and followed the war nevertheless; wherein though Cleomenes won some Towns, and Aratus got the better in one small fight, yet little of importance was done; the Acheans being weary, and the Spartan King intente to another business.

Cleomenes having led into the field all that were like to hinder his purpose, and sized them with painfull journeys, forsook the Acheans was on a sudden, and came unexpected home to Sparta, where he slew the Ephori, and restored by force the ancient discipline of Lycorgus. Then he gave an account of his doings, and shewing by what degrees the Ephori had incroached upon the power of Kings, and many disorders had grown in the City; he justified his proceedings, and forthwith began to make equal division of the Lands, reducing all to the first institution. He also supplied the defect of Citizens, by chusing new, out of such as were friends to the State, and valiant men: so that henceforth his Country might not altogether stand in need of Mercenary help, as it lately had done, to save it self from the Ætolians, Argives, and such other enemies. All this was dispatched in great haste; the Spartans well satisfied, and Cleomenes himself ready in the field, ere his enemies could take any advantage of these his domestical troubles.

The Acheans hearing of this great alteration in Sparta, thought that it would be long ere Cleomenes durst issue forth of the City, for fear of some rebellion. But it was not long ere they heard, that he had wasted all the Countrey of Megalopolis; had ranged over all Arcadia at his pleasure; and was admitted into Mantineæ; and ready to take other places, even of Achaia. These news displeased them not a little: but they must patiently endure to hear worse. For when Cleomenes had shaken off the power of the Ephori, that curbed his authority, he proceeded more roundly in his work, being better obeyed, and by better men. His Lacedæmonians resumed their ancient courage; and he himself had the heart to demand the Principality of Greece. He did not therefore henceforth contend about the possession of a few Towns: but adventured to win or lose all. The Ætolians, in favour of his attempt, declared themselves on his side: and whereas he had gotten Mantineæ, Tægea, and other places; to which they had some title, they willingly renounced all their interest unto him.

Aratus did apprehend the danger of his Countrey, and saw that Antigonus, with the Ætolians, or perhaps without them, would shortly make an end of that, which Cleomenes had thus begun. Therefore he advised how to provide against the worst, and either to repair all, or (if it could not be) to save all from utter ruine. The office of General, when it was next put upon him, he refused; fearing to be so far prest, as to hazard in one battel all the force of his Countrey, to which as he had never any affection, nor perchance courage, so was his manner of warfare otherwise. For he commonly attempted by surprize, and defended upon the advantage of place, after the manner of the Irish, and of all other Nations, overcharged with numbers of men. Yet did he not forsake the care of the Weal-publick, though in aiming at the general good, it seems that private passion drew him into an ill course. He saw that Megalopolis could not be defended without making a dangerous hazard of battel; that Mantineæ had not only opened her gates unto Cleomenes, but slain the Achean Garrison that lay therein; that other Towns had yielded unto him, without compulsion; and that Aristomachus, once Tyrant of Argos, and since General of the Acheans, was now revolved unto the enemy following the fortune of Cleomenes. Ptolemy was too far off to help; and the nearness of Antigonus was very dangerous; yet might be useful, if this King would (as Polybius saith) like others, be friend or enemy, as should best agree with his own profit. To make trial hereof, Aratus practised with some of Megalopolis, whom he found apt unto his purpose; and instructed them how to deal with Antigonus, and the Acheans.

The City of Megalopolis had been well affected

affected to the Macedonians, ever since the time of Philip the Father of Alexander, who had obliged it unto him by some special benefits. At this time it lay nearest unto the danger; was very faithfull, and therefore deserved succour; yet could not well be relieved by the Achaens, with their own proper strength. Wherefore it was thought meet, that Embassadors should be sent unto the General Council of Achaia, requesting leave and good allowance, to try the favour of Antigonus in their necessity. This was granted, for lack of what else to answer; and the same Embassadors dispatched away to Antigonus. They did their own errand briefly; telling him of the good will and respect which their City had of long time born unto him and his Predecessors; of their present need; and how it would agree with his honour to give them aid. But when they delivered the more general matter, wherein Aratus had given them instruction; shewing how the ambition of Cleomenes, and violence of the Ætolians, might redound to his own great loss or danger, if the one and the other were not in time prevented; how Aratus himself did stand affected; and what good likelihood there was of reducing the Achaens under the Patronage of Macedon; then began Antigonus to lend a more attentive ear to their discourse. He embraced the motion; and to give it the more life, he wrote unto the Megalopolitans, that his help should not be wanting, so far forth as it might stand with the Achaens good liking. Particularly he commended himself by these Messengers to Aratus, assuring them, that he thought himself highly bound to this honourable man, whose former actions he now perceived not to have been grounded upon any hatred to the Macedonians, but only upon a just and worthy love to his own Notion. With this answer they returned to Megalopolis; and are presently sent away to the Council of Achaia; there to make some speedy conclusion, as the necessity of the time required. The Achaens were glad to hear, that Antigonus was so inclinable to their desires; and therefore were ready to entertain his favour, with all good correspondence. Hereunto Aratus gave his consents; and praised the wisdom of the Courtmen, that so well discerned the best and likeliest means of their common safety: adding nevertheless, that it were not amiss, first of all to try their own ability; which if it failed, then should they do well to call in this gracious Prince, and make him their Patron and Protector. Thus he shewed himself moderate; in that which himself of all others did most wish: to the end, that he might not afterward sustain the common reprehension, if any thing fell out amiss; since it might appear, that he had not been Author of this Decree, but only followed, and that leisurely, the general consent.

Nevertheless, in true estimation, this fineness of Aratus might have been used, with his greater commendation, in a contrary course. For it had been more honourable to make an end of the war, by yielding unto Cleomenes that power which they gave unto Antigonus; since thereby he should both have freed his Country from all further trouble; and withall, should have restored unto the universal state of Greece, that honourable condition, whereof the Macedonians had benefited it. But it is commonly found, (which is great pity) that Virtues, having risen to honour by degrees, and confirmed it self, (as it were) in the seat of principality, by length of time, and success of many actions, can ill endure the hasty growth of any other reputation, whereunto it sees it self liable to be overtopped. Other cause to despise the Lacedæmonians there was none, than that they lately had been in dangerous case: neither could any reason be found, why Aratus should prefer Antigonus before Cleomenes, than that he had stood in doubt of the one, when he thought himself more mighty than the other. Wherefore he was justly plagued, when he saw his own honours reversed by the insolent Macedonians; and instead of living as a companion with Cleomenes, that was descended of a long race of Kings, the posterity of Heracles, was fain to do sacrifice unto Antigonus, as unto a god; and was finally poisoned by Philip, whose Nobility was but of five descents, and whom perhaps he might have seen his fellows, if he had not made them his Lords. By this inclination to the Macedonians, the love of Ptolemy was lost; who forthwith took part with Cleomenes, though he did not supply him with such liberality, as he had used to the Achaens; being warned, as may seem, by their example, to be more wary both in trusting and disburting. Cleomenes himself, whilst this business with Antigonus was a-foot, passed through Arcadia with an Army, and laboured by all means to draw the Achaens to battel. At the City of Dyme in Achaia were assembled all the remaining forces of the Nation; with which it was concluded to make trial; whether perhaps they might amend their estate, without seeking help of the Macedonian. Thither went Cleomenes, and there fought with them; where he had so great a victory, that the enemy was no longer able to keep the open field. The calamity was such, that Aratus himself durst not take upon him to be their General, when his turn came in the next election. Wherefore the Achaens were compelled to sue for peace; which was granted upon this easie condition: That they should not arrogate unto themselves the command of Peloponnesus, but suffer the Lacedæmonians (as in former ages) to be their Leaders in war. Hereunto if they would condescend, he promised unto them, that he would presently restore all places taken from them, and all his prisoners ransom-free: also that they should enjoy their own Laws and Liberties without molestation. This gentle offer of Cleomenes was very pleasing to the Achaens: who desired him to come to the City of Lerna, where a Parliament should be held, for the conclusion of the war.

Now seeming the affairs of Greece likely to be settled in better order, than they had ever been since the beginning of the Peloponnesian Wars, yea, or since the Persian invasion: when God, who had otherwise disposed of these matters, hindred all with a draught of cold water, which Cleomenes drank in great heat, and thereupon fell extrem sick, and so could not be present at Lerna, but caused the Parliament to be deferred to another time. Nevertheless he sent home the chief of his prisoners; to shew that he meant none other than good faith. By this fair dealing he confirmed the Achaens in their desire of his friendship; who assembled again at Argos, there to establish the League. But Aratus was violently bent against it, and fought by great words; and terrible threats, to make his Country-men afraid of resolving. When all would not serve turn, he betook himself to his cunning; and sent word to Cleomenes, that he should do well to leave his Army behind him, and come alone into Argos, receiving hostages for safety of his person. Cleomenes, was already far on his way, when he met with this advertisement; and took it in ill part, that he should be thus deluded. For it had been an easie matter, to have told him so much at the first, & not have made him come so far with an Army, which afterwards he must dismiss. Yet that which chiefly seems to have troubled him, was the drift of his opposers; who fought thereby; either to make him wait without the gates, and deal only with themselves and their Messengers, or if he would adventure himself into the City, then to deprive him of all Royal shew, that might breed respect of him in the multitude. This was that indeed which Aratus feared, and for which he sought to hinder his coming thither in person; lest the people, hearing the promises of Cleomenes ratified by his own mouth, should presently be won with his gentle words, and finish the bargain without more ado. Therefore Cleomenes wrote unto the whole Council, bitterly complaining against these juggling tricks; and Aratus was not far behind with him in as bitter an Oration. So between fear of the one, and reverence of the other, the Assembly knew not how to proceed, but abruptly brake up, leaving all, as it were to fortune. Cleomenes took his advantage of their present weakness, and renewed the War. Many Cities yielded unto him willingly; many he forced; and partly by force, partly by terror, he won Argos, which never King of Sparta before him could do. In this case Aratus sent his own son to Antigonus, intreating him to defer no time, but come presently to relieve the distressed Achaens. Antigonus gave good words as could be wished; saving that he utterly refused to do any thing, unless he might first have Acrocorinthus put into his hands. This demand was somewhat like unto that of the Hunter, who promised to help the horse against his enemy the Stag; but with condition, that the horse should suffer him to be saddled and bridled. Aratus was herewithall contented; but wanting all honest colour to do it; seeing, the Corinthians had no way deferred to be thus given away to the Macedonians. Yet at length an occasion was found; for that, the Corinthians, perceiving what he intended, were minded to arrest him. So he withdrew himself out of their City, and sent word to Antigonus, that their Castle should be ready to let him in. The Corinthians on the other side ran to Cleomenes; who lost no time, but made halt with them to Corinth, where he sought how to get possession of their Castle, or at least to save it from Antigonus, by surrounding it within Trenches, that none might issue nor enter without his leave. Whilst this was doing, he took special order, that Aratus his house and goods, within the Town, should be kept for the Owner; to whom he sent Messenger after Messenger, desiring him to come to agreement, and not to bring in the barbarous Macedonians, and Ilyrians, to Peloponnesus; promising, that if he would hearken to these persuasions, then would he give him double the same pension, which he had been wont to receive of King Ptolemy. As for the Castle of Corinth, which was the gate of Peloponnesus, and without which none could hold assured sovereignty of the Country; he himself of all others did most with: to the end, that he might not afterward sustain the common reprehension, if any thing fell out amiss; since it might appear, that he had not been Author of this Decree, but only followed, and that leisurely, the general consent.

affected to the Macedonians, ever since the time of Philip the Father of Alexander, who had obliged it unto him by some special benefits. At this time it lay nearest unto the danger; was very faithfull, and therefore deserved succour; yet could not well be relieved by the Achaens, with their own proper strength. Wherefore it was thought meet, that Embassadors should be sent unto the General Council of Achaia, requesting leave and good allowance, to try the favour of Antigonus in their necessity. This was granted, for lack of what else to answer: and the same Embassadors dispatched away to Antigonus. They did their own errand briefly; telling him of the good will and respect which their City had of long time born unto him and his Predecessors; of their present need; and how it would agree with his honour to give them aid. But when they delivered the more general matter, wherein Aratus had given them instruction; shewing how the ambition of Cleomenes, and violence of the Aitolians, might redound to his own great loss or danger, if the one, and the other were not in time prevented; how Aratus himself did stand affected; and what good likelihood there was of reducing the Achaens under the Patronage of Macedon: then began Antigonus to lend a more attentive ear to their discourse. He embraced the motion; and to give it the more life, he wrote unto the Megalopolitans, that his help should not be wanting, so far forth as it might stand with the Achaens good liking. Particularly he commended himself by these Messengers to Aratus, assuring them, that he thought himself highly bound to this honourable man, whose former actions he now perceived not to have been grounded upon any hatred to the Macedonians, but only upon a just and worthy love to his own Nation. With this answer they returned to Megalopolis: and are presently sent away to the Council of Achaia; there to make some speedy conclusion, as the necessity of the time required. The Achaens were glad to hear, that Antigonus was so inclinable to their desire; and therefore were ready to entertain his favour, with all good correspondence. Hereunto Aratus gave his consent; and praised the wisdom of the Countrimen, that so well discerned the best and likeliest means of their common safety: adding nevertheless, that it were not amiss, first of all to try their own ability; which if it failed, then should they do well to call in this gracious Prince, and make him their Patron and Protector. Thus he shewed himself moderate; in that which

Nevertheless, in true estimation, this fineness of Aratus might have been used, with his greater commendation, in a contrary course. For it had been more honourable to make an end of the war, by yielding unto Cleomenes that power which they gave unto Antigonus: since thereby he should both have freed his Country from all further trouble; and withal, should have restored unto the universal state of Greece, that honourable condition, whereof the Macedonians had benefited it. But it is commonly found, (which is great pity) that Vertue, having risen to honour by degrees, and confirmed it self, (as it were) in the seat of principality; by length of time, and success of many actions, can ill endure the hasty growth of any other reputation, wherewith it sees it self likely to be overtopped. Other cause to despise the Lacedaemonians there was none, than that they lately had been in dangerous case: neither could any reason be found, why Aratus should prefer Antigonus before Cleomenes, than that he had stood in doubt of the one, when he thought himself more mighty than the other. Wherefore he was justly plagued, when he saw his own honours reversed by the insolent Macedonians: and instead of living as a companion with Cleomenes, that was descended of a long race of Kings; the posterity of Hercules, was fain to do sacrifice unto Antigonus, as unto a god; and was finally poisoned by Philip, whose Nobility was but of five descents, and whom perhaps he might have seen his fellows, if he had not made them his Lords. By this inclination to the Macedonians, the love of Ptolemy was lost: who forthwith took part with Cleomenes, though he did not supply him with such liberality, as he had used to the Achaens; being warned, as may seem, by their example, to be more wary both in trusting and disburking. Cleomenes himself, whilst this business with Antigonus was a-foot, passed through Arcadia with an Army, and laboured by all means to draw the Achaens to battel. At the City of Dyme in Achaia were assembled all the remaining forces of the Nation; with which it was concluded to make trial; whether perhaps they might amend their estate, without seeking help of the Macedonian. Thither went Cleomenes, and there fought with them; where he had so great a victory, that the enemy was no longer able to keep the open field. The calamity was such, that Aratus himself durst not take upon him to be their General, when his turn came in the next election. Wherefore the Achaens were compelled to sue for peace; which was granted upon this easie condition: That they should not arrogate unto themselves the command of Peloponnesus, but suffer the Lacedaemonians (as in former ages) to be their Leaders in war. Hereunto if they would condescend, he promised unto them, that he would presently restore all places taken from them; and all his prisoners ransom-free: also that they should enjoy their own Laws and Liberties without molestation. This gentle offer of Cleomenes was very pleasing to the Achaens: who desired him to come to the City of Lerna, where a Parliament should be held, for the conclusion of the war.

Now seeming the affairs of Greece likely to be settled in better order, than they had ever been since the beginning of the Peloponnesian Wars, yea, or since the Persian invasion; when God, who had otherwise disposed of these matters, hindred all with a draught of cold water, which Cleomenes drank in great heat, and thereupon fell extrem sick, and so could not be present at Lerna, but caused the Parliament to be deferred to another time. Nevertheless he sent home the chief of his prisoners, to shew that he meant none other than good faith. By this fair dealing he confirmed the Achaens in their desire of his friendship; who assembled again at Argos, there to establish the League. But Aratus was violently bent against it, and fought by great words, and terrible threats, to make his Country-men afraid of resolving. When all would not serve turn, he betook himself to his cunning; and sent word to Cleomenes, that he should do well to leave his Army behind him, and come alone into Argos; receiving hostages for safety of his person. Cleomenes, was already far on his way, when he met with this advertisement; and took it in ill part, that he should be thus deluded. For it had been an easie matter, to have told him so much at the first, & not have made him come so far with an Army, which afterwards he must dismiss. Yet that which chiefly seems to have troubled him, was the drift of his oppugners; who fought thereby; either to make him wait without the gates; and deal only with themselves and their Messengers, or if he would adventure himself into the City, then to deprive him of all Royal shew, that might breed respect of him in the multitude. This demand was somewhat like unto that of the Hunter, who promised to help the horse against his enemy the Stag; but with condition, that the horse should suffer him to be saddled and bridled. Aratus was herewithall contented, but wanting all honest colour to do it: seeing the Corinthians had no way deserved to be thus given away to the Macedonians. desired that it might not be committed unto his own disposition, but be jointly kept by the Lacedæmonians and Acheans. All this entreaty served to no purpose. For Aratus, rejecting utterly the motion, sent his own son as an Hostage to Antigonus; and laboured with the Acheans, to put Acrocorinthum into his hands. Which when Cleomenes understood, he seized upon the goods of Aratus in Corinth, and wasted all the Country of Sicyon, whereof this his Adversary was native.

Antigonus in the mean time drew near to the Isthmus; having passed with his Army through Eubœa, because the Æoliens held the straits of Thermopylae against him. This they did, either in favour of Cleomenes, which they pretended; or in doubt of the great ones, whereunto the Macedonians might attain by the good success of this journey. At his coming thither, he found the Lacedæmonians ready to forbid his entrance: and that with sufficient strength yet with no purpose to hazard battle, but rather to weary him thence with hunger; against which he came not well provided. Antigonus therefore laboured hard to make his way by force; but he was not able so to do: he secretly got into the Corinthian Haven; but was violently driven out again, with great loss of men; finally he resolved to turn aside, and seek a passage over the gulfe of Corinth, to Sicyon, or some other part of Æolia; but this required much time, and great preparation, which was not easily made.

In this perplexity, news from Argos came by Sea, that greatly comforted Antigonus, and no less troubled his enemies. The Acheans were gotten into that City; and the Garrison which Cleomenes had left therein, though it was not driven out of the Citadel, yet was hardly distressed, and stood in need of present help. Argos had always been enemy to Sparta, and well affected to the King of Macedon. When Cleomenes took it, he forbore to chase out those whom he most suspected; partly, at the entreaty of friends, and partly, for that they all made shew to be glad of his prosperity. They were glad indeed of Cleomenes his victories, both in Argos and elsewhere, as many as hoped that he would cause all debtors to be discharged from their creditors, as he had lately done in Sparta. But that which Cleomenes had done in Sparta was agreeable to the Spartan institution: in other places, where it would have been tyrannical, he did not. Thereupon, such as were disappointed of their unjust hopes, began to turn good Common-wealths men; and called him Tyrant for his doings at home, because he would not do the like abroad. So they took their time, invited the Acheans, assailed his Garrison, cut in pieces the rescue that he sent, and compelled him at length to forsake the defence of Corinth, and look unto the enemies that were behind his back. For when he understood by continual messengers, that his men which held the Citadel at Argos were almost lost: he began to fear lest his labour in guarding the entry should grow fruitless; the Acheans in the mean while spoiling all that lay within. Therefore he forsook his custody of the Isthmus, and made all haste towards Argos: which if he could have, he meant to trust fortune with the rest. And so far he prevailed at his coming to Argos, that both Argives and Acheans were glad to house themselves, leaving him Master of the streets; when the horsemen of Antigonus were discovered afar off, hastening to relieve the Citizens; and Antigonus himself (to whom Corinth was yielded, as soon as the Spartan had turned his back), following in pace with the body of his Army. Cleomenes therefore had no more to do, than to make a safe retreat. This he did, and got him home into Laconia: losing in short space all, or most of that which he had been long in getting.

Antigonus having shewed himself at Argos, and commended the Citizens, went into Arcadia; where he saw such Castles as were held for Cleomenes, and restored them to the old Possessors. This done, he took his way to Ægium, where was held a Parliament by the Acheans; to whom he declared the cause of his coming, and spake brave words, that filled them with hope. The Acheans were not behind with him; but made him Captain-General over them and their Confederates: and further entered into covenant with him, That they would not deal with any Prince or State, either by writing, or Embassage, without his consent. All this while (somewhat longer Aratus was the only man that seemed to rule the Kings heart: carrying him to Sicyon his own Town, (for Winter was come on) where he not only feasted him as a great Prince, but suffered more than humane honours, as sacrifices and the like, to be done unto him. This example of Aratus and his Sicyonians, was followed by the rest of Æolia: which had made (forsooth) a very wise bargain, if instead of Cleomenes that would have been a King, it had obtained the protection of a God. But this god was poor, and wanting wherewith to pay his Macedonians, imposed the

the burthen upon the Acheans. This was hardly taken: yet worse must be endured in hope of better. Neither was Aratus himself over-carefully respected; when the statues of those Tyrants, which he had thrown down in Argos, were again erected by Antigonus; or when the statues which he had erected, of those that had taken Acrocorinthum with him, were all thrown down by the same King, and one only left unto himself at his earnest intreaty. It might therefore appear, that this god was also spiteful. Nevertheless in taking revenge upon those that offended him, Aratus did satisfy his own passion by the aid of these Macedonians. For with extreme torments he did put Aristomachus to death, who had been once Tyrant of Argos, afterwards General of the Acheans, and from them revolting unto Cleomenes, did fall at length into their hands. In like sort handled he (though not as yet) the Mantineans, for their ingratitude and cruelty shewed to the Acheans. For he slew all the principal Citizens, and sold the rest, men, women and children, all for bond-slaves: dividing the spoil; two parts to the Macedonians, and the third to the Acheans. The Town it self was given by Antigonus to the Argives, who peopled it with a Colony of their own; and Aratus having charge of this business, caused it to be new safely gone home. Therefore he returned thence back to their lodgings, and went himself to Argos, there to pass the rest of his unhappy winter, somewhat further from the eyes of the grieved Acheans. When he had layn awhile at Argos, Cleomenes was at the gates, with no great number of men, yet with more than Antigonus had then about him: The Argives perceiving that their Country would be spoiled, if Antigonus did not issue into the field, were very earnest with him to go forth and fight. But he was wiser than to be moved with their clamors, and suffered them to see their villages burnt; to bid him resign his Office of Protector unto some that were more valiant; and to satisfy their passions with foolish words, rather than he would be overcome in fight, and thereby lose more honour than could easily be repaired. By this Cleomenes had his desire, and weakening the reputation of his enemy: though he hereby added neither followers, nor other strength unto Lacedæmon.

Afterwards, when the season was more fit for war, Antigonus gathered together all his troops; meaning to requite the bravadoes of his enemy, with the conquest of Sparta. Cleomenes, on the other side laboured to keep the war from his own gates; and therefore entred upon the Country of Argos, where sent unto Egypt, yet the aid came not. For Ptolemy was slow; as dealing in the business of Greece, rather for his minds sake, than upon any apprehension of necessity. Cleomenes therefore provided for himself, as well as his own ability would serve. He manumitted all the Hæliotes which were the Lacedæmonian slaves: taking money for their liberty, and arming two thousand of them after the Macedonian fashion. Having thus increased his forces, he came on the sudden to Megalopolis, that lay secure, as having defended it self in more dangerous times, and having now Antigonus near at hand in Ægium. The Town he was: but after he was entred, all that were fit to bear Arms rose hastily against him; and though they could not drive him out, yet saved the multitude, to whom they gave a Port free for their escape. He sent after the Citizens, offering their Town and goods to them again, if they would be of his party. But they bravely refused his offer: wherefore he sacked and ruined it; carrying with him to Sparta a great booty that he found therein. These news astonished the Acheans at Ægium: who thereupon brake up their Parliament. Antigonus sent hastily for his Macedonians: out of their wintering-places: but they were so long in coming, that Cleomenes was before they were come. Therefore he returned thence back to their lodgings, and went himself to Argos, there to pass the rest of his unhappy winter, somewhat further from the eyes of the grieved Acheans. When he had layn awhile at Argos, Cleomenes was at the gates, with no great number of men, yet with more than Antigonus had then about him: The Argives perceiving that their Country would be spoiled, if Antigonus did not issue into the field, were very earnest with him to go forth and fight. But he was wiser than to be moved with their clamors, and suffered them to see their villages burnt; to bid him resign his Office of Protector unto some that were more valiant; and to satisfy their passions with foolish words, rather than he would be overcome in fight, and thereby lose more honour than could easily be repaired. By this Cleomenes had his desire, and weakening the reputation of his enemy: though he hereby added neither followers, nor other strength unto Lacedæmon.

where he made such a havock, as drew Antigonus thither; from his intended invasion of Laconia. Many great affronts the Macedonian was fain to endure, in coaling of the Spartan King; that ranging over the Country of the Argives, Phlians, and Orchomenians; drove a Garrison of his out of Oligythi; and did sacrifice, as it were before his face, in the suburbs of Argos, without the Temple of Juno, that was shut up; sending unto him in scorn, to borrow the keys: These were light things; yet served to dishearten the Achaean side, and to fill the enemy with courage; which was no matter of light importance. Therefore he concluded to lay apart all other regard of things abroad, and to put all to hazard; setting up his rest, without any more delay, upon Sparta it self: He had in his Army eight and twenty thousand foot, and twelve hundred horse, collected out of sundry Nations, as Macedonians, Illyrians, Gauls, Epirots, Edonians, Acornianians, and others; together with the Achaean; and their friends of Peloponnesus. Cleomenes had of all sorts twenty thousand, with which he lay at Selasia: fortifying slightly the other passages into Laconia through which the Macedonians were not likely to seek entrance. Antigonus coming unto Selasia, found his enemy so strongly encamped, upon and between the hills of Eva and Olympus; that he was constrained to spend much time there, before he could advance any one foot: neither lay it in his power to come hastily to blows, which he greatly desired, without the hazard of his whole Army; in assailing their well defended Camp. But at length (as it happens, when men are weary both of their hopes and fears) both Kings being resolved to make an end one way or other; Antigonus attempted with his Illyrians, to force that part which lay on the hill Eva. But his Illyrians were so ill seconded by the Achaean foot, that the Spartan horse; and light-armed foot, incamped in the straight valley: between those hills, issuing forth, fell upon their skirts, and not only disordered them, but were like to have endangered all the rest. If Cleomenes himself had stood in that part of the battle; he would have made great use of such a fair beginning. But Euclydes, his Brother, a more valiant than skillful Soldier; commanded in that wing: who neither followed this advantage, nor took such benefit as the ground afforded, whereon he lay. Philopomen the Arcadian of Megalopolis, who afterwards proved a famous Captain, served then on horse, as a private young man, among the Achaean. He seeing that all was like to go to rout; if their Illyrians were driven to fall back upon the Army following them; persuaded the Captains of the Achaean horse, to break upon the Spartan Mercenaries. But they would not: partly despising his youth and want of charge; partly, for that Antigonus had given order, that they should keep their places, until they received a sign from him, which was not as yet. Philopomen perceiving them to be more orderly than well-advised, intreated some of his own Country-men to follow him, gave a charge on the Spartans, and forced them, not only to leave the Illyrians, but seek how to save themselves. Being so far advanced, he found the place which the Illyrians had attempted, like enough to be won, through the unskillfulness of him that held it. Wherefore he alighted, and persuaded the men at Arms his Companions to do the like: the folly of Euclydes being manifest, who kept the top of the Hill, and stirred not to hinder those that ascended; but waited for them in a plain, where they might fight upon even terms. So he recovered the Hill-top; where, though he was sore hurt; yet he made good the place that he had gotten: until the whole Army came up to him, by which the Lacedaemonians were beaten from it, with great slaughter of them in their descent. This overthrow, and death of Euclydes, made Cleomenes lose the day: who fighting bravely on the other side, upon Olympus, against Antigonus himself, was like to have been surrounded and lost, if he had not withdrawn himself with an extraordinary speed. In this battle ended the glory of Lacedaemon, which, as a light ready to go out, had with a great, but not long blaze, shined more brightly of late, than in many ages past.

Cleomenes retired unto Sparta; where he had no desire to stay; finding only two hundred left, of six thousand Spartans that he had led unto this battle, and most of his hired Soldiers dead, or gone away. So he persuaded his people to yield themselves unto Antigonus; and promising to do all that should at any time lye in his own power, for their good, he halted away to the Sea-side (where he had shipping long before provided against all that might happen) and embarked himself for Egypt. He was lovingly entertained by Ptolemy Evergetes; who undertook to restore him to his Kingdom, and (perhaps) meant no less, as being much delighted with his gallant behaviour, and qualities. In the mean season, he had a Pension allowed him, of four and twenty Talents, yearly. But this Ptolemy died; and his Son Ptolemy Philopater succeeded him: a vicious young Prince;

Prince, wholly governed by lewd Women, and base Men, un mindful of all vertue, and hating any in whom it was found. When therefore Cleomenes was desirous to return into Greece, whither the troubles in Peloponnesus did seem to invite him; Ptolemy and his Minions, would neither give him aid; nor yet dared to dismiss him (as he desired) to try his own friends in Greece, because he was too well acquainted with the weakness of Egypt: nor well knew how to detain him against his will. At length they devised matter against him, and made him prisoner, the last act of him was, that with thirty of his Country-men, he undertook a desperate enterprise: breaking out of the prison, and provoking the Alexandrians to rebel and seek their liberty. In which attempt he slew some enemies of his that he met; and having walked up and down the streets without resistance (no man offering to take his part, or, which is very strange, to fight against him on the Kings behalf) he, and his Companions, agreed together to be ministers of their own death. Upon his dead body Ptolemy was bold to shew his indignation; and slew his Mother and Children, that had been sent thither, as Hostages, together with the Wives of his Adherents, as many as were there, attending upon the old Queen. Such was the end of Cleomenes, a generous Prince, but Son of Leonidas, who had caused Agh, with his Mother and Grand-mother, to come to such a bloody end, as now befall his own Wife, Son, and Grand-children.

After the victory at Selasia: Antigonus without resistance entered Sparta: wherein to never the force of any Enemy, before him, could make way. He kindly intreated the Citizens, and left them to their own Laws and Government: carrying there no longer than two or three daies: after which he hastened out of Peloponnesus, and never returned. The cause of his speedy departure was an advertisement that he received out of Macedon; how the Illyrians over-ran and destroyed the Country. Had these news come a little sooner, or had Cleomenes either deferred the fight, a few daies longer, or at least wife tarried a few daies after the fight, in Sparta; the Kingdom of Lacedaemon would have stood, and perhaps have extended it self over all Greece. But God had otherwise determined.

Antigonus fought a great battle with the Illyrians, and overcame them. Yet therein he caught his bane: not by any wound, but by over-straining his voice; wherewith he brake a vein that bled inwardly, and in short space finished his life, who was troubled before with a consumption of the lungs. His Kingdom descended unto Philip the Son of Demetrius, being then a Boy: as also about the same time it was; that Antiochus, surnamed (I know not why) the Great; and Ptolemy Philopater, began to reign in Asia and Egypt; Boyes all. Of these, Ptolemy, though old enough to love Harlots, when he first was King, yet continued a Boy all the seventeen years of his reign. The unripe age of Philip and Antiochus; bred such intestine inconvenience to their Kingdoms, as is usual in the minority of Princes: but their elder years brought them acquainted with the Romans; upon which occasion, when it comes, we shall more seasonably speak of them, and of their Kingdoms, more at large.

How the Illyrians infested the Coast of Greece; and how they were subdued by the Romans

Whilst things thus passed in Greece, and whilst the Carthaginians were busie in their conquest of Spain; the Romans had found themselves work among the Sardinians and Corficans; that were easily subdued at first, and easily vanquished again, when they rebelled. They made also war with the Illyrians, wherein they got much honour with little pain. With the Gauls they had much ado, that lasted not long; being rather, as Livy saith, a tumult than a war. So that by all these light exercises their valour was hardly kept from rust. How they got the Islands in the Mediterranean Sea, it hath been shewed before: of their dealings with the Illyrians and Gauls, it is not meet to be utterly silent.

The Illyrians inhabited the Country now called Slavonia; a troublesome Nation, impatient of rest, and continually making war for gain, without either regard of friend or foe. They were invited by Demetrius, King of Macedon, to help the Mydionians his friends, that were besieged by the Ætolians; for that they refused to be of their society. Before the Illyrians succours came, the Mydionians were so far spent, that the Ætolians contended about the booty: the old Prætor, or chief Magistrate of their Nation, who was going out of his office, claiming to have the honour of the victory, and the division of the spoyl to be referred unto him; for that he had in a manner brought the siege to an end, and won the Town: others, that were in hope to be chosen into the Office, contradicting thir, this, and desiring that old orders might be kept. It was a petty strife, and somewhat like to that of the French in latter ages, who thought upon dividing the prey, before they had won the victories, which anon they lost, at Poitiers and Agincourt. The Ætolians wisely compounded the difference, ordering it thus, That the old and the new Prætor should be joyntly intitled in the victory, and have equal authority in distributing of the gettings. But the Illyrians finished the strife much more elegantly, and after another fashion. They arrived and landed ere any was aware of them; they fell upon the Ætolians, and though good resistance was made, yet got the victory, partly by force of their multitude, partly by the help of the Mydionians, that were not idle in their own business, but stoutly sallied out of the Town. Many of the Ætolians were slain; more were taken, their Camp and all their baggage was lost: the Illyrians took the spoil; and went their way; the Mydionians erected a Trophy, inscribing the names both of their old and new Magistrates (for they also chose new Officers at the same time) as the Ætolians had directed them by example.

The success of this voyage highly pleased the King of the Illyrians; not only in regard of the money; wherewith Demetrius had hired his assistance; or of the booty that was gotten; but for that having vanquished the stoutest of the Greeks, he found it not uneasy to enrich himself by setting upon the less warlike. For joy of this he feasted, and drank so immoderately, that he fell into a Plurisie, which in few daies ended his life. His Kingdom, together with his great hopes, he left unto Tenta his wife.

Tenta gave her people free liberty to rob all forts at Sea, making no difference between friend and foe; as if she had been sole Mistress of the salt Waters. She armed a fleet and sent it into Greece; willing her Captains to make war where they found advantage, without any further respect. They fell on the western coast of Peloponnesus; where they invaded the Elans, and Messians. Afterwards they returned along by Epirus, and stayed at the City of Phenice, to take in victuals and other necessities. There lay in Phenice eight hundred Galleys, that having been Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, went about to betray, first Agri-genium, then Eryx, to the Romans; but failing to do either, they nevertheless revolted, and were for their misdeeds disarmed and sent to Sea by the Romans; yet entertained by these Epirots, and trusted to lie in Garrison within their Town. The Galleys were soon grown acquainted with the Illyrians, to whom they betrayed Phenice; which deserved none other, in trusting them. All Epirus was presently in arms, and hastned to drive out these unwelcome guests. But whilst the Epirots lay before the Town, there came news into their Camp of another Illyrian Army, that was marching thitherward by Land, under one Scordilades, whom Queen Tenta had sent to help his fellows. Upon this advertisement, a part of them is sent away towards Amisania, to make good that Town, and the straights adjoining, by which these new comers must enter into their Country; another part of them remains at Phenice, to continue the fight. Neither the one nor the other speed well in their business. For Scordilades found means to joyne with his fellows, so and they that were besieged within Phenice, sallied out of the Town, and gave such an overthrow to the Epirots, as made them despair of saving their Country, without great and speedy help from abroad. Wherefore Embassadors were sent to the Acheans and Ætolians; craving their help, with very pitifull terms of intreaty. They obtained their suits; neither was it long before an Army, sent by these two Nations, was ready in Epirus to present battle unto Scordilades. But Scordilades was called home by letters from Tenta the Queen, that signified a rebellion of some Illyrians against her: so that he had no mind to put his forces to hazard, but offered composition, which was accepted. The agreement was, That the Epirots might ransom their Town, and all their people that were prisoners; and that the Illyrians should quietly depart with all their booty and lives. Having made this profitable and honourable bargain, the Illyrians returned into their own Country by Land, sending their booty away by Sea.

At their coming home, they found no such great trouble, as that which they brought, or had occasioned in this voyage. For, in fulfilling the commandment of their Queen, they had taken many Italian Merchants, whilst they lay at Phenice; and made them good prize. Hereof the complaints made unto the Roman Senate, were so frequent, that Embassadors were sent to require of Tenta; that she should abstain from doing such injuries. These Embassadors found her very jolly; both for the riches which her fleet had brought in; and for that she had, in short space space, tamed her rebels, and brought all to good order, save only the Town Iffa, which her forces held straightly besieged. Swelling with this prosperity, she could hardly afford a good look to the Romans, that found fault with her doings, and, calling them by a true name, Piracy, required amends. Yet when their speech was ended, she vouchsafed to tell them, That injury in publick she would do them none: as for private matters, no account was to be made of them; neither was it the manner of Kings to forbid their subjects to get commodity, how they best could by Sea. But (said the younger of the two Embassadors) we Romans have a manner, and a very laudable one, to take revenge in publick, of those private wrongs that are born out by publick authority: therefore we shall teach you, God willing, to reform your Kingly manners, and learn better of us. These words the Queen took so impatiently, that no revenge could satisfy her, but the death of him that had spoken them. Wherefore, without all regard of the common Law of Nations, she caused him to be slain: as if that had been the way to set her heart at rest; which was indeed the mean to disquiet and afflict it ever after.

The Romans, provoked by this outrage, prepare two great Armies, the one by Sea, consisting of two hundred sail, commanded by C. Fulvius; the other by Land, led by M. Posthumus. They trouble not themselves any more with requiring satisfaction: for this injury is of such nature, as must be requited with mortal war. It is indeed contrary to all humane Law, to use violence towards Embassadors: the reason and ground whereof, seems to be this; that since without mediation, there would never be an end of war and destruction, therefore it was equally received by all Nations, as a lesson taught by Nature, that Embassadors should pass freely, and in safety, between enemies. Nevertheless, as I take it, this general Law is not without limitation. For if any King or State lay hold upon Embassadors sent by their enemies, not unto themselves, but unto some third, whom they should draw into the quarrel; then it is as lawful to use violence to those Embassadors (thus employed to make the war more terrible) as it is to kill the men of war, and subjects of an enemy. And so might the Athenians have answered it when they slew the Lacedæmonian Embassadors, that were sent to Xerxes, to draw him into a war upon the Athenians. Neither are those Embassadors, which practise against the person of that Prince, in whose Countries they reside, warranted by any law whatsoever. For whereas the true office of an Embassador residing, is the maintenance of amity; if it be not lawful for one Prince to practise against the life of another; much less may an Embassador do it without incurring justly the same danger to punishment, with other Traitors; in which case, his place gives him no privilege at all. But we will leave this dispute to the Civilians; and go on with the revenge, taken by the Romans, for the slaughter of their Embassador Coruncanius.

The Illyrian Queen was secure of the Romans, as if they would not dare to stir against her. She was indeed in an error, that hath undone many of all sorts, greater and less than she, both before and since: Having more regard unto fame, than unto the substance of things. The Greeks were at that time more famous than the Romans; the Ætolians and Epirots had the name of the most warlike people in Greece; these had the easily vanquished, and therefore thought, that with the Romans she should be little troubled. Had she considered that her whole Army, which wrought such wonders in Greece, was not much greater than often thousand men; and that nevertheless, it prevailed as much by odds of number, as by valour, or skill in arms; she would have continued to use her advantage against those that were of more fame than strength, with such good caution, that she should not have needed to oppose her late-gotten reputation, against those that were more mighty than her self. But she was a woman, and did what she listed. She sent forth a greater fleet than before, under Demetrius of Pharos; with the like ample commission to take all that could be gotten. This fleet divided it self, & one part of it fell with (a) Dyrachium, the other with Coreyra, (b) Dyrachium, the other with Coreyra, Dyrachium was almost surprised by the Illyrians; yet saved by the stout City-zenes. In (b) Coreyra the Illyrians landed, wasted the Isle, and besieged the Town. Hereupon the Ætolians and Acheans were called in to help; who came, and were beaten in a fight at Sea: losing, besides the Islands of Lege note, Marcon Caryneis, the first Prætor of Achaia, whom Aratus succeeded. The Town of Coreyra, dismayed by this overthrow, opened the gates unto Demetrius Pharicus, who took possession of it the Illyrian Garrison: sending the rest of his forces to besiege Dyrachium. In the mean season, Tenta was angry with her Captain Demetrius: I know not why; but so, as he resolved to try any other course, rather than to trust her.

The Romans were even ready to put to sea, O o o o o

Sea, though uncertain which way to take, when advertisement was brought to C. Fulvius the Consul, of Demetrius his fear and discontent. Likely it was that such an occasion might greatly help to advance the business in hand. Wherefore the Consul failed thither; where he found the Town of Corcyra so well prepared to his hand by Demetrius, that it not only received him willingly, but delivered into his power the Illyrian Garrison, and submitted it self unto the Roman protection.

(c) Apollonia, a City near Dyrrachium, upon the Sea-coast. Apollonia came also Posthumus, the other Consul, with the Land-Army, numbred at twenty thousand foot, and two thousand horse. Thence they hastened towards Dyrrachium, which the Illyrians had besieged; but upon news of the Roman army they dispersed themselves. From thence the Romans entered Illyria, and take Parthenia; beat the Illyrians by sea, take twenty of their ships, and enforce the Queen Teuta to forsake the coast, and to cover her self in Rijon far within the Land. In the end, part of the Romans haste them homeward, and leave the best places of Illyria in the hands of Demetrius; another part stales behind, and prosecute the war, in such sort, that Teuta was forced to beg peace; which he obtained upon miserable conditions; to wit, That she should quit the better part of Illyria; and pay tribute for the rest; and from thenceforth never send any of her ships of war towards the coasts of Greece, beyond the Island of Lissa: except it were some one or two vessels unarmed, and by way of Trade.

After this Illyrian war, the Romans sent Embassadours into divers parts of Greece, signifying their love to their Country, and how, for good will thereunto, they had made war with good success upon Teuta, and her people. They hoped, be like, that some distressed Cities would take this occasion, to desire their patronage: which if it hapned, they were wise enough to play their own games. But no such matter fell out. The Embassadours were only rewarded with thanks; and a decree made at Corinth, That the Romans thenceforth might be partakers of the Athenian pastimes. This was an idle courtesie, but well meant by the vain Greeks; and therefore well taken by the Romans: who by this Illyrian expedition got nothing in Greece, save a little acquaintance, that shall be more hereafter.

S. VIII.

Of the War between the Romans and Gauls, somewhat before the coming of Hannibal into Italy.

THE Gauls that dwell in Lombardy were the next, against whom the Romans took Arms. These were a populous Nation, and often molested Rome; sometimes with their own forces, and sometimes with the assistance of those that inhabited France. Once their fortune was good, when they took Rome and burnt it; though the issue of that war proved not answerable to the beginning, if we may give credit unto Roman Historians. In following times their success was variable, and commonly had. Many overthrows they received; and if they got any victory, it yielded them no profit, but was soon extorted out of their hands. They were indeed more fierce than well advised: lightly stirred up to war, and lightly giving over. At the first brunt, they were said to be more than men; but when that was past, less than women. The Romans were acquainted with their temper, by long experience, and knew how to handle them: yet gave always careful heed to their approach, were it only bruited. For the danger of them was sudden, and uncertain; by reason of their neighbourhood, and want of intelligence among them. Few of their attempts upon Rome were called vain, but immedius Gallici, turner of the Gauls; and rightly. For they gave many alarms to Italy, and used to rise with great Armies, but after a few dayes march, and sometimes before their setting forth, on small occasion served to disperse them. Having received an overthrow, they would rest ten or twelve years, sometimes twenty or thirty; till they were stirred up again, by younger heads, unacquainted with the danger. Whilst they rested, the State of Rome; that against them made only defensive war, had leisure to grow, by setting upon others. Herein God provided well for that Monarchy, which he intended to raise: that the Gauls never fell upon Italy with a mighty power, in the time of any other great and dangerous war. Had they attempted to conquer it, whilst Pyrrhus was travelling in the same enterprise; or in either of the two former Punic wars: it may be doubted what would have become of this Imperious City. But it seems that the Gauls had no better intelligence in the affairs of Italy, than strangers had in Gaul. At least, they knew not how to use their times: and were therefore like to smart, when whensoever the enemies, whom they had most provoked, and little hurt, should find leisure to visit them at their own home: which was now after the first Punic War. Once before this, the Romans had been bold to set upon the Gauls in their own Country: and that was three years before the coming of Pyrrhus into Italy. At that time the Senones, a Tribe of the Gauls, invading Hetruria, and besieging Arretinum, had won a great battel, and slain L. Calpurnius, with the most of his Army. Mannius Curius the new Consul, sent Embassadours to them, to treat about ransom of prisoners. But these Embassadours they slew. Therefore when fortune turned to the better, the Romans followed it so well, that they expelled their Senones out of their Country, and sent a colony of their own to inhabit it. This caused the (c) Boji, another people of Gaul, to fear the like measure: who thereupon took arms, and drew the Hetrurians to their side. But the Romans overthrew them in two great battels; and thereby made them sue for peace, which lasted until the end of this Illyrian war.

It vexed the Gauls to see a Roman colony planted in their Country; who had been accustomed to enlarge their bounds, by driving out their neighbours perforce. Wherefore they laboured with the Transalpinos (so the Romans called those in France, as lying from them beyond the Alpes, though to us they were neerer; like as they called Cisalpinos, or by-hither the Alpes, those who dwelt between them and the Mountains) to draw them to their party: reasonably presuming, that as their disjunction had caused their loss, so their union might recompense it, with large amends. But the business was so foolishly carried, that the Cisalpinos and Transalpinos fell together by the ears, putting the Romans only to a tumult, without further trouble of war. Soon after, they were urged by a greater indignity, to go more substantially to work. For C. Flaminius, a popular man in Rome proposed a Decree, which was ratified by the people; That, besides one Colony already planted in the territory of the Senones, as many more should be carried thither, as would serve to people the whole Country between Ancona and Ariminum: exterminating utterly those Gauls. Such an offer were it made in England, concerning either Virginia, or Guiana it self, would not overjoy the Multitude. But the Commonalty of Rome took this in so good part, notwithstanding all danger joyned with the benefit, that Flaminius had ever after their good will.

This dreadful President extremely displeased the Boji; who being neighbours to Ariminum, feared the like displantation. And because the rest of the Gauls had reason to resolve, that themselves also should be rooted out by degrees; the great Nation of the Insubrians, which inhabited the Dutchy of Milan, joyned with the Boji, and upon a common purse entertained the Gessates, Nations about Rhodanus, wageable as the Switzers in these times. The Gessates having received a great impress, come to the field under the conduct of their Kings Concolitanus and Anoroefus: who with the Boji, and Insubrians, compound an Army of fifty thousand foot, and twenty thousand horse, and those of the best men, and best appointed, that ever invaded the Roman Territory; to whom the Senogalli, that had been beaten out of their possessions, gave a great increase of strength. On the contrary side, the Venetians, and the (b) Cenomanni, adhered to the Romans: as better believing in their property and rising fortune. For fear of whose incursions therefore, the Gauls were forced to leave a good part of their Army, on the frontier of Milan: with the rest of their forces they entered into Tuscane. The Romans hearing of this danger, send Emilius to Rimini, to stop their passage; and in the place of C. Atilius their other Consul, who then was in Sardinia, they employ one of their Prætors, for the defence of Tuscane.

Being at this time greatly troubled with the consideration of this powerful Army, which the Gauls had assembled, they caused a view to be taken, as well of all their own forces, as of those of their Allies: who were no less willing than themselves, to oppose the incursions of the barbarous people; fearing, as they had cause, that their own destruction could not be prevented otherwise, than by the good fortune of Rome. The numbers, found in this Muster, deserve to be recorded: because they set out the power of the Romans in those dayes. With the Consul they sent forth to the war four Legions of their own: every Legion consisting of five thousand two hundred foot, and three hundred horse; and of their Allies thirteen thousand foot, and two hundred horse. There were also appointed for supplies (if any misadventure came to these) of the Sabines and Hetrurians fifty thousand foot, and four thousand horse, which Army was to be lodged in the border of Hetruria. Of the Umbri and Saspinates, which inhabited the Apennines, there were twenty thousand; and of the Venetians and Cenomanni, other twenty thousand.

land; which latter Armies were directed to invade the Boji, that forcing them to defend their own Territories, the General Army of the Gauls should be thereby greatly diminished. There were besides these, to be ready against all uncertain chances of war, thirty thousand foot, and fifteen hundred horse, garrisoned in Rome it self, of their own people; and of their Allies, thirty thousand foot, and two thousand horse. Over and above these great troops, in the Roll of the Latines, that was sent unto the Senate, there were numbered four score thousand foot, and five thousand horse; in that of the Sannites, seventy thousand foot, and of horse seven thousand; in that of the (g) Iugures and Messapges, fifty thousand foot, and sixteen thousand horse; the Lucans sent a list of thirty thousand foot, and three thousand horse; the (h) Marfi, (i) Marfins, (k) Ferrentians, and the Vestins, of twenty thousand foot, and four thousand horse. The Romans had also two Legions in Sicilia, and about Tarentum, containing eight thousand four hundred foot, and four hundred horse. So as of the Romans and Campanes jointly, reckoning men armed, and fit to bear arms, there were registered two hundred and fifty thousand foot; and of horse three and twenty thousand: of which, reckoning the Romans Kingdom apart, there were an hundred and fifty thousand foot, and about six thousand horse. Calling up the whole forces of all the Provinces in Italy, both of the Romans and their confederates, it amounted to seven hundred thousand foot, and seventy thousand horse. But the number is somewhat mis-cast by Polybius; not with a purpose to enrich himself by the dead payes; for where he reckons nine hundred horse too many, he falls short nine thousand two hundred of the foot.

How great soever this muster was, it seems to have been like unto that, which Lodowick Sforza made, when Lewis the twelfth invaded Atilan: at what time, the better to encourage himself and his subjects, he took a Roll of all persons able to bear arms, within the Dutchy, though indeed he were never able to bring a tenth part of them into the field. Certain it is, that the battels of Trebia, Thrasymene, and Canna, did not consume any such proportion, as was answerable to this large accompt. Yet were the Romans fain to arm their slaves, even for want of other Souldiers, after their overthrow at Canna. Wherefore the marvel is not great; that the Carthaginians and others were little terrified with report of such a multitude. For all heads are not fit for Hel-mets: though the Roman Citizens were, in general, as good fighting men, as elsewhere might be found.

Notwithstanding all these counter preparations, the Gauls keep on their way, and entering into Tuscan, destroy, and put to fire and sword, all that lay before them. From thence they march directly towards Rome; hoping to find the Romans rather in deliberation, than in the field. But their intelligence fails them. For the Roman Army, sent into Tuscan, having taken some other way than they did, and finding that it had missed of them, came again fast after them, to arrest them in their journey. Hereof when they heard the rumour, fearing to be charged on their backs, they turned head; and in the same evening discovered the Roman Army, by whom they incamped. It was now a matter of apparent necessity, that fight they must. Wherefore they helped themselves with a Stratagem, that shewed no great fineness of wit, but such as well befitted those that had none other occupation than war; and stood them in good stead at the present. In the dead of the night, they caule their foot to march away; but not far, leaving their horse in guards: to whom they give order to come off at the first light of day; with such a speed, as might rather argue a running away, than a retreat: as if they had not dared to abide battell. The Romans, interpreting this their halcy departure, as the Gauls desired they should; follow them in disorder. The Gauls return, charge them, and kill six thousand upon the place; the rest take a piece of ground of advantage, and defend themselves, till L. Emilius, being at Ariminum, comes to their succour. Upon the coming of the Consul, the Gauls consult, whether they should give the Romans battell, or forbear. In which dispute, Aneroestius, one of their Kings, persuades them, rather to return to their own Countreys; where, after they had disposed of the great spoils and riches which they had gotten, they should then renew the war, being without carriage, poster or other impediments. This advice they all embrace; for, seeing they that were Mercenaries, had obtained what they came for, to wit; the spoils of their enemies, they thought it wisdom, to hazard neither if, nor themselves any further.

This intended had been a good resolution, if they had taken it, before the enemy had been in sight. But as well in the wars of these later ages, as in former times, it hath ever been found extrem dangerous to make a retreat in the Head of an Enemies Army. For although they that retire, do often turn

heads yet in always going on from the pursuing enemy, they find within few miles, either straight, hedge, ditch or place of disadvantage, which they are enforced to pass in disorder. In such cases, the Souldier knows it as well as the Captain, that he which forsakes the field, perceives and fears some advantage of the Enemies. Fear, which is the betrayer of those succours that reason offereth, when it hath once possessed the heart of man, it casteth thence both courage and understanding. They that make retreat, are always in fear to be abandoned; they that lead the way, fear to be engaged: and so the hindmost trends on all heels that is foremost, and consequently, all disband, run, and perish, if those that favour the retreat be not held to it by men of great courage. The miserable overthrow that the French received in Naples, in the year 1503, upon a retreat made by the Marquis of Sal, doth testify no less. For although a great troop of French horse sustained the pursuing Enemy a long time, and gave the foot leisure to trot away; yet being retarded by often turnings, the Spanish foot overtook and defeated them utterly. During the wars between the Imperials and the French, Boiss and Mout were lost at Brignoller, who in a bravery would needs see the enemy, before they left the field: So was Stroff overthrown by the Marquis of Marignan, because he could not be persuaded to dislodge the night before the Marquis's arrivall. Therefore did the French King Francis the first wisely: when without respect of point of honour, he dislodged from before Landersey, by night, as many other the most advised Captains, (not finding themselves in case to give battell) have done: Je n'estrois point en cas de donner bataille, qu'une retraite; I find nothing in the art of war so difficult as to make a safe retreat. A sure rule it is that there is less dishonour to dislodge in the dark, than to be beaten in the light. And hercof M. de la Noue gives this judgement of a days retreat, made in France, presently before the battell at Moncontour. For (saith he) staying upon our reputation, in shew, not to dislodge by night; we lost our reputation indeed, by dislodging by day: whereby we were forced to fight upon our disadvantage, and to our ruine. And yet did that worthy Gentleman Cous Lodowick of Nassau, brother to the late famous Prince of Orange, make the retreat at Moncontour with so great resolution, as he saved the one half of the Protestant Army, then broken and disbanded; of which my self was an eye-witness, and was one of them that had cause to thank him for it.

Now the Gauls, embracing the safe advice (as they take it) of one of their Kings, turn their backs to the enemy, and their faces homeward. Amilius follows them as near as he can, without engaging himself, attending his advantage. In the mean while, C. Atilius the other Consul, with the Legions of Sardinia, lands at Tifa; so as the Gauls inclosed between two Armies, are forced to fight. They therefore equally strengthen their Rear and Front. To sustain Emilius, they appoint the Gessates, and the Milavols; in the Front they range the Piemontols, and the rest of the Gauls inhabiting upon the River of Ro. The manner of the fight Polybius describeth at large: which was well fought of all hands. But in the end the Gauls fell; and so did Atilius the Consul: who died in the place, accompanied with the two Kings of the Gauls, Concolitanus and Aneroestius; with forty thousand of their Vassals.

After this fatal overthrow, the Gauls lost courage; and ere long, all that they held in Italy. For they were invaded the year following this overthrow, by the new Consuls, Fulvius and Manlius. The Romans know well how to use their victory: they gave not ten, twenty, or thirty years time to the Gauls, to repair their forces; as the Gauls had done to them. These new Consuls beat the Boji; but by reason of the great rains that fell, and the great pestilence that reigned, they were compelled for that present to surcease. In the second year, Fulvius and Flamininus invade the Milavols; and prevail very far, being strongly assisted by the Cenomanni and the Venetians. Nevertheless these Consuls were revoked out of their Province, by the Senate of Rome, and compelled to resign their Office; because the Argures, or Soothsayers, had found, that some token or other of the Birds (in which, and all sorts of their divination, the Romans were extremely superstitious) had not only foreshewed little good, when they were chosen, but had also nullified the election. C. Flamininus, receiving letters of this revocation from the Senate, and being otherwise advertised of the contents, was not happy to open them: but first gave battell unto the enemies, vanquished them, and spoiled their Country; then perused the letters; and returning home obtained a triumph, fore against the will of the Senate, and not altogether with good liking of the people, who yet bear him out, for that he sided in faction with the Commonalty, though a man of great Nobility.

This

This was that Flaminius, who had procured the Decree, for dividing the Country of the Senones among the people of Rome. He was the first, or one of the first, that understanding the Majesty of Rome to be indeed wholly in the people, and no otherwise in the Senate, than by a way of Delegation, or grand Commission; did not stand highly upon his birth and degree, but courted the multitude, and taught them to know and use their power, over himself and his fellow Senators, in reforming their disorders. For this, the Commons highly esteemed him, and the Senators as deeply hated him. But he had the surer side, and found imitators, that rose by the same art, which in process of time, grew the only or chief way to preferment.

Flaminius and his Colleague, being disposed, Mc. Claudius Marcellus, and Cn. Cornelius Scipio, were chosen Consuls, for the rest of that year. The Gauls about this time desired peace, and were like to have obtained it: though the new Consuls were against it, as fearing to want work. But when thirty thousand of the Gessates, following their King Britomarus, were come over the Alps, and joyned with the Insubrians: all other discourse, than of present war, was at an end. So the Consuls hastened into their Province, where they besieged Acerra, a Town not far from Novarra (so far had the Romans pierced already in the Duchy of Milan). To divert them from this siege, Britomarus set down before Clasidium, a Town in the same Tract, with a great part of his forces: leaving the rest, with the Insubrians, to attend upon the Consuls at Acerra, and to look to the defence of Milan. But this would not suffice, to make the Romans break up their siege. Marcellus, taking with him the greater part of the horse, and six hundred foot lightly armed, thought to deal well enough with those at Clasidium. Britomarus heard of the Consuls coming, and met him upon the way: so suddenly, that the Romans had no leisure to rest themselves after their journey, but were compelled instantly to fight. Herein Britomarus had done well, if he had not forthwith, in a rash bravery, lost his game at a cast. He had advantage enough in number, both of horse and foot: but he thought so well of his own personal valour, that he rode out single before his Army, provoking any one to fight with him. Marcellus was no less daring, than the barbarous King: whether more wise in this action, I will not dispute; he was more fortunate, and that sufficed to commend him. He slew and disarmed Britomarus, in the presence of both Armies: whereby his own men took such courage, and his enemies were so dismayed, that without much trouble of fight the Romans obtained a great Victory.

This was the third and last time, that ever any Roman General slew the General of the enemies, with his own hand. To this kind of victory, belonged a peculiar triumph; whereof only Romulus, Cassius, and this Marcellus, had the honour: yet I dare say, that the two Scipios, and divers of the Roman Captains, especially Cæsar, were better men of war than any of these three; though they never offered up to Jupiter, Opima Spolia, The Armour of a General slain by themselves, when they were Generals, nor perhaps affected so to do.

After this victory, Acerra was yielded to the Romans; and Milan soon after: with all that belonged to the Cisalpine, or Gauls, that dwelt in Lombardy. Thus was that valiant and mighty Nation, that had so many years vexed the State of Rome, and in former times taken the City itself, brought to nothing in a short time: their pleasant and fertile Territory possessed by the Romans; and the remainder of their Nation, inhabiting Italy, so many as would not subject their necks to the Roman yoke, either forced to abandon their Countries, or to hide themselves in the cold and barren Mountains, like Outlaws and Thieves. And thus did the Romans spend the three and twenty years following the peace made with Carthage. In part of which time, they were at such leisure, that they closed up the Temple of Janus: which they never did before, (it standing always open, when they had any war) (save once, in the reign of Numa; nor in long time after, until the reign of Augustus. But this their present happiness was not to last long: a dangerous War, and perhaps the greatest that had ever been, was to come unto their Gates; which being well ended, they might boldly undertake, to extend their Monarchy as far as their ambition could reach.

Of the second Punick Warr.

§. I.

The Wars of Hannibal in Spain. Quarrels between the Romans and Carthaginians. Hannibal besiegeth and taketh Saguntum, whilst the Romans are busied with the Illyrians. War proclaimed between Rome and Carthage.

HANNIBAL, the Son of Amilcar, was about six and twenty years old, when he was chosen General of the Carthaginian forces in Spain. He was elected by the Army, as soon as Asdrubal was dead: and the election was ratified by the State of Carthage; wherewith Hanno and his Complices were nothing pleased. This was now the third of the Barchine family (so called of Amilcar, whose surname was Barche) that had command in chief, over the men of war. Which honour would perhaps have been less envied by these domestical enemies, if the Alies and friends of the Barchine house, had not also born the whole sway in Government, and been the only men regarded, both by the Senate and the people. This general good will, as it was first purchased by the most worthy descents of Amilcar in saving his Country from imminent ruine, in enlarging the Dominion thereof, and enriching it with treasures and great revenues; so was it retained, by the same good Arts, among his friends and followers. Hanno therefore, and his Partisans, being neither able to tax the virtue of their enemies, that was unrevokable, nor to perform the like services unto the common-weal; had nothing left whereby to value themselves, excepting the general apprehension of War, and cautious advice of not provoking the Romans. This they season'd often-whiles with detraction; saying, that the Barchine faction went about to oppress the liberty of the City. But their malicious words were unregarded; and if it were notorious, to bear ill-will to Rome, then were all the Citizens (very few excepted) no less Barchine, than Hannibal himself. For it was long since apparent, that the oath of the Romans, to the articles of peace, afforded no security to Carthage, were the never so quiet, and officious; unless the should yield to become their Subject. Since therefore the peace was like to hold no longer, than until the Romans could find some good advantage, to renew the war: it was rather desired by the Carthaginians, that whilst their own estate was in good case, the war should begin; than that in some unhappy time of famine or pestilence, or after some great loss of Army or Fleet, they should be driven to yield unto the impudent demands of their enemies; and to give away basely their lands and treasures, as they had lately done; or miserably fight, upon terms of disadvantage.

This disposition of his Country-men, Hannibal well understood. Neither was he ignorant (for his father, and other friends had long time devised of this business) that, in making war with the Romans, it was no small advantage to get the start of them. If once he could bring an Army into Italy, without molestation; there was good hope that he should find friends and assistance, even of those people, that helped to increase the Roman Armies in foreign wars. But this could never be effected, if the matter were openly disputed at Carthage. For it was to be doubted, that the Carthaginians, how glad soever they would be, to hear that he had bet the war on foot, would nevertheless be slow and timorous, as commonly men are in the beginning of great enterprises, if the matter were referred to their deliberation. Which if it should happen, then were the Romans like to be made acquainted, not only with the generalities of his purpose; but with such particulars as must be discoursed of, in procuring allowance to his design. This might suffice to disorder the whole Project. Wherefore, he resolved to lay siege unto Saguntum, which might seem not greatly to concern the Romans, and would highly please the Carthaginians, that had fresh in mind the indignity of that Spanish Towns alliance with her half friends. So should he assay both the patience of his enemies, and the disposition of his own Citizens.

Having

Having thus concluded, he nevertheless went fair and orderly to works; and beginning with those that lay next in his way, approaching unto Saguntum by degrees. This he did (saith Livie) to give some colour to his proceedings: as if he had not principally intended the war against Saguntum, but had been drawn thither by course of business. Yet reason teacheth plainly, that without regard of such formalities, it was needful to finish the conquest of the rest, before he did any thing that should provoke the Romans. First therefore he entred upon the Territory of the Oleades; and having besieged Althea (Livie called it Caricta) their chief City, he became, in a few daies, Master not only thereof, but of all the other Towns of their Country. This Nation which he first undertook, being subdued, and the winter at hand, he rested his Army in new Carthage, or Carthagina; and imparted liberally to the Souldiers, the spoils he had gotten in his late Conquest.

In the Spring following, he pursued the war against the (a) Vaccæ; and without any great difficulty, won first Salamanca, now called Salamanca; and after it, (b) Arbucala, by assault; though not without a long siege, and great difficulty. But in his return, he was put to the height, both of his courage, and of his Martial judgment. For all such of the Vaccæ, as were able to bear arms, being made desperate by the spoil of their Country, with those of Salamanca, and of the Oleades, that had escaped in the late overthrow, joining themselves with the Tolantæ; compounded an Army of an hundred thousand able men: and stayed Hannibal on the banks of the River Tagus, which runneth to the Sea by Lisbon in Portugal. These four Nations, having had experience of Hannibal's invincible courage, and that he never saw enemy: upon whom he durst not give charge; were thoroughly resolved, that his natural valour would at this time no less neglected the cold advice of discretion, than at other times it had seemed to do, when the like great occasion perfwaded him to use it. But he that makes himself a body of Crytal, that all men may look thorow him, and discern all the parts of his disposition, makes himself (withall) an As; and thereby teacheth others, either how to ride, or drive him. Wife men, though they have single hearts in all that is just and virtuous; yet they are like Cofters with double bottoms: which when others look into, being opened, they see not all that they hold, on the sudden, and at once. It is true, that this subtle Carthaginian, when he served under Asdrubal, was, of all the men of mark in the Army, the most adventurous; but that which may become a Captain, or inferior Commander, doth not always become a Chief; though it hath sometime succeeded well with such great ones, as have been found more fortunate than wise. At this time, our great Man of war knew as well how to dissemble his courage, as at other times to make it good. For he with-drew himself from the River-side, as if fearful to foord it; thereby to draw over that great multitude from their banks of advantage. The Spaniards, apprehending this in such sort, as Hannibal desired that they should thrust themselves in fury and disorder, into the swift stream, with a purpose to charge the Carthaginians, abandoning (as they thought for fear (the defences on the contrary side. But when Hannibal saw them in their way, and well-near over; he turned back his Elephants to entertain them at their landing: and thrust his Horse-men, both above and beneath them, into the River. These carrying a kind of Lance de Bay, sharp at both ends, whither they held in the midst of the staff; had such an advantage over the foot, that were in the River, under their strokes, clattered together, and unable to move or shift their bodies, as on firm ground, that they slew all those (in a manner) without resistance, which were already entered into the water; and pursued the rest, that fled like men amazed; with so great a slaughter, as from that day forward, there was not any Spaniard, on that side the River of Iberus, (the Saguntines excepted) that had the daring to lift up their hands against the Carthaginians.

The Saguntines, perceiving the danger towards them, cryed before they were hurt. They sent Embassadors to Rome, and be-moaned themselves, as likely to suffer that, which afterwards they suffered indeed; only because of their alliance and friendship with this honourable City, which the Carthaginians hated. This tale moved the Senate, but much more a report, that Saguntum was already besieged: Hereupon some cry out, that War should be proclaimed by Land and Sea; as also that the two Consuls should be sent with Armies, the one into Spain, the other into Africa. But others went more Roman-like to work, and carried it. So it was only concluded; that Embassadors should be sent into Spain, to view the state of their confederates: which were indeed none other than the Saguntines. For if Hannibal intended war against Rome, it was likely that he should give them, ere it were long, long: a more plausible occasion to take Arms against him: if he had no such purpose, yet would it bein their power to determine what they lifted themselves upon the report of these Embassadors; and this their gravity, in being not too rash at first, would leave; so countenance their following Decree. Of these Embassadors Livie reports, that they found Hannibal before Saguntum, but could not get audience of him; and therefore went to Carthage, where also they were not regarded, nor heard. But Polibius an Historian of sincerity less questionable, tells, that they found him at Carthagena, and had conference with him, though such as left them doubtful. This is more agreeable to the rest of Hannibal's whole course. And surely we might wonder, why the Carthaginians should afterwards admit a more peremptory Embassage (as Livie confesseth) and fall to disputation about the covenants of Peace; if they had rejected that which was sent, upon none other pretence than prevention of war.

Whilst the Embassadors passed to and fro, Hannibal prepared not only his forces, but long Roman pretences, against Saguntum. He found out Mamertines, or people that should, as the Mamertines in Sicily had done for the Rapins; and implore his help against the Saguntines. These were the Indubians, a Nation adjoining to Saguntum, and having many quarrels with them; (as happens commonly among neighbours) of which, Hannibal himself hatched some kind, therefore such an occasion, whatsoever it was, as made him able to say, that the Saguntines had first provoked him, ere he medled with them; he made no more ado, but sat down with his whole power before their Town. He was now more secure, than he had formerly been of his own Citizens; for that they had not entertained the Roman Embassadors, with any trembling reverence, as of late years they had been wont. Nevertheless, he was glad of any handsome colour, to shadow his actions: not only because the War, which he so much desired, was not proclaimed; but that he might not be checked in his course, as an open enemy, before he could set foot in Italy. The Romans had the like, though contrary desire. They were glad of the quarrel; as hoping that Carthage, with all thereto belonging, should thereby in short space become their own. Yet were they not halty to threaten, before they were ready to strike; but meant to temporize, until they had an Army in readines to be sent into Spain, where they thought to make Saguntum, the seat of the War.

In the mean while, Demetrius Phariæ, whom the Romans had made King over a great part of Illyria, rebelled against them: either for that he found himself over-straightly tyed up by them, with hard conditions; or rather because he was of an unthankful disposition. The commotion of the Gauls, and afterward the fame of the Carthaginian war, emboldened him to despise his Benefactors and Patrons: whom he ought to have defended and aided, in all perils, even with the hazard of his whole estate, which he had received of their gift. But he was a Traitor to his own Queen; and therefore dealt according to his kind; with those that had rewarded him for being rich. First, he built ships, and spoiled the Isles of Greece, against the covenants to: which he was bound. Then he adventured further, and seized upon some places, that the Romans kept in their own hands. If he had begun sooner, or rather if he had stayed somewhat longer, he might have sped better. For the business with the Gauls was ended; with Hannibal, not thoroughly begun, when he declared himself by his doings, an enemy, and was vanquished. The Roman Consul, Emilius, was sent against him: who in seven daies with the strong Town of Dinadum, and thereby brought such terror upon the Country round about, that Embassadors were sent from all places, to yield themselves, without putting him to further pains. Only the City of Pharæ, in which Demetrius lay, prepared to resist: which he might have done long, if the hot-headed Rebel had not been too foolish. Emilius landed a great part of his Army in the Isle of Pharæ, by night; and bestowed them in covert, presenting himself the next morning with twenty ships before the Town, and offering to force the Haven. Demetrius with all his power issued out against the Consul, and was soon intercluded from the Town, by those that lay in ambush. Wherefore he fled away through by-paths to a Greek, where he had shipping ready for him, and imbarqued himself: leaving all his estate unto them, of whose liberality he first had it.

This business, though it were soon dispatched, yet prevented it not the siege of Saguntum; before which Hannibal sat down, ere Emilius was landed in Illyria. In the beginning of the siege, the Carthaginians were much discouraged, by reason of the brave sallies made by the Saguntines; in one of which, their General received a dangerous wound in the thigh, that caused him to lye many daies unable to move. Nevertheless, he was not unmindfull of his work in the mean while; but gave order to raise certain movable Towers, that might equal those which were built on the walls of the City; and to prepare to batter the curtains, and make a breach. These being finished and applied, had soon wrought their effect. A great and large breach was made, by the fall of divers Towers, and a great length of walls, whereat an hot assault was given: but it was so well sustained by the Saguntines, as the Carthaginians were not only beaten from the breach, and out of some ground within the Town, which upon the first fury they had won; but they were pursued even to their own trenches and camp. Nevertheless the Carthaginian Army, wherein were about an hundred and fifty thousand men, did so weary the Towns-men with continual travel, that at length it got within the walls; and was only hindered from taking full possession of the City, by some counter-works of the Saguntines, that were also ready to be won. In this extremity, there was one Alcon a Saguntine, that conveyed himself out of the Town, to treat with Hannibal for some accord. But the conditions which the Carthaginian offered were so severe, and without all compass of honour, as Alcon durst not return to propound them to his Countrymen. For Hannibal demanded: all that they had, gold, silver, plate, and other riches within the City; yea, the City it self to be abandoned by the Citizens; promising, that he would assign some other place for their habitation: not allowing them to carry out with them any other thing, whereby to sustain themselves, than the cloaths on their backs; or other arms, to defend them, than their nails and teeth. Yet might they far better have submitted themselves unto this miserable appointment, (seeing thereby they might have enjoyed their lives, and saved the honour of their wives and daughters) than to have rested at the discretion of the Conquerour, as soon after they did: by whom their wives and daughters were deflowered before their own faces; and all put to sword, that were above fourteen years of age. For it was a poor comfort, which a great number of them took; when not daring to fight, and sell their blood at the dearest rate, they shut themselves up like most wretched creatures in their own houses, and therein burnt themselves with all that they had: sodying unrevenged. The treasures found in Saguntum, which were very great, Hannibal kept wherewith to pay his Army: the slaves and other booty, he divided among his Souldiers, reserving some things of choice, wherewith to present his friends at Carthage, and to animate them unto the War.

These tydings exceedingly vexed the Romans, who had good cause to be angry at their own slowness, in forbearing to send help unto the Saguntines, that held out eight months, looking still for succour, but in vain. Wherefore they determined to repair their honour, by taking sharp revenge. To this end they sent Embassadors again to Carthage: demanding only, Whether it were by general consent and allowance of the Carthaginians, that Hannibal had made war upon Saguntum: which if they granted (as it seemed they would) then to give them defiance. Hereunto answer was made, in the Senate of Carthage, to this effect; That this their second Embassy, howsoever qualified with mild words, was indeed more insolent than the former. For in that, they only required justice against Hannibal; but in this, the very State and Common-wealth of Carthage, was urged to plead guilty, or not guilty. But (said the Carthaginian speaker) whether the General of our Army in Spain, in besieging Saguntum, have only followed his own counsel; or whether he did it, by direction from us: it is not the question which the Romans ought to ask us. That which is indeed worthy examination or dispute, is, Whether it were lawfull or unlawful for Hannibal to do as he hath done. For it belongs to us, to call our own Commanders in question, and to punish them according to their faults and errors; to you, to challenge us, if we have done any thing contrary to our late League and contract. It is true, that in our negotiation with Lucatius the Consul, the Allies of both Nations were comprehended: but the Saguntines were not then of your Allies, and therefore no parties to the peace then made; for of your Allies in the future, or of ours, there was no dispute. As touching the last agreement between you and Asdrubal, wherein you will say that the Saguntines were comprehended by name; it is you that have taught us how to answer that particular. For whatsoever you found in the Treaty between us and Lucatius, to your own disadvantage, you cast it upon your Consuls presumption as promising those things, for which he had no warrant from the Senate and people of Rome. If then it be lawfull for the Romans, to disavow the actions of their Consuls and Commanders, concluding any thing without punctual and precise warrant; the samelikely may we also assume; and hold ourselves no way bound in honour to perform those bargains which Asdrubal hath made for

for us, without our commandment and consent.

This was an impertinent answer, and little better than a meer cavil. For Lucatius the Consul, in his Treaty of Peace with the Carthaginians, had expressly referred the allowance thereof to the people of Rome. It had been therefore much better to have dealt plainly, and to have alledged, That after this League was made and confirmed on both parts, it was broken by the Romans, in robbing the Carthaginians of the Isle of Sardinia, and withal of twelve hundred talents: which perjury the State of Carthage, being now grown able, would revenge with open War. As for the Saguntines, it little skilled that the Romans had admitted them into confederacy, and forthwith inserted their names into the Treaty of Peace with Asdrubal: seeing that the Treaty with Asdrubal, and all other business between Rome and Carthage, following the violence and breach of Peace, in taking away Sardinia, were no better than Roman injuries, as implying this commination, Do whatsoever we require: else will we make War, without regard of our oaths, which we have already broken.

But this the Carthaginians did not alledge, forgetting, in heat of contention (as Polybius takes it) the best of their Plea. Yet since Lucius himself doth remember and acknowledge, that the taking of Sardinia from the Carthaginians, did inflame the spirit of Amilcar with desire of revenge: we may reasonably think, that the mention of this injury was omitted, not so much upon forgetfulness, as for that it was not thought convenient; by ripping up such ancient matter of quarrel, to shew that the war, now towards, had long been thought upon, and like to be made with extraordinary force, in other manner than heretofore. In conclusion, the Carthaginian Senate moved the Roman Embassadors, to deliver unto them in plain terms the purposes of those that sent them, and the worst of that, which they had long determined against them: as for the Saguntines, and the confining of their Armies within Iberia; those were but their pretences. Whereupon Q. Fabius gathering up the skitt of Asdrubal, as if somewhat had been laid in the hollow thereof, made this short reply: I have here (quoth he) in my Gown-skirt both Peace and War: make you (my Masters of the Senate) election of these two, which of them you like best, and purpose to embrace. Hereat all cried out once; Even which of them you your self have a fancy to offer us. Marry then (quoth Fabius) take the War, and share it among you: Which the assembly willingly accepted.

This was plain dealing. To wrangle about pretences, when each part had resolved to make War, it was meetly frivolous. For all these disputes of breach of Peace, have ever been maintained by the party unwilling, or unable to sustain the War. The rusty sword, and the empty purse, do always plead performance of covenants. There have been few Kings or States in the World, that have otherwise understood the obligation of a Treaty, than with the condition of their own advantage: and commonly (seeing Peace between ambitious Princes and States, is but a kind of breathing) the best advised have rather begun with the sword, than with the trumpet. So dealt the Arragonians with the French in Naples; Henry the second of France, with the Imperials, when he wrote to Brissac, to surprise as many places as he could, ere the War brake out; Don John, with the Netherlands; and Philip, the second of Spain, with the English, when in the great Imbargo he took all our ships and goods in his Ports.

But Hannibal, besides the present strength of Carthage, and the common feeling of injuries received from these enemies, had another private and hereditary desire, that violently carried him against the Romans. His Father Amilcar, at what time he did sacrifice, being ready to take his journey into Spain, had solemnly bound him by oath, to pursue them with immortal hatred, and to work them all possible mischief, as soon as he should be a man, and able. Hannibal was then about nine years old, when his Father caused him to lay his hand upon the Altar, and make this vow: so that it was no marvel, if the impression were strong in him.

That it is inhumane to bequeath hatred in this sort, as it were by Legacy, it cannot be denied. Yet for mine own part, I do not much doubt, but that some of those Kings, with whom we are now in peace, have received the like charge of their Predecessors, that as soon as their coffers shall be full, they shall declare themselves enemies to the people of England.

§. II.

Hannibal takes order for the defence of Spain, and Africk. His Journey into Italy.

WAR being thus proclaimed, Hannibal resolved not to put up his sword which he had drawn against the Saguntines, untill

As for the Saguntines, it little skilled that the Romans had admitted them into confederacy, and forthwith inserted their names into the Treaty of Peace with Ashdrubal: seeing that the Treaty with Ashdrubal, and all other business between Rome and Carthage, following the violence and breach of Peace, in taking away Sardinia, were no better than Roman injuries, as implying this commination, Do whatsoever we require: else will we make War, without regard of our oaths, which we have already broken.

But this the Carthaginians did not alledge, forgetting, in heat of contention (as Polybius takes it) the best of their Plea. Yet since Lutatius himself doth remember and acknowledge, that the taking of Sardinia from the Carthaginians, did inflame the spirit of Amilcar with desire of revenge: we may reasonably think, that the mention of this injury was omitted, not so much upon forgetfulness, as for that it was not thought convenient, by ripping up such ancient matter of quarrel; to shew that the war, now towards, had long been thought upon, and like to be made with extraordinary force, in other manner than heretofore. In conclusion, the Carthaginian Senate moved the Roman Embassadors, to deliver unto them in plain terms the purposes of those that sent them, and the worst of that, which they had long determined against them: as for the Saguntines, and the confining of their Armies within Italus; those were but their pretences. Whereupon Q. Fabius gathering up the skitt of his gown, as if somewhat had been laid in the hollow thereof, made this short reply: I have here (quoth he) in my Gown skit both Peace and War: make you (my Masters of the Senate) election of these two, which of them you like best, and purpose to embrace. Hereat all cried out at once; Even which of them you your self have a fancy to offer us. Marry then (quoth Fabius) take the War, and share it among you: Which the assembly willingly accepted.

This was plain dealing. To wrangle about pretences, when each part had resolved to make War, it was merely frivolous. For all these disputes of breach of Peace, have ever been maintained by the party unwilling, or unable to sustain the War. The rusty sword, and the empty purse, do always plead performance of covenants. There have been few Kings or States in the World, that have otherwise understood the obligation of a Treaty, than with the condition of their own advantage: and commonly (seeing Peace between ambitious Princes and States, is but a kind of breathing) the best advised have rather begun with the sword, than with the trumpet. So dealt the Arragonians with the French in Naples; Henry the second of France, with the Imperials, when he wrote to Brissac, to surprise as many places as he could, ere the War brake out; Don John, with the Netherlanders; and Philip the second of Spain, with the English, when in the great Embargo he took all our ships and goods in his Ports.

But Hannibal, besides the present strength of Carthage, and the common feeling of injuries received from these enemies, had another private and hereditary desire, that violently carried him against the Romans. His Father Amilcar, at what time he did sacrifice, being ready to take his journey into Spain, had solemnly bound him by oath, to pursue them with immortal hatred, and to work them all possible mischief, as soon as he should be a man, and able. Hannibal was then about nine years old, when his Father caused him to lay his hand upon the Altar, and make this vow: so that it was no marvel, if the impression were strong in him.

That it is inhumane to bequeath hatred in this sort, as it were by Legacy, it cannot be denied. Yet for mine own part, I do not much doubt, but that some of those Kings, with whom we are now in peace, have received the like charge of their Predecessors; that as soon as their coffers shall be full, they shall declare themselves enemies to the people of England.

§. II.

Hannibal takes order for the defence of Spain, and Africk. His Journey into Italy.

WARR being thus proclaimed, Hannibal resolved not to put up his head which he had drawn against the Saguntines, P p p p p 2 untill until he had therewith opened his passage unto the gates of Rome. So began the second Punick War; second to none that ever the Senate and people of Rome sustained. Hannibal wintered at Carthage; where he licensed his Spanish Souldiers to visit their friends, and refresh themselves again in the Spring. In the mean while, he gave instructions to his Brother Asdrubal, for the Government of Spain in his absence. He also took order, to send a great many troops of Spaniards into Africa, to equal the number of Africans formerly drawn thence into Spain. In the end, that so the Spain Nation might remain as pledges and gages for the other. Of the Spaniards, he transported into Africa thirteen thousand, eight hundred and fifty foot, and twelve hundred horse; also eight hundred slingers of the Baleares. Besides these, he selected four thousand foot, all young men, and of quality out of the best Cities of Spain; which he appointed to be garrisoned in Carthage it self, not so much in regard of their forces, as that they might serve for hostages: for among those four thousand, the best of the Spanish Citizens, and those that sway'd most in their several States, had their Sons or Kinsmen. He also left with his Brother, to guard the Coasts and Ports, fifty and seven Gallies; whereof thirty seven were principally armed, and appointed for the war. Of Africans and other Nations, strangers, he left with him above twelve thousand foot, and two thousand horse, besides one and twenty Elephants.

Having in this sort taken order for the defence of Spain and Africa; he sent discoverers before him, to view the Passages of the Pyrenean Mountains; and of the Alps. He also sent Embassadors to the Mountainers of the Pyrenees, and to the Gauls, to obtain a quiet passage: that he might bring his Army entire into Italy; and not be compelled to diminish his force, by any War in the way. till he came to encounter the Romans. His Embassadors and Discoverers being returned with good satisfaction; in the beginning of the Spring, he pass'd over the River of Iberus, with an Army consisting of four score and ten thousand foot, and twelve thousand horse. All those parts of Spain, into which he had not enter'd before, he now subdued: and appointed Hanno (not that old enemy of his house, who sat still at Carthage) to govern Spain on the East side of Iberus; to whom he left an Army of ten thousand foot, and one thousand horse. Being arriv'd at the borders of Spain, some of his Spanish Souldiers returned home, without asking leave, which the others might not also do, or attempt, he courteously dismissed many more that seem'd willing to be gone. Hereby, it came to pass, that the Journey seem'd the less tedious upon those that accompanied him, as being not enforced by compulsion. With the rest of his Army, consisting now but of fifty thousand foot, and nine thousand horse, he pass'd the Pyrenees, and enter'd into Gaul. He found there Gauls that bordered upon Spain, ready in Arms, to forbid his entrance into their Country; but won them with gentle speech, and rich presents that he bestow'd upon their Leaders, to favour his Expedition. So, without any molestation, he came to the bank of Rhone, where dwell, on each side of the River, a people called Arverni. These were in quarrel with the Celti of the country; and therefore sought to keep him from passing over the water. But he was greatly assisted by some of those Gauls, that inhabited on the West side of Rhone, to wit, by those of Volturne and Arverni. For, although many of them had transported themselves and their goods into the Country of Dumetia, thinking to defend the further bank against him: yet such as remained, being very desirous for their Country, of so many ill evils, were better pleas'd to have their Country men well beaten, which had abandon'd them, than to have their own share of corn and cattle wast'd, by the long stay of so great an Army, as lay upon them. For which reason, they help'd him to make boats, inform'd him of another more easy passage, higher up the River; and lent him guides. When the Vessels for transportation of his Army were in readiness; he sent Hanno, the Son of Romilius, up the River: himself in the mean while, making countenance to enter the Wood below. The end of this labour, was, that Hanno charging the Gauls upon wares upon their own side, and Hannibal, at the same time, passing the River in their faces, the further bank was won, though with some difficulty; and the Gauls dispersed. Yet was he greatly troubled in conveying over his Elephants; who marvellously feared the water. He was therefore driven to make rafts of trees, and cover them with Earth and Turf; whereof he fasten'd one to each bank, that might serve as a bridge, to and from another of the same sort, but loose upon which the beasts were towed over.

Having pass'd this first brunt, and overcome both the rage of the River, and of those that defended it, he was visit'd by the Princes of the Gauls Cisalpine, that inhabited Piemont and Aislan, who lately had revolted from from the Romans. These inform'd him of the passages of the Alps; that they were not so difficult, as common report made them; and from these he received guides, with many other encouragements. All which notwithstanding, he found himself extremely incommoded by the Savoyans; and lost, both of his carriages, and of his Carthaginians, more than willingly he would, or had formerly thought that he should. For he was twice mainly assailed by them, before he could recover the plain Countreys on the other side. And whereas his Journey over the Mountains cost him fifteen dayes travel, he was every day, more or less, not only charged by those Mountainers, but withall extremely beaten with grievous weather and snow: it being the beginning of Winter, when he began, and overcame this passage. But the fair and fertile Plains, which were now ready to receive them; with the assistance and conduct of the Cisalpine Gauls, who by their proper forces had so often invaded the Roman Territory; gave them great comfort and encouragement to go on: having nothing else of difficulty remaining, but that which from the beginning they made account to overcome, by their proper valour and resolution; namely, the Roman Armies, and resistance.

§. III.

How the Romans in vain solicited the Spaniards and Gauls to take their part. The Rebellion of the Cisalpine Gauls against the Romans.

THE Countries of Spain and Gaul, through which the Carthaginians march'd thus far, had been solicited before, by the same Roman Embassadors, who had denounced the war at Carthage. These, as they were intrusted by the Senate, took Spain in their way home-ward from Carthage, with a purpose to draw into the Roman Alliance, as many of the Cities and Princes as they could; at least to dissuade them from contracting any friendship with the Carthaginians. The first which they attempted were the Volturnians, a people in Spain, from whom, in open assembly, they received by one that spake for the rest, this uncomfortable answer: With what face (saith he) can ye Romans persuade us to value your Alliance, or to prefer it before the friendship of the Carthaginians; seeing we are taught by the example of the Saguntines, to be more wise than to? For they, relying on your faith and promised assistance, have been utterly rooted out, and destroyed by the Carthaginians; whom they might else have held their assured friends, and good neighbours, as we, and other the people of Spain have found them. Ye may therefore be gone, with this resolution from us. That for our parts (and so I think, I may answer for the rest of our Country-men) the Romans henceforth are not to expect any kindness at our hands; who are resolv'd, never to make account of their protection, nor amity. From the Volturnians, the Embassadors took their way towards the Gauls; using their best arguments to persuade them not to suffer the Carthaginians to pass into Italy, thence their Territory: and withall greatly glorifying themselves, their strength, and large Dominion. But the Gauls laugh'd them to scorn, and had hardly the patience to hear them speak. For shall we (said one of their Princes) by resisting Hannibal's passage into Italy, entertain a war which is not meant to be made against us? Shall we hold the war among our selves, and in our own Territory, by force which marcheth with a speedy pace from us, toward our ancient enemies? Have the Romans deserved so well of us, and the Carthaginians so ill, that we should set fire on our own houses; to save theirs from burning? No, we know it well, that the Romans have already forced some Nations of ours, out of their proper Territory and inheritance: and constrained others, as free as themselves, to pay them tribute. We will not therefore make the Carthaginians, our enemies, who have no way as yet offend'd us, nor we them.

With this displeasing answer the Embassadors returned home, carrying no good news, of friends likely to help them; but rather some assurance from the people of Massilia, which were confederates with Rome, that the Gauls were determined to take part with their enemy. Of this inclination, the Cisalpine Gauls gave halcy proof. For when the news was brought into Italy, that the Carthaginians had pass'd Iberus, and were on the way towards Rome; this alone sufficed to stir up the Boji, and Insubrians, against the Romans. These people were lately offended at the plantation of new Roman Colonies, at Cremona, and Placentia, within their Territories. Relying therefore upon the Carthaginian succour, which they supposed to be now at hand; they laid aside all regard of those hostages, which they had given to the Romans, and fell upon the new Colonies. The Towns it seems they could not win; for Hannibal shortly after failed to get them. But they forced the Roman Commissioners

Commissioners, (who belike were abroad in the Country) to flye to Modena: where they besieged them. The siege of Modena had continued some small time; when the Gauls, having little skill in assaulting Cities, waxed weary, and seemed desirous to have peace, and to come to some good accord with the Romans. This they did of purpose, to draw on some meeting; that they might therein lay hand upon the Roman Deputies, thereby to redeem their Hostages in way of exchange. And it fell out in part, according to their wish. For the Romans sent out Embassadors to treat with them, and to conclude a Peace; whom they detained. Manlius, the Prætor, who lay in these quarters with an Army, hearing this outrage, marched in all haste to the relief of the besieged. But the Gauls, having laid a strong ambush in a wood joyning to the way, fell upon the Prætor so opportunely, as he was utterly overthrown, and all his followers left dead in the place, a few excepted; that recovered, by fast running to a little village, but defensible upon the River of Po. When this was heard at Rome, G. Attilius, another of the Prætors, was hastily sent to relieve the besieged with a Legion, and five thousand of the Roman Associates; which forces were taken out of the Consul's Army, and supplied by a new levy.

As the Gauls were too rash and hasty; so were the Romans too slow, and indeed too ill-advised, in the beginning of this war. They were not persuaded that Carthage; which had almost fervently endured so many indignities in time of the late peace; would be so brave and courageous on the sudden, as to attempt the conquest of Italy itself. Wherefore they appointed one of their Consuls to make war in Spain, the other in Africa; resting secure of all danger at home. Titus Sempronius took his way toward Africa, with an hundred and sixty Quinterners, on Gallies of five to an Oar, which preparation may seem to threaten even the City of Carthage, to which it shall not come near. P. Cornelius Scipio, the other Consul, made all possible haste, by the way of Genoa, into Provincia; and used such diligence, having the wind also favourable, as in five dayes he recovered Messilia. There he was advertised of Hannibal's having passed the River of Rhodanus, whom he thought to have found busie yet a while in Spain. Hannibal had also news of the Consul's arrival; whereof he was neither glad, nor sorry, as not meaning to have to do with him. Each of them sent forth Scouts to discover the others number and doings: Hannibal, about five hundred Numidians; Scipio, three hundred of this better appointed Roman horse. These met and fought, and the Numidians were beaten; yet could not the Romans greatly brag, having slain only two hundred; and lost of their own, one hundred and forty. But when Scipio drew near, to have met with the Carthaginians; he found, that they were gone three dayes before; and that (as he then found assuredly) with an intent to look upon the walls of Rome. This interrupted his intended Voyage into Spain. Nevertheless he sent away thither his Brother-in-law, Cornelius Scipio, with the greatest part of his Plece and Army, to try what might be done against Asdrubal; and the other Carthaginian Lieutenants in the Country. He himself, taking with him a few choice bands, returned by Senon, Fisla, and so passing thorow Tuscia into Lumbradia; drew together the broken troops of Andalus and Attilius; that lately had been beaten by the Gauls; with which forces he made head against the enemy, thinking to find him over-laboured, with travel of his painful Journey. He sought in vain; but met him with a new levy of Numidians, and a Legion of Roman Associates, who were sent to relieve him. Scipio the Roman Consul overcame Hannibal at Ticinum. Both of the Roman Consuls beaten by Hannibal, in a great battle at Trebia.

Five Months Hannibal had spent, in his tedious Journey from Carthage; what great matter he could make, when he had passed the Alpes, it is not easily found. Some reckon him foot at an hundred thousand, and his horse at twenty thousand; others report them to have been only twenty thousand foot, and six hundred horse. Hannibal himself in his monument which he raised, in the Temple of Juno Lucina, agreeth with the latter summ. Yet the Gauls, Ligurians, and others that joyned with him, are likely to have mightily increased his Army, in short space. But when he marched Eastward from the banks of Rhodanus, he had with him eight and thirty thousand foot; and eight thousand horse; of which, all save those remembered by himself in the Inscription of his Altar in Juno's Temple, are like to have perished by diseases, enemies, Rivers and Mountains; which mischiefs had devoured, each their several shares.

of the (a) Taurini; who lay next in his way. But the Taurini held war at that time with the Tuscanians, which were his good friends; and refused (perhaps for the same cause) his amity. Wherefore he assaulted their Town; and was but for force in three daies. Their spoil served well to hearten his Army; and their calamity, to terrifie the Neighbour places. So the Gauls, without more ado, fell unto his side; many for fear, many also for good-will, according to their former inclination. This disposition ran thorow the whole Country; which joyned, or was all in readiness to joyn with the Carthaginians; when the news of Scipio the Consul's arrival, made some to be more advised than thereto. The name of the Romans was terrible in those quarters; what was in the Carthaginians, experience had not yet laid open. Since therefore the Roman Consul was already gotten thorow the most defensible passages, ere any speech had been heard of his approach, many fate still for very fear, who else would faine have concluded a League with these new-come friends; and some, for greater fear, offered their service against the Carthaginians, whom nevertheless they had wished well to speed.

This wavering affection of the Province, whereinto they were entred, made the two Generals halten to the trial of a battail: Their meeting was at Vicinum, now called Pavia; where each of them wondered at the others expedition. Hannibal, thinking it strange that the Consul, whom he had left behind him on the other side of the Alpes, could meet him in the face, before he had well-warmed himself in the Plains; Scipio admiring the strange adventure of passing those Mountains, and the great spirit of his Enemy. Neither were the Senate at Rome little amazed at Hannibal's success, and sudden arrival. Wherefore they dispatched a Messenger in all haste unto Sempronius, the other Consul, that was then in Sicily, giving him to understand hereof: and letting him further know, that whereas he had been directed to make the war in Africa, it was now their pleasure that he should forbear to prosecute any such attempt, but that he should return the Army under his charge, with all possible speed, to save Italy itself. According to this order, Sempronius sent off his Fleet from Lilybaeum; with direction to land the Army at Ariminum, a Port Town not far from Ravenna: quite another way from Carthage, whither he was making haste. In the mean while, Scipio and Hannibal were come so near, that fight they must, ere they could part asunder. Hereupon both of them prepared the minds of their Souldiers; by the best arguments they had: unto which Hannibal added the Rhetoric of a present example, that he shewed upon certain prisoners of the Savonians, which he brought along with him, fitted for the purpose, into Italy. For these, having been no less miserably fettered and chained, than sparingly fed; and withall so often scourged on their naked bodies, as nothing was more in their desire, than to be delivered from their miseries by any kind of present death, were brought into the middle of the Army; where it was openly demanded; which of them would fight hand to hand with some other of his Companions; till the one of them were slain; with condition, being the Victory to receive his liberty, and some small reward. This was no sooner propounded, than all of them together accepted the offer. Then did Hannibal cause lots to be cast; which of them should enter the List, with such weapons, as the Chieftains of the Gauls were wont to use in single combats. Every one of these unhappy men wished, that his own lot might speed; whereby it should at least be his good fortune, to end his miseries by death, if not to get a reward by victory. That couple, whose good hap it was to be chosen, fought resolutely: as rather desiring, than fearing death; and having none other hope, than in vanquishing. Thus were some few couples matched, it skilled not how equally: for all these poor creatures were willing, upon whatsoever uneven terms, to rid themselves out of slavery. The same affection that was in these Combatants, and in their fellows which beheld them, wrought also upon the Carthaginians, for whom the spectacle was ordained. For they deemed happy, not only him, that by winning the victory had gotten his liberty, together with an horse and armour; but even him also, who being slain in fight, had escaped that miserable condition, unto which his Companions were returned. Their General perceiving what impression this dumb shew had wrought in them, began to admonish them of their own condition, speaking to this effect: That he had laid before them an example of their own estates: seeing the time was at hand, wherein they were all to run the same fortune, that these slaves had done; all to live victorious and rich; or all to die, or (which these prisoners esteemed far more grievous) to live in a perpetual slavery: That none of them all, in whom was common sense, could promise to himself any hope of life by flight; since the Mountains, the Rivers, the great ditches stance from their own Countries, and the pursuit of merciless Enemies, must needs suggest all such impotent imaginations. He therefore prayed them to remember, that they, who had even now praised the fortune both of the Victor, and of the vanquished, would make it their own cause, seeing that there was never any in the world; appointed with such a resolution, that had ever been broken, or beaten by their enemies. On the contrary, he told them that the Romans, who were to fight upon their own soil, and in view of their own Towns; who knew as many ways to save themselves by flight; as they had bodies of men to fight withall; could no way entertain such a resolution as theirs: seeing the same Necessity; (to which nothing seems impossible) did no way press them, or constrain them. In this sort did Hannibal, with one substantial Argument, That there was no mean between Victory and Death, encourage his Companions. For, (saith a great Captain of France) La commodité de la retraite, avance la fuite; The commodity of a retreat, doth greatly advance the flying away.

Scipio on the other side, after that he had given order for the laying of a bridge over the River of Trebia, did not neglect to use the best arguments and reasons he could; to encourage the Army he led: putting them in mind of the great conquests and victories of their Ancestors; against how many Nations they had prevailed; and over how many Princes, their Enemies, had they triumphed. As for this Army commanded by Hannibal, although it were enough to tell them, that it was no better than of Carthaginians, whom in their late war they had so often beaten, by Land and Sea; yet he prayed them withall to consider, that at this time it was not only so diminished in numbers, as it rather seemed a troop of Brigants and Thieves, than an Army likely to encounter the Romans; but so weather-beaten, and starved, as neither the men, nor horses, had strength or courage to sustain the first charge that should be given upon them. Nay (saith he) ye yourselves may make judgment what daring they have now remaining, after so many travails and miseries; seeing when they were in their best strength, after they had past the Roan, their horse-men were not only beaten by ours, and driven back to the very Treaches of their Camp, but Hannibal himself, fearing our approach, ran headlong towards the Alps; thinking it a less dishonour, to die there by frost, famine, and precipitation, than by the sharp swords of the Romans, which had so often cut down his people, both in Africa, and in Sicily. It was not long after this, ere the two Generals met: each being far advanced before the head of his Army, with his Horse; and the Roman having also with him foresight-armed foot, to view the ground; and the enemies countenance. When they discovered the approach of one of the other, Scipio first before him, his horsemen of the Gauls, to begin the fight, and bestowing his Darters in the void ground between their troops, to assist upon himself with his Roman pikes army followed softly in good order. The Gauls (whether desirous to try the metal of the Carthaginians, or desiring thereby to get favour of the Romans) behaved themselves courageously, and were as courageously opposed. Yet their foot that should have aided them, shrank at the first brunt; or rather fled cowardly away, without casting a Day's contest of being trodden down by the enemies horse. This notwithstanding, the Scipio's aimed the fight, and did more hurt than they received: as presuming that they were small back. Neither was the Consul unwilling to relieve them; his able hardiness defeating his aid; and the hasty flight of those that should have stood by them, admonishing him that it was needful. Wherefore he adventured himself so far, that he received a dangerous wound; and had been left in the place, if his Son (afterward surnamed Africanus) had not brought him off: though others give the honour of this rescue to a Ligurian slave. Whilst the Romans were busied in helping their Consul, an unexpected storm came driving at their backs, and made them look about how to help themselves. Hannibal had appointed his Numidian light-horse, to give upon the Roman in flank, and to compass them about, whilst he with his men at Arms sustained their charge, and met them in the face. The Numidians performed this very well: cutting in pieces the scattered foot; that ran away at the first encounter; and then falling on the backs of those, whose loeks were fastened upon Hannibal and Scipio. By this impression, the Romans were shuffled together, and routed: so that they all berook them to their speed, and left unto their enemies the honour of the day.

When Scipio saw his horsemen thus beaten, and thereof of his Army thereby greatly discouraged; he thought it a point of wisdom, having lost so many of his Fleet upon the first puff of the wind, to take Port with the rest, before the extremest of the tempest overtook him. For he saw by the lowering morning what manner of day it was like to prove. Therefore his battail of foot being yet unbroken, he in a manner stole the retreat; and recovered the Bridge over Trebia, which he had formerly built. But notwithstanding all the haste that he made, he left six hundred of his Rear behinde him: who were the last that should have passed, and staid to break the bridge. Herein he followed the rule of a good man of War, Si certamen quandoque dubium videatur, tacitam milis arripit fugam: fuga enim aliquando laudanda; which must be understood in this sort: If a General of an Army, by some unpromising beginnings doubts the success, or find his Army fearful or wavering, it is more profitable to find a safe retreat, than to abide the uncertain event of battail.

It was two dayes after, ere Hannibal could pass the River. Scipio the whilest refreshing his men, and easing himself of his wound in Placentia. But as soon as Hannibal presented his Army before the Town, offering battail to the Romans, who durst not accept it, nor issue forth of their Camp; the Gauls, that hitherto had followed Scipio for fear, gathered out of his fear, courage to forsake him. They thought that now the long-deferred time was come, in which better Chief-men and Souldiers, than Amroscius, Aristomachus, and Gessius, were come to help them. Wherefore the same night they fell upon the Roman Camp; wounded and slew many especially of those guards that kept watch at the gate; with whose heads in their hands, they fled over to the Carthaginians, and presented their service. Hannibal received them exceedingly courteously, and dismissed them to their own places: as men likely to be of more use to him, in perswading the rest of their Nation to become his Confederates, than in any other service at the present.

About the fourth watch of the night following, the Consul stole a retreat, as he had done before; but not with the like ease and security. Hannibal had a good eye upon him, and ere he could get far, sent the Numidians after him: following himself with all his Army. That night the Romans had received a great blow, if the Numidians, greedy of spoil, had not staid to ransack their Camp; and thereby given time to all (save some few in Rear, that were slain or taken) to pass the River of Trebia, and save themselves. Scipio, being both unable to travel by reason of his wound, and withall, finding it expedient to attend the coming of his fellow-Consul; incamps himself strongly upon the banks of Trebia. Necessity required that he should so do; yet this diminished his reputation. For every day more and more of the Gauls fell to the Carthaginian side; among whom came in the Boji, that brought with them the Roman Commissioners, which they had taken in the late Insurrection. They had hitherto kept them as pledges, to redeem their own hostages: but now they deliver them up to Hannibal, as tokens and pledges of their affections towards him; by whose help they conceived better hope of recovering their own men and lands. In the mean while, Hannibal, being in great scarcity of victuals, attempted the taking of Clastidium, a Town wherein the Romans had laid up all their store and munition. But there needed no force; a Brundisian, whom the Romans had trusted with keeping it, sold it for a little money.

The news of these disasters, brought to Rome, filled the Senate and People; rather with a desire of hasty revenge, than any great sorrow for their loss received; seeing that in a manner, all their Foot, wherein their strength and hope consisted, were as yet entire. They therefore halted away Sempronius, that was newly arrived, towards Ariminum, where the Army, by him sent out of Sicily, awaited his coming. He therefore halted thither; and from thence he marched speedily towards his Colleague: who attended him upon the banks of Trebia. Both the Armies being joyed in one, the Consuls devised about that which remained to be done: Sempronius received from Scipio the relation of what had passed since Hannibal's arrival; the fortune of the late fight; and by what error or misadventure the Romans were therein foiled: which Scipio chiefly laid on the revolt and treason of the Gauls.

Sempronius, having received from Scipio the state of the affairs in those parts; fought by all means to try his fortune with Hannibal, before Scipio were recovered of his wounds, that thereby he might purchase to himself the sole glory of the victory, which he had already, in his imagination, certainly obtained. He also feared the election of the new Consul: his own time being well-near expired. But Scipio perswaded the contrary; objecting the unlikelihood of the new-come Souldiers: and withall, gave him good reason, to assure him that the Gauls, naturally unconstant, were upon terms of abandoning the party of the Carthaginians; those of them inhabiting between the rivers of Trebia and Po, being already revolted. Sempronius knew all this as well as Scipio: but being both guided and blinded by his ambition, he made haste to find out the dishonour which he might otherwise easily have avoided. This resolution of Sempronius was exceeding pleasing to Hannibal: who feared nothing so much as delay and loss of time. For the strength of his Army, consisting in strangers, to wit, in Spaniards and Gauls; he no less feared the change of affection in the one, than the impatience of the other: who being far from their own home, had many passions moving them to turn their faces towards it. To further the desire of Sempronius, it fell out so, that about the same time, the Gauls, inhabiting near unto Trebia, complained of injuries done by the Carthaginians. They did not supply Hannibal with necessaries, as he supposed that they might have done; although he daily reprehended their negligence, telling them, that for their sakes, and to set them at liberty, he had undertaken this Expedition. Seeing therefore how little they regarded his words, he was bold to be his own Carver; and took from them by force, as much as he needed of that which they had. Hereupon they fly to the Romans for help: and, to make their tale the better, say that this wrong is done them, because they refused to join with Hannibal. Scipio cared not much for this: he suspected their falsehood, and was assured of their mutability. But Sempronius affirmed, that it stood with the honour of Rome, to preserve their Confederates from suffering injury: and that hereby might be won the friendship of all the Gauls. Therefore he sent out a thousand Horse: which coming unlooked for upon Hannibal his forragers, and finding them heavy laden, cut many of them in pieces, and chased the rest even into their own Camp. This indignity made the Carthaginians rally out against them: who caused them to retire faster than they came. Sempronius was ready to back his own men; and repelled the enemies. Hannibal did the like. So that at length all the Roman Army was drawn forth; and a battle ready to be fought, if the Carthaginian had not refused it.

This victory (for so the Consul would have it called) made the Romans in general desirous to try the main chance in open field: all the persuasions of Scipio to the contrary notwithstanding. Of this disposition Hannibal was adverted by the Gauls, his Spies, that were in the Roman Camp. Therefore he bethought himself how to help forward the victory by adding some stratagem to his forces: he found in the hollow of a water-courfe, over-grown with high reed, a fit trench to cover an ambush. Therein he hid his brother Mago with a thousand choice

Horse, and as many foot. The rest of his Army, after they had well warmed, and well fed themselves in their Camp, he led into the field, and marched towards the Consul. Early in the morning, he had sent over Trebia some companies of Nomidian light-horse, to brave the enemy, and draw him forth to a bad dinner, ere he had broken his fast. Sempronius was ready to take any opportunity to fight: and therefore not only slipped out of his Camp, but forded the River of Trebia, in a most cold and miserable day; his foot being wet almost to the arm-holes; which, together with the want of food, did so enfeeble and cool their courage, as they wanted force to handle the army they bore. Strong they were in foot, as well of their own Nation, as of the Latines: having of the one sixteen, of the other twenty thousand. The main of these they ranged in a good Battalion, guarded on the flanks with three thousand horse; thrusting their Light-armed, and Dragoon, in loose troops in the head of the rest, in the nature of a Vanguard. The Carthaginian numbers of foot were in a manner equal to their enemies; in horse they had by far the master, both in number and quality. When therefore the Roman horse passed on the flanks of their foot, were broken by the Hannibals; when their foot were charged both in front and flank, by the Spaniards, Gauls, and Elephants; when finally the whole Army was unawares prest in the Rear, by Mago and his two thousand, that rose out of their place of ambush; then fell the Romans, by heaps under the enemies swords; and being beaten down, as well fighting in disorder, as flying towards the River, by the Horsemen that pursued them, there elapsed no more, of six and thirty thousand, than ten thousand of all sorts, Horse and Foot.

Three great errors Sempronius committed, of which every one deserved to be recompensed with the loss that followed. The first was; that he fought with Hannibal, in a Champain, being by far inferior in Horse, and withal, thereby subject to the African Elephants, which in inclosed or uneven grounds & wood-lands, would have been of no use. His second error was, that he made no discovery of the place upon which he fought; whereby he was grossly over-reached, and inflamed, by the ambush which Hannibal had laid for him. The third was, that he drencht his footmen with empty stomachs, in the River of Trebia, even in a most cold and frosty day, whereby, in effect, they lost the use of their limbs. For, as one saith well, There is nothing more inconvenient and perilous, than to present an Army tyred with travel, to an enemy fresh and fed; since where the strength of body faileth, the generosity of mind is but as an unprofitable vapour.

The broken remainder of the Roman Army, was collected by Scipio, who got there with into Placentia; stealing away the same night, which was exceeding rainy, from the Carthaginians, who either perceived him not, because of the showers; or would not perceive him, because they were over-wearyed. Sempronius elapsed with extrem danger, flying through the Country that was overrun by the enemies horse. He was attended by more than were requisite in a secret flight; yet by fewer than could have made resistance; if the enemy had met with him. Nevertheless he got away, and came to Rome; where he did his office in choosing new Consuls for the year following: and then returned into his Province, with a fresh supply against Hannibal.

S. V.

The departure of Hannibal from the Cisalpine Gauls into Hetruria. Flaminius the Roman Consul slain, and his Army destroyed by the Carthaginians, at the Lake of Thrymence.

THE Winter growing on apace, was very sharp, and unfit for service: to the great contentment of the Romans who, being not able to keep the field, lay warm in Placentia, and Cremona. Yet Hannibal did not suffer them to rest very quiet; but vexed them with continual Alarms: assailed divers places, and taking some; beating the Gauls their adherents, and winning the Ligurians to his party, who presented him, in token of their faithful love, with two Roman Questors, or Treasurers, two Colonels, and five Gentlemen, the Sons of Senators, which they had intercepted. These, and in general all such prisoners as he had of the Romans, he held in straight places, laden with irons, and miserably fed: those of their followers he not only well intreated, but sent them to their Countries without ransom; with the protestation, That he therefore undertook the War in Italy, to free them from the oppression of the Romans. By these means he hoped, and not in vain, to draw many of them to his party and assistance. But the Gauls were not capable of such persuasions. They stood in fear, lest he should make their Country the seat of War, and perhaps take it from them. They were also more grieved than reason willed them; at his feeding upon them, and wasting their territory. Wherefore some of them conspired against his life; others admonished him of the danger: and these that gave him the advice, were ready soon after to practise against him; but were in like sort detected. He was therefore glad to use Periwigs of hair, and false beards of divers colours; to the end that he might not be decyphered, nor known, to those that should undertake to make him away. Fain he would have passed the Apennines, upon the first appearance of Spring; but was compelled by the violence of weather, to tarry among the Gauls, till he had seen more swallows than one. At length, when the year was somewhat better opened, he resolved to take his leave of these giddy companions and bring the war nearer to the gate of Rome. So away he went, having his Army greatly increased with Ligurians and Gauls; more servicable friends abroad, than in their own Country. That the passage of the Apennine Mountains was troublesome, I hold it needless to make any doubt. Yet since the Roman Armies found no memorable impediment, in their march: that way: the great vexation which they upon Hannibal, when he was travelling thorow, and over them, ought in reason to be imputed rather to the extremity of Winter, that makes always foul, than to any intolerable difficulty in that journey. Nevertheless, to avoid the length of war, together with the resistance and fortifications which may not improbably be thought to have been erected upon the ordinary passages towards Rome: he chose at this time, though it were with much trouble, to travel thorow the Fens and rotten grounds of Tricane. In those Marishes, and bogs, he lost all his Elephants, save one, together with the use of one of his eyes; by the moistness of the air, and by lodging on the cold ground, and wading thorow deep mire and water. In brief, after he had, with much ado, recovered the firm and fertile Plains, he lodged about Arretium; where he somewhat refreshed his wearied followers, and heard news of the Roman Consuls.

C. Flaminius, and Cn. Servilius had of late been chosen Consuls for this year: Servilius a tractable man, and wholly governed by advice of the Senate; Flaminius an hot-headed popular Orator; who having once been robbed (as he thought) of his Consulship, by a device of the Senators, was afraid to be served to again, unless he quickly finished the war. This jealous Consul thought it not best for him to be at Rome, when he entered into his Office, lest his adversaries, by feigning some religious impediment, should detain him within the City, or find other business for him at home, to disappoint him of the honour that he hoped to get in the war. Wherefore he departed secretly out of the Town, and meant to take possession of his Office when the day came at Ariminum. The Fathers (to the Senators were called) highly displeased with this, revoked him by Embassadors: but he neglected their injunction; and halting to meet with the Carthaginians, took his way to Arretium, where he shortly found them.

The fiery disposition of this Consul, promised unto Hannibal great assurance of victory. Therefore he provoked, with many indignities, the vehement nature of the Roman; hoping thereby to draw him unto fight, ere Servilius came with the rest of the Army. All the Country between Fesule and Arretium, he put to fire and sword, even under the Consuls nose; which was enough to make him stir, that would not have listened still, though Hannibal had been quiet. It is true that a great Captain of France hath said; Jays eusse n'est pas perdu; A justesse Country is not thereby lost. But by this waste of the Country, Flaminius thought his own honour to be much impaired; and therefore advanced towards the Enemy. Many advised him (which had indeed been best) to have patience a while, and stay for his Colleague. But of this he could not abide to hear; saying, that he came not to defend Arretium, whilst the Carthaginians went burning down all Italy before them, to the gates of Rome. Therefore he took horse, and commanded the Army to march. It is reported as ominous, that one of their Ensigns stuck so fast in the ground, as it could not be plucked up by the Ensign-bearer. Of this tale, whether true or false, Tully makes a jest, saying, That the cowardly knave did faintly pull at it (as going now to fight) having hardly pitched it into the earth. Neither was the answer of Flaminius (if it were true) disagreeable hereto: for he commanded that it should be digged up, if fear had made the hands too weak to lift it: asking withal, whether letters were not come from the Senate, to hinder his proceedings. Of this their jealousy, both he and the Senate that did give him cause, are likely to repent.

All the Territory of Cortona, as far as to the Lake of Thrasymene, was on a light fire; which while the Consul thought to quench with his enemies blood, he pursued Hannibal to unadvisedly, that he fell with his whole Army into an ambush cunningly laid for him between the Mountains of Cortona and the Lake. There was he charged unawares, on all sides, (save only where that great Lake of Perusia, permitted neither his enemies to come at him, nor him to fly from them) knowing not which way to turn, or make resistance. So was he slain in the place, accompanied with fifteen thousand dead carcases of his Country-men. About six thousand of his men, that had the Vanguard, took courage, as for the most part it happens, out of desperation: and breaking thorow the enemies, that stood in their way, recovered the tops of the Mountains. If these had returned, and given charge upon the Carthaginians backs, it was thought that they might have greatly amended, if not wholly altered the fortune of the day. But that violence of their fear, which kindled by necessity had wrought the effects of hardiness, was well allayed, when they ceased to despair of saving their lives by flight. They fought still, in a cold sweat, upon the Hill-top, hearing under them a terrible noise, but not any way discovering how things went, because of the great fog that held all that morning. When it grew toward noon, the Air was cleared, and they might plainly discern the lamentable slaughter of their fellows. But they staid not to lament it; for it was high time, they thought, to be gone ere they were destroyed and attached by the enemies horse. This they should have thought upon sooner, since they had no mind to return into the fight. For, destroyed they were, and Maharbal sent after them, who overtook them by night in a Village, which he surrounded with his horse: and so they yielded the next day, rendering up their arms, upon his promise of their lives and liberties.

This accord Hannibal refused to confirm; saying, that it was made by Maharbal without sufficient warrant, as wanting his authority to make it good. Herein he taught them (yet little to his own honour) what it was to keep no faith: and fitted them with a trick of their own. For if it were lawful unto the Romans, to alter covenants, or add unto them what they listed; if the Carthaginians, must be fain to pay certain hundreds, and yet more hundreds of talents, besides their first bargains; as also to renounce their interest in Sardinia, and be limited in their Spanish Conquests, according to the good pleasure of the Romans, whose present advantage is more ample, than the conditions of the late concluded Peace: then can Hannibal be as Roman, as themselves; and make them know, that perfidiousness gaineth no more in prosperity, than it loseth in the the change of fortune. Fifteen thousand Italian prisoners, or thereabout, he had in his hands: of which, all that were not Romans, he set free without ransom; protesting, as he had done before, that it was for their sakes, and to free them and others from the Roman tyranny, that he had undertaken this war. But the Romans he kept in straight prison, and in fetters, making them learn to eat hard meat. This was a good way to breed in the people of Italy, if not a love of Carthage, yet a contempt of Rome: as if this war had not concerned the general safety, but only the preserving of her own neck from the yoke of slavery, which her over-strong enemies would thrust upon her in revenge of her oppressions. But an ancient reputation confirmed by success of many ages, is not lost in one or two battles. Wherefore more is to be done, ere the Carthaginians can get any Italian Partisans.

Presently after the battle of Thrasymene, C. Centropius, with four thousand Roman horse, drew near unto the Camp of Hannibal. He was sent from Ariminum by Servilius the other Consul, to increase the strength of Flaminius: but, coming too late, he increased only the misadventure. Maharbal was employed by Hannibal, to intercept this company; who finding them amazed with report which they had newly heard of the great overthrow, charged them, and brake them: and killing almost half of them, drave the rest unto a high piece of ground, where they came down, and simply yielded to mercy the next day. Servilius himself was in the mean time skirmishing with the Gauls; against whom he had wrought no matter of importance, when the news was brought him of his Colleagues overthrow and death in Hetruria; that made him hasten back to the defence of Rome.

In these passages, it is easy to discern the fruits of popular jealousy, which persuaded the Romans to the yearly change of their Commanders in the wars; which greatly endangered, and retarded the growth of that Empire. Certain it is, that all men are far better taught by their own errors, than by the examples of their foregoers. Flaminius had heard in what a trap Sempronius had been taken up but the year before, by this subtle Carthaginian; yet suffered he himself to be caught soon after in the same manner. He had also belike forgotten how Sempronius, fearing to be prevented by a new Consul, and ambitious of the sole honour of beating Hannibal in battle, without help of his companion Scipio, had been rewarded with shame and loss, else would he not, contrary to all good advice, have been so hasty to fight, before the arrival of Servilius. If Sempronius had been continued in his charge, it is probable that he would have taken his companion with him the second time, and have searched all suspected places, proper to have shadowed an ambush: both which this new Consul Flaminius neglected. We may boldly avow it, that by being continued in his Government of France ten years, Caesar brought that mighty Nation, together with the Helvetians and many of the Germans, under the Roman yoke; into which parts had there been every year a new Lieutenant sent, they would hardly, if ever, have been subdued. For it is more than the best wit in the World can do, to inform it self, within one years compass, of the nature of a great Nation, of the Factions, of the Places, Rivers, and of all good helps, whereby to prosecute a War to the best effect. Our Princes have commonly left their Deputies in Ireland three years; whence by reason of the shortness of that their time, many of them have returned as wise as they went out; others have profited more, & yet when they began but to know the first rudiments of War, and Government, fitting the Country, they have been called home, and new Apprentices sent in their places, to the great prejudice both of this and that Estate. But it hath ever been the old course of the World rather to follow the errors, than to examine them: and of Princes and Governours to uphold their foolish ignorance, by the old examples and policy of other ages and people; though neither likeness of time, of occasion, or of any other circumstance, have persuaded the imitation.

How Q. Fabius the Roman Dictator, sought to consume the force of Hannibal, by lingering War. Minutius the Master of the Horse, honoured and advanced by the People, for bold and successful attempting adventures rashly upon Hannibal, and as like to perish with his Army, and rescued by Fabius.

Greatly were the Romans amazed at this their ill success, and at the danger apparent; which threatened them in more terrible manner, than ever did war since Rome it self was taken. They were good Souldiers, and so little accustomed to receive an overthrow, that when Pyrrhus had beaten them, once and again, in open field, all Italy was strangely affected with his success, and held him in admiration, as one that could could work wonders. But Pyrrhus his quarrel was not grounded upon hate: he only sought honour, and fought (as it were, upon a bravery; demeaning himself like a courteous enemy. This Carthaginian detested the whole Roman name; against which he burned with desire of revenge. Ticinus, Trebia, and Thrasymene, witnessed his purpose, and his ability; which to withstand, they fled unto a remedy that had long been out of use, and created a Dictator. The Dictator's power was greater than the Consuls, and scarcely subject unto controul of the whole City: Wherefore this Officer was seldom chosen, but upon some extremity, and for no longer time than six months. He was to be named by one of the Consuls, at the appointment of the Senate: though it were so, that the Consul (if he stood upon his prerogative) might name whom he pleased. At this time the one Consul being dead, and the other too far off, the people took upon them, as having supremacy authority, to give the Dignity by their election, to Q. Fabius Maximus; the best reputed man of war in the City. Novum saluum novum consilium expectis, contrary winds, contrary counsels. Q. Fabius chose M. Minutius Rufus Master of the horse: which Officer was customarily as the Dictators Lieutenant; though this Minutius grew afterwards famous, by taking more upon him.

The first act of Fabius, was the reformation of somewhat amiss in matters of Religion: a good beginning and commendable; had the Religion been also good. But if it were true (as Livie reports it) that the Books of Sybil were consulted, and gavedirection in this business of devotion; then must we believe that those books of Sybil, preserved in Rome, were dictated by an evil spirit. For it was ordained, that some Vow made in the beginning of this war to Mars, should be made anew, and amplified, as having not been rightly made before: also that great Plays should be vowed unto Jupiter, and a Temple to Venus; with such other Trumpery. This vehemency of superstition, proceeds always from vehemency of fear. And surely this was a time, when Rome was exceedingly distempered with passions; whereof that memorable accident, of two women that suddenly died, when they saw their Sons return alive from Thrasymene, may serve to bear witness, though it be more properly an example of motherly love. The Walls and Towers of the City were now repaired and fortified; the Bridges upon Rivers were broken down, and all care taken for defence of Rome itself. In this tumult, when the Dictator was newly set forth against Hannibal, word was brought that the Carthaginian Fleet had intercepted all the supply, that was going to Cn. Scipio in Spain. Against these Carthaginians, Fabius commanded sevilius the Consul to put to Sea; and taking up all the ships about Rome and Offida, to pursue them: whilst he, with the Legions, attended upon Hannibal. Four Legions had levied in haste: and from Ariminum he received the Army which Stroilus the Consul had conducted thither.

With these forthwith he followed after Hannibal; not to fight, but to affront him: And knowing well, what advantage the Numidian horse had over the Romans, he always lodged himself on high grounds, and of hard access. Hannibal in the mean while, pursuing his victory, had ranged over all the Country, and used all manner of cruelty towards the inhabitants; especially to those of the Roman Nation, of whom he did put to the sword all that were able to bear arms. Passing by Spoltum and Ancona, he incamped upon the Adriatick shores, refreshed his diseased, and over-travelled Companies, armed his Africans after the manner of the Romans, and made his dispatches from Carthage; presenting his friends, which were in effect, all the Citizens with part of the spoils that he had gotten. Having refreshed his army, fed his horses, cured his wounded Soldiers, and (as Polybius hath it) healed his horse heels of the scratches, by washing their patterns in old wine: he followed the coast of the Adriatick Sea towards Apulia a Northern Province of the Kingdom of Naples spoiling the Marrucini, and all other Nations lying in his way. In all this ground that he over-ran, he had not taken any one City: onely he had assailed Spoletum a Colony of the Romans; and finding it well defended, presently gave it over. The malice of a great Army is broken, and the force of it spent in a great siege. This the Protestant Army found true at Pauidiers, a little before the battle of Moncousieur; and their victorious enemies, anon after at S. Jean d'Angely. But Hannibal was more wise. He would not engage himself in any such enterprise, as should detain him, and give the Romans leave to take breath. All his care was to weaken them in force and reputation: knowing, that when once he was absolute Master of the field, it would not be long ere the walled Cities would open their gates, without expecting any engine of battery. To this end he presented Fabius with battle, as soon as he saw him; and provoked him with all manner of bravadoes. But Fabius would not bite. He knew well the differences between souldiers bred up, ever since they were boyes, in war and in blood, trained and hardened in Spain, made proud and adventurous by many victories there, and of late by some notable acts against the Romans; and such, as had no other seen the enemy, than been vanquished by him. Therefore he attended the Carthaginian so near, as he kept him from stragling too far; and preserved the country from utter spoil. He injured his men by little and little, and made them acquainted with dangers by degrees, and he brought them first to look on the Lyon afar off, that in the end he might sit on his tail.

Now Minutius had a contrary disposition, and was as fiery as Flaminius: taxing Fabius with cowardice and fear. But all stirred not this well-advised Commander. For wise men are no more moved with such noise, than with wind bruised out of a bladder. There is nothing of more indiscretion and danger, than to pursue misfortune: it waiteth it self sooner by sufferance, than by opposition. It is the invading Army that desires battle: and this of Hannibal, was both the invading and victorious. Fabius therefore suffered Hannibal to cross the Apennines, and to fall upon the most rich and pleasant Territory of Campania; neither could he by any arguments be persuaded, to adventure the Roman Army in battle: but being far too weak in horse, he always kept the hills and fast grounds. When Hannibal saw he could by no means draw this wary Dictator to fight, that the Winter came on, and that the Towns stood firm for the Romans, whose Legions were in fight, though afar off; he resolved to rest his Army, that was laden with spoil, in some plentiful and assured place, till the following spring. But ere this can be done he must pass along by the Dictators camp, that hung over his head upon the hills of Collicula, and Cassinum: for other way there was none, by which he might issue out of that goodly garden-country, which he had already wasted, into places more abundant of provision for his wintering. It was by meer error of his guide, that he first entred within these straights. For he would have been directed unto Cassinum, whence he might both assay the fair City of Capua, which had made him friendly promises under-hand, and hinder the Romans from coming near it to prevent him. But his guide mis-understood the Carthaginian pronunciation, and conducted him awry another way, from Cassinum to Cassinum, whence Fabius hoped that he should not easily escape. Now began the wisdom of Fabius to grow into credit; as if he had taken the Carthaginians in a trap, and won the victory without blows. But Hannibal reformed this opinion, and freed himself, by a sleight invention, yet serving the turn as well as a better. In driving the country, he had gotten about two thousand Kine, whose horns he dressed with dry faggots, and setting fire to them in the dark night, caused them to be driven up the hills. The spectacle was strange, and therefore terrible; especially to those that knew it to be a work of a terrible enemy. What it should mean, Fabius could not tell; but thought it a device to circumvent him, and therefore kept within his Trenches. They that kept the hill tops were horribly afraid, when some of these fiery Monsters were gotten beyond them; and ran therefore hastily away, thinking the enemies were behind their backs; and fell among the light-armed Carthaginians, that were no less afraid of them. So Hannibal, with his whole Army recovered sure ground without molestation: where he staid till the next morning, and then brought off his light footmen, with some slaughter of the Romans, that began to hold them in skirmish. After this, Hannibal made semblance of taking his journey towards Rome: and the Dictator coasted him in the wonted manner; keeping still on high grounds, between him and the City, whilst the Carthaginian wasted all the Plains. The Carthaginian took Geryon, an old ruinous Town in Apulia, forsaken by the inhabitants, which he turned into Barns and Store-houses for winter, and incamped under the broken wall. Other matter of importance he did none: but the time passed idly, till the Dictator was called away to Rome, about some business of Religion, and left the Army in charge with Minutius the Master of the horse.

Minutius was glad of this good occasion to shew his own sufficiency. He was fully persuaded, that his Romans, in plain field would be too hard for the Africans and Spaniards: by whom if they had been foiled already twice or thrice, it was not by open force, but by subtlety and ambush, which he thought himself wise enough to prevent. All the Army was of his opinion; and that so earnestly, as he was preferred, by judgement of the Souldiers, in worthiness to command, before the cold and wary Fabius. In this jollity of conceit, he determined to fight. Yet had he been peremptorily forbidden so to do, by the Dictator; the breach of whose command was extream peril of death.

could work wonders. But Pyrrhus his quarrel was not grounded upon hate: he only fought honour, and fought (as it were, upon a bravery; demeaning himself like a courteous enemy. This Carthaginian detested the whole Roman name; against which he burned with desire of revenge. Ticinus, Trebia, and Thrasymene, witnessed his purpose, and his ability; which to withstand, they fled unto a remedy that had long been out of use, and created a Dictator. when the Dictator was newly set forth against Hannibal, word was brought that the Carthaginian Fleet had intercepted all the supply, that was going to Cn. Scipio in Spain. Against these Carthaginians, Fabius commanded Servilius the Consul to put to Sea; and taking up all the ships about Rome and Osia, to pursue them: whilst he, with the Legions, attended upon Hannibal. Four Legions he had levied in haste: and from Ariminum he received the Army which Servilius the Consul had conducted thither.

With these forthwith he followed apace after Hannibal; not to fight, but to affront him. And knowing well, what advantage the Numidian horse had over the Romans, he always lodged himself on high grounds, and of hard access. Hannibal in the mean while, pursuing his victory, had ranged over all the Country, and used all manner of cruelty towards the inhabitants; especially to those of the Roman Nation, of whom he did put to the sword all that were able to bear arms. Passing by Spoletum and Ancona, he incamped upon the Adriatick shores; refreshed his diseased, and over-travelled Companies, armed his Africans after the manner of the Romans, and made his dispatches from Carthage; presenting his friends, which were in effect, all the Citizens with part of the spoils that he had gotten. Having refreshed his army, fed his horses, cured his wounded Soldiers, and (as Polybius hath it) healed his horse heels of the scratches, by washing their pasterns in old wine: he followed the coast of the Adriatick Sea towards Apulia a Northern Province of the Kingdom of Naples spoiling the Murrucini, and all other Nations lying in his way. In all this ground that he over-ran, he had not taken any one City: only he had assailed Spoletum a Collony of the Romans; and finding it well defended, presently gave it over. The malice of a great Army is broken, and the force of it spent in a great siege. This the Protestant Army found true at Positiers, a little before the battle of Moncontours; and their victorious enemies, anon after at S. Jean d'Angely. But Hannibal was more wile. He would not engage himself in any such enterprise, as should detain him, and give the Romans leave to take breath. All his care was to weaken them in force and reputation: knowing, that when once he was absolute Master of the field, it would not be long ere the walled Cities would open their gates, without expecting any engine of battery. To this end he presented Fabius with battle, as soon as he saw him; and provoked him with all manner of bravadoes. But Fabius would not bite. He knew well the differences between soldiers bred up, ever since they were boys, in war and in blood, trained and hardened in Spain, made proud and adventurous by many victories there, and of late by some notable acts against the Romans; and such, as had no other seen the enemy, than been vanquished by him. Therefore he attended the Carthaginian too near, as he kept him from stragling too far; and preserved the country from utter spoil. He inured his men by little and little, and made them acquainted with dangers by degrees, and he brought them first to look on the Lyon afar off, that in the end he might sit on his tail.

Now Minutius had a contrary disposition, and was as fiery as Flaminius: taxing Fabius with cowardice and fear. But all stirred not this well-advised Commander. For wise men are no more moved with such noise, than with wind bruised out of a bladder. There is nothing of more indifferency and danger, than to pursue misfortune: it wasteth it self sooner by sufferance, than by opposition. It is the invading Army that desires battle: and this of Hannibal was both the invading and victorious. Fabius therefore suffered Hannibal to cross the Apennines, and to fall upon the most rich and pleasant Territory of Campania; neither could he by any arguments be persuaded, to adventure the Roman Army in battle: but being far too weak in horse, he always kept the Hills and fast grounds. When Hannibal saw he could by no means draw this wary Dictator to fight, that the Winter came on, and that the Towns stood firm for the Romans, whose Legions were in fight, though afar off; he resolved to rest his Army, that was laden with spoil, in some plentiful and assured place, till the following spring. But ere this can be done he must pass along by the Dictators camp, that hung over his head upon the hills of Collicula, and Castellum: for which way there was none, by which he might issue out of that goodly garden-country, which he had already wasted, into places more abundant of provision for his wintering. It was by meer error of his guide, that he first entred within these straights. For he would have been directed unto Castellum, whence he might both assay the fair City of Capua, which had made him friendly promises under-hand, and hinder the Romans from coming near it to prevent him. But his guide mis-understood the Carthaginian pronunciation, and conducted him awry another way, from Castellum to Castellum, whence Fabius hoped that he should not easily escape. Now began the wisdom of Fabius to grow into credit; as if he had taken the Carthaginians in a trap, and won the victory without blows. But Hannibal reformed this opinion, and freed himself, by a sleight invention, yet serving the turn as well as a better. In driving the country, he had gotten about two thousand Kine, whose horns he dressed with dry faggots, and setting fire to them in the dark night, caused them to be driven up the hills. The spectacle was strange, and therefore terrible; especially to those that knew it to be a work of a terrible enemy. What it should mean, Fabius could not tell; but thought it a device to circumvent him, and therefore kept within his Trenches. They that kept the hill tops were horribly afraid, when some of these fiery Monsters were gotten beyond them; and ran therefore hastily away, thinking the enemies were behind their backs; and fell among the light-armed Carthaginians, that were no less afraid of them. So Hannibal, with his whole Army recovered sure ground without molestation: where he staid till the next morning, and then brought off his light footmen, with some slaughter of the Romans, that began to hold them in skirmish. After this, Hannibal made semblance of taking his journey towards Rome: and the Dictator coasted him in the wonted manner; keeping still on high grounds, between him and the City, whilst the Carthaginian waited all the Plains. The Carthaginian took Geryon, an old ruinous Town in Apulia, forsaken by the Inhabitants, which he turned into Barns and Store-houses for winter, and incamped under the broken wall. Other matter of importance he did none: but the time passed idly, till the Dictator was called away to Rome, about some business of Religion, and left the Army in charge with Minutius the Master of the horse.

Minutius was glad of this good occasion to shew his own sufficiency. He was fully persuaded, that his Romans, in plain field would be too hard for the Africans and Spaniards: by whom if they had been foiled already twice or thrice, it was not by open force, but by subtlety and ambush, which he thought himself wile enough to prevent. All the Army was of his opinion; and that so earnestly, as he was preferred, by judgement of the Soldiers, in worthiness to command, before the cold and wary Fabius. In this jollity of conceit, he determined to fight. Yet had he been peremptorily forbidden so to do, by the Dictator; the breach of whose command was extreme peril of death.

death. But the honour of the victory, which he held undoubtedly his own; and the love of the Army, and the friends that he had at home bearing office in Rome, were enough to save him from the Dictators rods and axes, took he the matter never so haughtily. Hannibal on the other side was no less glad, that he should play with a more adventurous Gamester. Therefore he drew near, and to provoke the Romans, sent forth a third part of his Army to waste the Country. This was boldly done, seeing that Minutius incamped hard by him: but it seems, that he now despised those whom he had so often vanquished. There was a piece of high ground between the two Camps; which because it would be commodious to him that could occupy it, the Carthaginians seized upon by night with two thousand of their light armed. But Minutius, by plain force, won it from them the next day; and intrenching himself thereupon, became their nearer neighbour.

The main business of Hannibal at this time was, to provide abundantly, not only for his men, but for his Horses, which he knew to be the chief of his strength; that he might keep them in good heart against the next Summer: if besides this he could give the Romans another blow, it would increase his reputation, encourage his own men, terrify his enemies, and give him leave to forage the Country at will. Since therefore Minutius did not in many days issue forth of his Camp, the Carthaginian sent out (as before) a great number of his men, to fetch in harvest. This advantage Minutius wisely espied, and took. For he led forth his Army, and setting it in order, presented battle to Hannibal, that was not in case to accept it, even at his own Trenches. His horses, and all his light Armature, divided into many companies, he sent abroad against the foragers; who being dispersed over all the fields, and laden with booty, could make no resistance. This angered Hannibal, that was not able to help them; but worse did it anger him, when the Romans took heart to assail his Trenches. They perceived that it was meer weakness, which held him within his Camp, and therefore were bold to despise his great name, that could not resist their present strength. But in the heat of the business, Asdrubal came from Geryon with four thousand men, being informed of the danger, by those that had escaped the Roman horse. This emboldened Hannibal to issue forth against the Romans; to whom nevertheless he did not much hurt, as he had received.

For this piece of service Minutius was highly esteemed by the Army; and more highly by the people at Rome, to whom he sent the news, with somewhat greater boast than truth. It seemed no small matter, that the Roman Army had recovered spirit, so far forth that it dared to set upon Hannibal in his own Camp; and that in so doing, it came off with the better. Every man therefore praised the Master of the Horse, that had wrought this great alteration; and consequently, they grew as far out of liking with Fabius and his timorous proceedings, thinking that he had not done any thing wisely, in all his Dictatorship: saying that he chose such a worthy Lieutenant; whereas indeed in no other thing he had so greatly erred. But the Dictator was not so joyful of a little good luck, as angry with the breach of discipline; and fearful of greater danger, thereon likely to ensue. He said that he knew his own place, and what was to be done: that he would teach the Master of the Horse to do so likewise; and make him give account of what he had done, if he were Dictator: speaking it openly. That good success issuing from bad counsel, was more to be feared, than calamities for as much as the one breeds foolish confidence, the other taught men to be wary. Against these Sermons every one cried out, especially Metellus, a Tribune of the people: whose office warranted him to speak, and do what he list, without fear of the Dictator. Is it not enough (said he) that this our only Man, chosen to be General, and Lord of the Town, in our greatest necessity, hath done no manner of good, but suffered all Italy to be wasted before his eyes, to the utter shame of our State; unless he also hinder others, from doing better than himself can, or dares? It were good to consider what he means by this. Into the place of C. Flaminius he hath not chosen any new Consul all this while; Servilius is sent away to Sea, I know not why; Hannibal and he, have as it were taken Truce; Hannibal sparing the Dictators grounds: (for Hannibal had indeed torbored to spoil some grounds of Fabius, that so he might bring him into envy and suspicion) and the Dictator giving him leave to spoil all others, without impeachment. Surely his drift is even this: he would have the War to last long, that he himself might be long in office, and have the sole Government both of our City and Armies. But this must not be so. It were better, that the Commonalty of Rome, which gave him this authority, should again take it from him and confer it upon one more worthy. But lest, in moving the people people hereto, I should seem to do him injury; thus far forth I will regard his honour: I will only propound, That the Master of the Horse may be joined in equal authority with the Dictator; a thing not more new, nor less necessary, than was the election of this Dictator, by the People.

Though all men, even the Senators, were ill persuaded of the course which Fabius had taken against Hannibal, as being neither plausible, nor seeming beneficial at the present; yet was there none so injurious, as to think that his general intent, and care of the Weal-publique, was less than very honourable. Whereas therefore it was the manner, in passing of any act, that some man of credit and authority, besides the propounder, should stand up, and formally deliver his approbation, not one of the principal Citizens was found so impudent, as to offer that open disgrace, both unto a worthy Personage, and (therewithal) unto that dignity, whose great power had freed the State at several times, from the greatest dangers. Only C. Terentius Varro, who the year before had been Prator, was glad of such an opportunity, to win the favour of the Multitude. This fellow was the son of a Butcher, afterwards became a Shop-keeper; and being of a contentious spirit, grew by often brabbling, to take upon him as a Pleader, dealing in poor mens causes. Thus by little and little he got into Office; and rose by degrees, being advanced by those, who in hatred of the Nobility favoured his very baseness. And now he thought the time was come, for him to give a hard push at the Consulship; by doing that, which none of the great men, fearing or favouring one another, either durst or would. So he made an hot invective, not only against Fabius, but against all the Nobility; saying, That it grieved them to see the people do well, and take upon them what belonged unto them, in matter of Government; That they fought to humble the Commons by poverty, and to impoverish them by War; especially by War at their own doors, which would soon consume every poor mans living, and find him other work to think upon, than matter of State. Therefore he bade them to be wise; and since they had found one (this worthy Master of the Horse) that was better affected unto them and his Country, to reward him according to his good deserts; and give him authority, according as was propounded by the Tribune, that so he might be encouraged and enabled to proceed as he had begun. So the Act passed.

Before this busy day of contention, Fabius had dispatched the election of new Consul, which was M. Atilius Regulus, in the room of C. Flaminius; and, having finished all requisite business, went out of Town, perceiving well, that he should not be able to withstand the multitude in hindering the decree. The news of Minutius his advancement, was at the camp as soon as Fabius: so that his old Lieutenant, and new Colleague, began to treat with him as a Companion; asking him at the first, in what sort he thought it best to divide their authority: whether that one, one day; and the other, the next; or each of them successively, for some longer time, should command in chief. Fabius briefly told him, That it was the pleasure of the Citizens, to make the Master of the Horse equal to the Dictator, but that he should never be his superior: He would therefore divide the Legions with him by lot, according to the custom. Minutius was not herewith greatly pleased; for that with half of the Army he could not work such wonders as otherwise he hoped to accomplish. Nevertheless he meant to do his best, and so taking his part of the Army, incamped about a mile and a half from the Dictator. Needful it was (though Livy seems to tax him for it) that he should do so. For where two several Commanders are not subordinate one unto another, nor joyined in Commission, but have each intire and absolute charge of his own followers, there are the forces (though belonging to one Prince or State) not one, but two distinct Armies: in which regard, one Camp shall not hold them both without great inconvenience. Polybius neither finds fault with this distinction, nor yet reports, that Fabius was unwilling to command in chief successively (as the two Consuls used) with Minutius, by turns. He saith that Minutius was very refractory, and so proud of his advancement, that continually he opposed the Dictator: who thereupon referred it to his choice, either to divide the forces between them, as is said before, or else to have command over all by course. This is likely to be true. For Natures impatient of subjection, when once they have broken loose from the rigour of authority, love nothing more, than to contest with it; as if herein consisted the proof and assurance of their liberty.

It behoved the Master of the horse to make good the opinion which had thus advanced him. Therefore he was no less careful of getting occasion to fight, than was Fabius of avoiding the necessity. That which Minutius and Hannibal equally desired, could uncertain. Fourcore thousand foot, at the least, and six thousand horse, they were strong in the field, when the day came, which Varro had so greatly desired, of looking upon Hannibal.

Hiero the old King of Syracuse, as he had relieved the Carthaginians, when they were distressed by their own Mercenaries; so did he now send help to Rome, a thousand Archers, and Slingers, with great quantity of Wheat, Barley, and other Provisions: fearing nothing more, than that one of these two mighty Cities should destroy the other, whereby his own estate would fall to ruins, that stood upright, by having them somewhat evenly balanced. He gave them also counsel, to send forces into Africa; if (perhaps) by that means they might divert the war from home. His gifts, and good advice were lovingly accepted; and instructions were given to Titus Othacilius the Prætor, which was to go into Sicily, that he should accordingly pass over into Africa, if he found it expedient.

The great Levies, which the Romans made at this time, do much more serve to declare their puilliance, than any, though larger account by Poll, of such as were not easily drawn into the field, and fitted for service. For, besides these Armies of the Consuls, and that which went into Sicily, twenty five thousand, with L. Posthumus Albinus, another of the Prætors, went against the Gauls, to reclaim that Province, which the passage of Hannibal through it, had taken from them. The contemplation of this their present strength might well embolden them to do as they did. They sent Embassadors to Philip, the Son of Demetrius, King of Macedon, requiring him to deliver into their hands Demetrius Pharius: who, having been their subject, and rebell, was fled into his Kingdom. They also sent to the Illyrians, to demand their tribute; whereof the day of payment was already past. What answer they received, it is not known: only this is known, that Demetrius Pharius was not sent unto them; and that Philip henceforth began to have an eye upon them, little to their good. As for the Illyrian money, by the shifts that they were driven soon after to make, it will appear, that the one half of it (how little soever) would have been welcome to Rome, and accepted, without any cavil about forfeiture for non-payment of the whole.

Whilst the City was busied in these cares, the old Consuls lay as near unto Hannibal as possibly they could without incurring the necessity of a battle. Many skirmishes they had with him; wherein their success, for the most part, was rather good than great. Yet one mischance not only blemished the honour of their other services, but was indeed the occasion to draw on the misery following. Hannibal for the most part of that time, made his abode at Geryon; where lay all his store for the Winter. The Romans to be near him, lodged about Cannusium; and, that they might not be driven to turn aside for all necessities, to the loss of good opportunities, they bestowed much of their provisions in the Castle of Canna: for the Town was razed the year before. This place Hannibal wan, and thereby not only furnished himself, but compelled his enemies to want many needfull things, unless they would be troubled with far carriage. Besides this, and more to his advantage, he enabled himself to abide in that open Country, fit for the service of his Horse, longer than the Romans, having so many mouths to feed, could well endure to tarry; without offering battle, which he most desired. Of this mishap when Servilius had informed the Senate, letting them understand how this Piece taken by Hannibal, would serve him to command no small part of the Country adjacent; it then seemed needfull, even unto the Fathers themselves, to adventure a battle with the Carthaginians, rather than suffer him thus to take root in the ground of Italy. Nevertheless answer was returned unto Servilius, that he should have patience yet awhile: for that the Consuls would shortly be there, with a Power sufficient to do as need required.

When all things were ready in the City, and the season of the year commodious to take the field, the two Consuls, with their Army, set forth against Hannibal. This was always done with great solemnity: especially, whensoever they went forth to war against any noble or redoubted Enemy. For Sacrifices, and solemn Vows, were made unto Jupiter, and the rest of their gods, for good success and Victory: which being performed, the Generals in warlike attire, with an honourable train of the principal men, (not only such as were of their kindred and alliance, or followed them to the war, as Volunteers for love, but a great number of others that meant to abide at home,) were accompanied on their way, and dismissed with friendly leave-taking, and good wishes. At this time, all the Fathers, and the whole Nobility, waited upon Emilius Paulus, as the only Man, whom they thought either worthy of this honour, or likely to do his Country remarkable service. Tarentius his

Attendants

Attendants were the whole multitude of the poorer Citizens; a troop no less in greatness, than the other was in dignity. At the parting, Fabius the late Dictator, is said to have exhorted the Consul Paulus, with many grave words, to shew his magnanimity, not only in dealing with the Carthaginians, but (which he thought harder) in bridling the outrageous folly of his fellow-Consul. The answer of Paulus, was, That he meant not again to run into danger of condemnation by offending the multitude; that he would do his best for his Country, but if he saw his best were likely to be ill taken, he would think it less rashness to adventure upon the Enemies sword, than upon the malice of his own Citizens.

§. VIII.

Diffension between the two Roman Consuls: Whether it be likely, that Hannibal was upon point of flying out of Italy, when the Romans pressed him to fight. The great battle of Cannæ.

THESE new Generals, arriving at the Camp, dismissed M. Attilius, one of the last years Consuls, requesting it because of his age and weakness: Servilius they retained with them, as their assistant. The first thing that Emilius thought necessary, was, to hearten his Souldiers with good words; who out of their bad success hitherto, had gathered more cause of fear, than of courage. He willed them to consider not only now, their victories in time past against the Carthaginians, and other more warlike Nations than were the Carthaginians, but even their own great numbers: which were no less than all that Rome at the present was able to set forth. He told them in what danger their Country stood; how the state and safety thereof rested upon their hands; using some such other common matter of persuasion. But the most effectual part of this Oration, was, That Hannibal with this his terrible Army, had not yet obtained one victory by plain force and valour: but that only by deceit and ambush he had stoll the honour, which he had gotten at Trebia and Thrasymene. Herewithall he taxed the inconsiderate rashness of Sempronius and Flaminius; of whom the one saw not his enemies, until he was surrounded by them; the other scarce saw them, when they struck off his head, by reason of the thick mist, through the darkness whereof he went groping (as it were blinde-fold) into their snares.

Finally declaring what advantages they had against the Enemy; and how destitute the Enemy was of those helps, by which he had hitherto prevailed against them; he exhorted them to play the men, and do their best. They were easily persuaded; for the contemplation of their own multitude, and confidence of the Roman virtue in matter of Arms, gave them cause to think, that under a Captain so well experienced, and every way sufficient, as Emilius was known to be, they should easily prevail against the Carthaginians, that came short of them in all things else, save craft; which would not always thrive. But in one thing they mistook the meaning of their General. It was his desire that they should have heart to fight; not that they should lose the patience of awaiting a convenient season. But they, having preconceived a victory, thought all delays to be impediments: and thereby sought to rob themselves of their best help; which was, Good conduct. They remembered what talk they had heard at Rome: and were themselves affected with the vulgar desire, of ending the war quickly; wherein since Emilius had acknowledged, that the advantage was theirs, why did he make them, forbear to use it: Thus thought the common Souldier: and thus also thought the Consul Tarentius; who was no less popular in the Camp, than he had been in the City. Expectation is always tedious; and never more, than when the Event is of most importance. All men longed, both at Rome, and in the Army, to be freed from the doubtfull passions of Hope and Fear: therefore Tarentius, who hastened their desire to effect, was likely to win more thanks, than should his Colleague, though greater in performance.

Thus while the Romans think themselves to have the better of their enemies, they fall into an inconvenience, than which few are more dangerous; Diffension of their chief Commanders. Varro would fight; Emilius would so too, but said that it was not yet time; why? because the enemy must shortly dislodge, and remove hence; into places less fit for his horse. But shall the Romans wait, till Hannibal, having eaten up his last years provisions, return into Campania to gather a second Harvest? This would (said Varro) favour too much of Q. Fabius: And your haste (said Paulus) doth favour no less of C. Flaminius. Their deeds were like their words: for they commanded by turns interchangeably every day. Emilius lodged six miles from Hannibal, where the

the ground was somewhat uneven. Thither if the Carthaginians would take pains to come, he doubted not to send them away in such haste, as they should not leave running till they were out of Italy. But they came not. Terentius therefore the next day descended into the Plains; his Colleague holding him, and beseeching him to stay. Nevertheless, he sat down close by Hannibal; who, as an unbidden guest, gave him but a rude welcome and entertainment. The Carthaginian Horse, and light armature, fell upon the Roman Vant-courers; and put the whole Army in tumult, whilst it was yet in march: but they were beaten off, not without loss, for that the Romans had among their Vestites, some troops weightily armed, whereas the Carthaginians had none. The day following, Emilius, who could not handsomely withdraw the Army out of that level ground, incamped upon the River Ausidus; sending a third part of his forces over the water, to lie upon the Eastern bank, where they entrenched themselves. He never was more unwilling to fight than at this present; because the ground served wholly for the advantage of his enemy; with whom he meant to deal, when occasion should draw him to more equal terms. Therefore he stirred not out of his Trenches, but fortified himself, expecting when Hannibal should dislodge, and remove towards Geryon, Canna, or some other place, where his store lay, for want of necessaries: whereof an Army foraging the Country, was not likely to carry about with it sufficient quantity, for any long time.

Here it would not be passed over with silence, That Livie differeth much in his Relation from Polybius; telling many strange tales, of the misery into which Hannibal had been driven; and of base courses that he deviled to take, if the Romans could have retained their patience a little longer. He had (saith Livie) but ten dayes provision of meat. He had not money to pay his souldiers. They were an unruly Rabble, gathered out of several Nations, so that he knew not how to keep them in order; but that from murmuring, they fell to flat exclamations, first, about their Pay, and Provant, and afterwards for very famine. Especially the Spaniards were ready to forsake him, and run over to the Roman side. Yea Hannibal himself was once upon the point, to have stoln away into Gaul with all his horse, and left his foot unto their miserable destinies. At length for lack of all other counsel, he resolved to get him as far as he could from the Romans, into the Southernmost parts of Apulia; to the end, that both his unfaithfull Souldiers might find the more difficulty in running from him; and that his hunger might be relieved with the more early harvest. But whilst he was about to put this device in execution, the Romans pressed him so hard, that they even forced him to that, which he most desired, even to fight a battel upon open Champaign ground: wherein he was victorious. It was not uncommendable in Livie, to speak the best of his own Citizens; and, where they did ill, to say, That, without their own great folly, they had done passing well. Further also he may be excused; as writing only by report. For thus he saith, Hannibal de fuga in Galliam dictum agitate; Hannibal [he said] to have thought himself of flying into Gaul: where he makes it no more than a matter of hearsay; as perhaps was all the rest of this Relation. As for the process it self, it is very incredible. For if Hannibal, coming out of Gaul, thorow the Marishes and Bogs of Helvetia, could find victuals enough, and all things needfull unto his Army, the Summer foregoing: what should hinder him to do the like this year; especially since he had plaid the careful Husband in making a great harvest; since he had long been Master of the open field; and besides, had gotten, by surprise, no small part of the Romans provisions? Suitable hereunto is all the rest. If Hannibal had taken nothing but Corn and Cattel, his Souldiers might perhaps have fallen into mutiny for pay. But he brought gold with him into Italy: and had so well increased his stock, since he came into that Country, that he had armed his African Souldiers, all Roman-like, and loaded his followers with spoil: having left where-with to redeem as many of his own, as were taken by the enemy: when the Romans were not willing, as finding it not easy to do the like. In this point therefore, we are to attend the general agreement of Historians; who give it as a principal commendation unto Hannibal, That he always kept his Army free from sedition, though it were composed of sundry Nations, no less different in Manners, Religion, and almost in Nature, than they were in languages: and well might he so do, having not only pronounced, That which of his men soever fought bravely with an enemy, was thereby a Carthaginian; but solemnly protested and swore, (besides other rewards) to make as many of them as should deserve and seek it, free Citizens of Carthage. The running away into Gaul, was a senseless device. Hannibal being there with his whole Army, took so little pleasure in the Country and People, that he made all haste to get him out of it. And what should he now do there with his horse? or could he be trusted, either there, or elsewhere? yea, how could he desire to live, having betrayed all his Army, and relinquished his miserable foot to the butchery of their enemies? This tale therefore Phitarch omitteth, who in writing the life of Hannibal, takes in a manner all his directions from Livie. But of this and the like it is enough to say, That all Historians love to extoll their own Country-men; and where a loss cannot be dissembled, nor the honour of the victory taken from the enemy, and given unto blind Fortune, there to lay all the blame on some strange mis-government of their own forces: as if they might easily have won all, but lost all through such folly, as no Enemy can hope to find in them another time.

Now let us return back to the two Armies, where they lye incamped on the River Ausidus. Varro was perswaded, that it concerned him in honour to make good his word unto the people of Rome: and since he had thus long waited in vain to get the consent of Paulus, now at length to use his own authority; and, without any more disputing of the matter, to fight when his own day came. When therefore it was his turn to command; at the first break of the day he began to pass the River, without staying to bid his Colleague good morrow. But Paulus came to him, and sought, as in former times, to have dissuaded him from putting the estate of his Country to a needless hazard. Against those words and substantial arguments, Terentius could alledge none other than point of Honour. Hannibal had presented them battel at their Trenches: should they endure this Bravado? He had sent his Numidians over the River but even the day before, who fell upon the Romans: that were fetching water to the lesser Camp; and drave them shamefully to run within their defences, which also they made offer to assail: Must this also be suffered? He would not endure it: for it could not but weaken the spirit of the Roman Souldier; which as yet was lively, and full of such courage, as promised assured victory. When Emilius perceived that he could not hinder the obstinate resolution of his Companion, he took all care, that what he saw must be done, might be done well. Ten thousand Roman foot he caused to be left behind, in the greater Camp opposite unto the Carthaginian, to the intent, that either Hannibal might be compelled to leave behind him some answerable number, for defence of his Trenches (which out of his paucity he was less able to spare from the battel, than were the Romans) or that these ten thousand, falling upon the Carthaginian Camp, when the fight began, and taking it with all the wealth therein, might thereby (as commonly do such accidents) terrifie and distract the enemies in the heat of fight. This done, the two Consuls went over the water with their Army to the lesser Camp, whence also they drew forth their men, and ranged them in order of battel: the ground on the East part of the River, seeming perhaps more fit for marshalling of their Army. Hannibal was glad of this, as he had great cause, and without any delay, passed likewise over, somewhat higher up the stream, which ran from the South, leaving in his own Camp so many, as he thought would serve to defend it, and no more. To encourage his men; he bade them look about them, and view the ground well, upon which they were to fight. They did so. And could you (said he) pray for any greater fortune, than to joyn battel with the Romans upon such a level ground, where the stronger in horse are sure to prevail? They all assented to him; and shewed by their countenances, that they were very glad of it. Well then (said he further) ye are first of all to thank the gods, that have brought them hither; and then Us, that have trained them along, and drawn them into necessity of playing for their lives, where they are sure to lose them. As for these Romans, I was fain to encourage you against them; when ye met them first: but now ye may even encourage your selves, by calling to mind that they are the men, whom ye have as often beaten as seen. Of one thing only I will put you in mind: That whereas hitherto you fought for other respects, as, to drive them before you out of Gaul; and to win the open Country, and fields of Italy; both of which ye have obtained: now are ye to fight for the Towns themselves, and all the riches within them; which this victory shall make yours. Therefore play the stout Souldiers: and ere many hours pass, ye shall be Lords of all that the Romans hold.

When he had said this; his Brother Mago came to him, whom he had sent to view the countenance of the enemy. Hannibal asked him, what news; and what work they were likely to have with these Romans? Work enough (answered Mago) for they are an horrible many. As horrible a many as they are (thus Hannibal replied) I tell thee, Brother, that among them all, I search them never so diligently, thou shalt not find one man, whose name is Mago. With that he fell a laughing, and so did all that stood about him; which gladdened the Soldiers, who thought their General would not be so merry, without great assurance. Whether it were so, that Hannibal, in the pride of his victories already gotten, valued one Mago above many thousand Romans; or whether he imagined, that the Romans were no less troubled with thinking upon Mago and his Companions, than was Mago with beholding their huge multitude; or whether he meant only to correct the sad mood of his Brother with a jest, and shew himself merry unto the Soldiers: this his answer was more manly, than was the relation of his discoverer. But if Hannibal himself had been sent forth by Mago, to view the Romans, he could not have returned with a more gallant report in his mouth, than that which Captain Gam, before the battel of Agincourt, made unto our King Henry the fifth: saying, That of the Frenchmen, there were enow to be killed; enow to be taken prisoners; and enow to run away. Even such words as these, or such pleasant jests as this of Hannibal, are not without their moment; but serve many times, when battel is in hand, to work up such passions, as must govern more of the business; especially, where other needful care is not wanting; without which they are but vain boasts.

In this great day, the Carthaginian excelled himself, expressing no less perfection of his military skill, than was greatness in his spirit and undertakings. For to omit the commodiousness of the place, into which he had long before conceived the means to draw his enemies to battle; he marshalled his Army in such convenient order, that all hands were brought to fight, where every one might do his best service. His Darters, and Slingers of the Balcanes, he sent off before him, to encounter with the Roman Volites. These were loose troops, answerable in a manner to those, which we call now by a French name, Enfans Perdus; but when we use our own terms, the forlorn-hope. The gross of his Army following them, he ordered thus. His Africans, armed after the Roman manner, with the spoils which they had gotten at Trebia, Thrymenez, or elsewhere; and well trained in the use of those weapons that were of more advantage, than those wherewith they had formerly served; made the two wings very deep in file. Between these he ranged his Gauls, and Spa- stance) had all the enemies foot been cast into this one great body, that was in a manner dissolved. But whilst the Legions, following their supposed victory, rushed on upon those that stood before them, and thereby unwittingly engaged themselves deeply within the principal strength of the Enemies, hedging them in on both hands; the two African Battalions on either side advanced so far, that getting beyond the Rear of them, they enclosed them, in a manner, behind: and forward they could not pass far, without removing Hannibal and Mago; which made that way the least easie. Hereby it is apparent, That the great Crescent, before spoken of, was of such extent, as covered the Africans, who lay behind it undiscerned, until now. For it is agreed, that the Romans were thus empaled unawares; and that they behaved themselves, as men that thought upon no other work, than what was found them by the Gauls. Neither is it credible, that they would have been so mad, as to run head-long, with the whole bulk of their Army, into the throat of slaughter; had they seen those weapons bent against them at the first, which when they did see, they had little hope to escape. Much might be imputed to their heat of fight, and rashness of inferior Captains: but since the Consul Paulus, a man so expert in war, being vanquished in horse, had put himself among the Legions; it cannot be supposed, that he and they did wilfully thus engage themselves. Asdrubal, having broken the troops of Roman horse, that were led by the Consul Paulus, followed upon them along the River side, beating down and killing, as many as he could, (which were almost all of them) without regard of taking prisoners. The Consul himself was either driven upon his own Legions, or willingly did cast himself among them; as hoping by them to make good the day, notwithstanding the defeat of his horse. But he failed of his expectation. Nevertheless he cheered up his men as well as he could, both with comfortable words, and with the example of his own stout behaviour: bearing down and killing many of the enemies with his own hand. The like did Hannibal among his Carthaginians, in the same part of the battle; and with better success. For the Consul received a blow from a sling, that did him great hurt: and though a troop of Roman Gentlemen, riding about him, did their best to save him from further harm; yet was he so hardly laid at, that he was compelled, by wounds and weakness, to forsake his horse. Hereupon all his company alighted, thinking that the Consul had given order so to do: as in many battles, the Roman men at arms had left their horses, to help their foot in distress. When Hannibal (for he was near at hand) perceived this, and understood that the Consul had willed his horse-men to dismount; He was very glad of it, and pleasantly said, I had rather he would have delivered them unto me, bound hand and foot: meaning that he had them now almost as safe, as if they were so bound. All this while C. Surrentine Varro, with the horse of his associates, in the left wing, was marvelously troubled by Hanno (or Maharbal) and the Numidians: who beating up and down about that great sandy Plain, raised a foul dust; which a strong South wind, blowing there accustomedly, drove into the eyes and mouths of the Romans. These, using their advantage both of number and of lightness, wearied the Consul and his followers exceedingly: neither giving, nor sustaining any charge, but continually making offers, and wheeling about. Yet at the first they seemed to promise him an happy day of it. For when the battails were even ready to joyn; five hundred of these Numidians came pricking away from their fellows, with their shields cast behind their backs, (as was the manner of those which yielded) and throwing down their arms, rendered themselves. This was good luck to begin withal, if there had been good meaning. Varro had not leisure to examine them; but caused them, unweaponed as they were, to get them behind the Army, where he bade them rest quietly till all was done. These crafty adventurers did as he bade them, for a while; till they found opportunity to put in execution the purpose, for which they had thus yielded. Under their jackets they had short swords and poniards; besides which, they found other scattered weapons about the field of such as were slain, and therewithal slew upon the hindmost of the Romans, whilst all eyes and thoughts were bent another way: so that they did great mischief, and raised yet a greater terror. Thus Hannibal, in a plain level ground, found means to lay an ambush at the back of his enemies. The last blow, that ended all fight and resistance, was given by the same hand which gave the first. Asdrubal (having in short space broken the Roman troops of horse, and cut in pieces all, save the Company of Emilius that rushed into the gross of his foot, and a very few besides, that recovered some narrow passage, between the River and their own Battalions) did not stay to charge upon the face of the Legions, but fell back back, behind the Rear of his own, and fetching about, came up to the Numidians: with whom he joyned, and gave upon Terentius.

This fearful Cloud, as it shewed at the first appearance what weather it had left behind it, on the other side: so did it prognosticate a dismal storm unto those upon whom it was ready now to fall. Wherefore Terentius his followers, having wearied themselves much in doing little, and seeing more work toward, than they could hope to sustain; thought it the best way, to avoid the danger by present flight. The Consul was no less wise than they, in apprehending the greatness of his own peril; nor more desperate, in striving to work impossibilities: it being impossible, when so many shrank from him, to sustain the impression alone, which he could not have endured with their assistance. Now he found that it was one thing to talk of Hannibal at Rome; and another, to encounter him. But of this, or of ought else, excepting hasty flight, his present leisure would not serve him to consider. Close at the heels of him and his flying troops, followed the light Numidians, appointed by Asdrubal unto the pursuit, as fittest for that service. Asdrubal himself, with the Gauls and Spanish horse, compassing about, fell upon the backs of the Romans; that were ere this hardly distressed, and in a manner surrounded on all parts else: He brake them easily; who before made ill resistance, being inclosed, and laid at on every side, not knowing which way to turn. Here began a pitiful slaughter: the vanquished multitude thronging up and down, they knew not whither or which way, whilst every one fought to avoid those enemies, whom he saw nearest. Some of the Roman Gentlemen that were about Emilius, got up to horse, and saved themselves: which though it is hardly understood how they could do; yet I will rather believe it, than suppose, that Livie so reporteth, to grace thereby his History with this following tale. Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, galloping along by a place where he saw the Consul sitting all bloodied upon a stone, intreated him to rise and save himself, offering him his assistance and horse. But Paulus refused it; willing Lentulus to shift for himself, and not to lose time: saying, That it was not his purpose to be brought again into judgement by the People, either as an accuser of his Colleague, or as guilty himself of that dayes loss. Further, he willed Lentulus to commend him to the Senate, and in particular to Fabius: willing them to fortifie Rome, as fast as well they could; and telling Fabius, that he lived and died mindful of his whole some counsel. These words (peradventure) or some to like purpose, the Consul uttered to Lentulus, either when against his will he was drawn to that battel, or when he beheld the first defeat of his horse; at what time he put himself in the head of his Legions. For I doubt not, but Hannibal knew what he said a good while before this; when he thought the Consul and his troupe, in little better case than if they had been bound. The whole Oro's of the Romans, was inclosed indeed as within a sack; whereof the African Battalions made the sides; the Spaniards, Gauls, and Hannibal with his Carthaginians, the bottom; and Asdrubal with his horse, closed up the mouth: in which part, they first of all were thrust together, and began the Rout, wherein all the rest followed. Emilius therefore, who could not sit his horse, whilst the battel yet lasted, and whilst the spaces were somewhat open, by which he might have withdrawn himself; was now (had he never so well been mounted) unable to fly, having in his way so close a throng of his own miserable followers, and so many heaps of bodies, as fell apace in that great Carnage. It sufficeth unto his honour, That in the Battel he ought no less valiantly, than he had warily before, both abstained himself, and diswaded his fellow-Consul, from fighting at all. It, when the day was utterly lost, it had lien in his power to save his own life unto the good of his Country, never more needing it; I should think, that he either too much disesteemed himself; or being too faintly minded, was weary of the World, and his unthankfull Citizens: But if such a resolution were praise-worthy in Emilius, as proceeding out of Roman valour; then was the English virtue of the Lord John Talbot, Viscount Lisle, son to that famous Earl of Shrewsbury, who died in the Battel of Chastillon, more highly to be honoured. For Anselmus was old, grievously, if not mortally wounded, and accomprable for the overthrow received: Talbot was in the flower of his youth, unhurt, easily able to have escaped, and not answerable for that dayes misfortune, when he refused to forsake his Father; who foreseeing the loss of the battel, and not meaning to stain his actions past by lying in his old age, exhorted this his noble son to be gone and leave him.

In this terrible overthrow died all the Roman foot, save two or three thousand, who (as Livie saith) escaped into the lesser Camp; whence the same night, about six hundred of them brake forth, and joyning with such of those in the greater Camp, as were willing to try their fortune, conveyed themselves away ere morning, about four thousand foot, and two hundred horse, partly in whole troops, partly dispersed into Cannusium: the next day the Roman Camps, both less and greater, were yielded unto Hannibal by those that remained in them. Polybius hath no mention of this escape; only he reports, that the ten thousand, whom Emilius had left on the West side of Aufidus (as was shewed before) to set upon the Camp of Hannibal, did as they were appointed; but ere they could effect their desire, which they had well-near done, the battel was lost: and Hannibal, coming over the water to them, drave them into their own Camp; which they quickly yielded, having lost two thousand of their number. Like enough it is, that at the first fight of Hannibal, coming upon them with his victorious Army, a greater number of these did flye, and thereby escaped, whilst their fellows, making defence in vain, retired into their Camp, and held the enemy busied. For about two Legions they were (perhaps not half full, but made up by addition of others, whose fault or fortune was like) that having served at Cannæ, were afterwards extremely disgraced by the State of Rome, for that they had abandoned their companions fighting. Of the Roman horse what numbers escaped, it is uncertain: but very few they were that saved themselves in the first charge, by getting behind the River; and Terentius the Consul recovered Venusia, with three score and ten at the most in his company. That he was so ill attended, it is no marvel: for Venusia lay many miles off to the Southward; so that his nearest way thither, had been thorow the midst of Hannibal's Army, if the passage had been open. Therefore it must needs be, that when once he got out of sight, he turned up some by-way; so disappointing the Numidians that hunted him. Of such as could not hold pace with the Consul, but took other wayes, and were scattered over the fields; two thousand, or thereabout, were gathered up by the Numidians, and made prisoners: the rest were slain, all save three hundred, who dispersed themselves in flight, as chance led them, and got into sundry Towns. There died in this great Battel of Cannæ, besides L. Emilius Paulus the Consul, two of the Roman Quæstors or Treasurers, and one and twenty Colonels or Tribunes of the Soldiers, four score Senators, or such as had borne office, out of which they were to be chosen into the Senate. Many of these were of special mark, as having been Ædiles, Prætors or Consuls: among whom was Cn. Servilius, the last years Consul, and Mimnius; late Master of the horse. The number of prisoners, taken in this battel, Livie makes no greater than three thousand foot, and three hundred horse: too few to have defended for the space of one half hour, both the Roman Camps, which yet the same Livie saith, to have been over-cowardly yielded up. We may therefore do better, to give credit unto one of the prisoners, whom the same Historian shortly after introduceth, speaking in the Senate, and saying, That they were no less than eight thousand. It may therefore be, that these three thousand were only such as the Enemy spared, when the fury of Execution was past: but to these must be added about five thousand more, who yielded in the greater Camp, when their company were either slain or fled. So the reckoning falls out right: which the Romans, especially the Consul Varro, had before cast up (as we say) without their Host; nothing so chargeable, as now they find it. On the side of Hannibal there died some four thousand Gauls, sixteen hundred Spaniards and Africans; and two hundred Horse, or thereabouts: a loss not sensible, in the joy of so great a victory; which if he had pursued, as Maharbal advised him, and forthwith marched away towards Rome; it is little doubted, but that the war had presently been at an end. But he believed not so far in his own prosperity; and was therefore told, That he knew how to get, not how to use a victory.

§. I X.

Of things following the Battel of Cannæ.

NOT without good cause doth Polybius reprehend those two Historians, Fabius the Roman, and Philinus the Carthaginian; who, regarding more the pleasure of them unto whose honour they consecrated their travels, than the truth of things, and information of posterity, magnified indifferently, whether good or bad, all actions and proceedings, the one of his Carthaginians, the other of his Roman Quirites, and Fathers conscript. No man of sound judgement will condemn this liberty of censure, which Polybius hath used. For, to recompence his juniority (such as it was) he produceth substantial arguments, to justifie his own Relation; and confuteth the vanity of those former Authors, out of their own writings, by conference of places ill cohering: which pains is to be suspected, that he would not have taken, had he been born in either either of these two Cities, but have spared some part of his diligence, and been contented to have all men think better and more honourably than he deserved, of his own Country. The like disease it is to be feared, that we shall hereafter find in others; and shall have some cause to wish, that either they were somewhat less Roman, or else, that some works of their opposite Writers were extant; that so we might at least hear both to speak: being henceforth destitute of Polybius his help, that was a man indifferent. But since this cannot be, we must be sometimes bold, to observe the coherence of things; and believe so much only to be true, as dependeth upon good reason, or (at least) fair probability. This attentive circumspection is needful at the present: such is the repugnancy, or forgetfulness, which we find in the best narration of things following the Battel of Cannæ. For it is said, that four thousand foot and horse gathered together about the Consul Terentius at Venusia; that others to the number of ten thousand got into Cannusum, chusing for their Captains, young P. Scipio, and Ap. Claudius; yet that the Consul Terentius Varro, joyning his company unto those of Scipio at Cannusum, wrote unto the Senate, that he had now well near ten thousand men about him; that these letters of the Consul were brought to Rome, when the Senate was newly risen, that had been taking order for pacifying those tumults in the City, which grew upon the first bruit of the overthrow; and yet, that Embassadors from Capua (after some consultation, whether it were meet to send any, or without further circumstance, to side with Hannibal) were sent unto Terentius, and found him at Venusia, a pretty while before he wrote those letters, which overtook (in a manner) at Rome the first news of the overthrow. Among such incoherences, I hold it the best way, to omit so much as hath not some particular connexion with matter ensuing: mutual dependency in things of this nature, being no small argument of truth.

When Hannibal had sacked the Roman Camp, and trussed up the spoils, forthwith belodged, and marched away into Samnium; finding a disposition in the Hirpines, and many other people thereabout, to forsake the Roman party, and make alliance with Carthage. The first Town that opened the gates unto him, was Cossa, where he laid up his baggage: and leaving his Brother Mago to take in other places, he halted into Campania. The general affection of the multitude, in all the Cities of Italy, was inclinable unto him; not only in regard of their grievous losses sustained abroad in the fields, which the Romans themselves, who could not hinder him from spoiling the Country, especially the poorer sort of them, did hardly endure; but in a loving respect unto that great courtesie (as it seemed) which he used unto such of them as became his prisoners. For as at other times, so now after this great victory at Cannæ, he had lovingly dismissed as many of the Italian Confederates of Rome, as fell into his hands; rebuking them gently for being so obstinate against him that had sought to deliver them from bondage. Neither spared he to win their love by gifts, pretending to admire their valour; but seeking indeed, by all ways and means, to make them his, whilst all other motives were concurrent. At this time also he began to deal kindly (though against his nature) with the Roman prisoners; telling them that he bore no mortal hatred unto their Estate; but being provoked by injuries, fought to right himself and his Country; and fought with them, to try which of these two Cities, Rome or Carthage should bear sovereign Rule, not which of them should be destroyed. So he gave them leave to chuse ten of their number, that should be sent home to treat with the Fathers about their ransom: and together with these he sent Carthalo a Nobleman of Carthage, and General of his Horse, to feel the disposition of the Senate, whether it were bowed as yet by so much adversity, and could stoop unto desire of peace. But with the Romans these Arts prevailed not, as shall be shewed in due place. The people of Italy, all, or most of them, save the Roman Colonies, or the Latines, were not only weary of their losses past, but entertained a deceivable hope, of changing their old Society for a better. Wherefore not only the Samnites, Lucans, Bruttians, and Apulians, ancient enemies of Rome, and not till the former Generation utterly subdued, began to re-assume their wonted spirits: but the Campanians, a Nation of all in Italy most bound unto the State of Rome, and by many mutual affinities therewith as straightly conjoined, as were any save the Latines, changed on a sudden their love into hatred, without any other cause found, than change of fortune.

Campania is the most goodly and fruitful Province of Italy, if not (as some then thought) of all the Earth: and the City of Capua, answerable unto the Country, whereof it was Head; so great, fair, and wealthy, that it seemed no less convenient a seat of the Empire, than was either Rome or Carthage.

But of all qualities, Bravery is the least requisite unto sovereign command. The Campanians were Luxurious, idle, and proud: and valuing themselves like Jays by their feathers, despised the unfortunate virtue of the Romans their Patrons and Benefactors. Yet were there some of the principal among them, as in other Cities, that bore especial regard unto the Majesty of Rome; and could not indure to hear of Innovation. But the Plebeian faction had lately so prevailed within Capua, that all was governed by the pleasure of the Multitude; which wholly followed the direction of Pacuvius Calavius an ambitious Noble-man, whose credit grew, and was up-held by furthering all popular desires; whereof, the conjunction with Hannibal was not the least. Some of the Campanians had offered their City to the Carthaginians shortly after the battle of Thraymene: whereupon chiefly it was, that Hannibal made his journey into Campania: the Dictator Fabius waiting upon him. At that time, either the nearness of the Roman Army, or some other fear of the Campanians; hindered from breaking into actual rebellion. They had indeed no leisure to treat about any article of new Confederacy: or, had leisure served; yet were the multitude (whose inconstant love Hannibal had won from the Romans, by gentle usage, and free dismissing of some prisoners in good account among them) unable to hold any such negotiation, without advice of the Senate, which mainly impugned it. So they that had promised to yield up their Town to Hannibal, and meet him on the way, with some of their Nobility that should assure him of all faithful meaning, were driven to sit still in a great perplexity: as having failed to let in this their new friend, yet sufficiently discovered themselves to draw upon them the hatred of the Romans. In this case were no small number of the Citizens; who thereupon grew the more incensed against their Senate, on whom they cast all the blame, easily pardoning their own cowardize. The people holding to tender a regard of liberty, that even the lawful government of Magistrates grieved them, with an imaginary oppression; had now good cause to fear lest the Senators would become the Lords indeed, and by help of the Romans bring them under a more straight subjection, than ever they had endured. This fear being ready to break in to some outrage, Pacuvius made use of, to serve his own ambition. He discoursed unto the Senate, as they sat in Council, about those motions troubling the City: and said, That he himself had both married a Roman

Lady, and given his Daughter in marriage to a Roman: but that the danger of forsaking a Roman party was not now the greatest: for that the people were violently bent to murder all the Senate; and after to join themselves with Hannibal, who should countenance the fact, and save them harmless. This he spake, as a man well known to be beloved himself by the people, and privy unto their designs. Having thoroughly terrified the Senate, by laying open the danger hanging over them: He promised nevertheless to deliver them all, and to let things in quiet, if they would freely put themselves into his hands; offering his oath, or any other assurance that they should demand for his faithful meaning. They all agreed. Then shutting up the Court, and placing a guard of his own followers about it, that none might enter, nor issue forth, without his leave; he called the people to assembly: and speaking in much ill of the Senate, as he knew they would be glad to hear, he told them, that these wicked Governours were surprised by his policy, and all fast, ready to abide what sentence they would lay upon them. Only thus much he advised them, as a thing which necessity required. That they should chuse a new Senate, before they fastified their anger upon the old. So rehearsing unto them the names of one or two Senators; he asked what their judgement was of those. All cried out, That they were worthy of death. Chuse then (said he) first of all some new ones into their places: Hereat the multitude, unprovided for such an election, was silent, until at last some one or other adventured to name whom he thought fit. The men so nominated, were utterly disliked by the whole Assembly; either for some known fault, baseness and insufficiency; or else even because they were unknown, and therefore held unworthy. This difficulty in the new Election appearing more and more, whilst more were to be chosen; (the fittest man to be substituted; having been named among the first, and not thought fit enough) Pacuvius intreated, and easily prevailed with the people, that the present Senate might for this time be spared; in hope of amends hereafter; which (doubtless) they would make, having thus obtained pardon of all offences past. Henceforth, not only the people, as in former times, honoured Pacuvius, and esteemed him their Patron; but the Senators also were governed by him, to whom they acknowledged themselves indebted, for saving all their lives. Neither did the Senate fail after this by all obsequiousness, to court the people, giving the the reigns unto their lawless Will, who else were likely to cast them down. All the City being thus of one mind; only fear of the Romans kept them from opening their gates to Hannibal. But after the Battle at Cannæ, this impediment was removed; and few there were that would open their mouths to speak against the rebellion. Yet forasmuch as three hundred principal Gentlemen of the Campanians, did then serve the Romans in the Isle of Sicily; the Parents and Kinsmen of these prevailed (so far, that Embassadors were sent unto Tarentum the Consul, to see his present case, and what it could minister of Hope or Fear. These, wheresoever they found him, found him weakly attended, and as weak in spirit, as in followers. Yet they offered him formally the service of their States; and desired to know what he would command them. But he most basely lamented unto them the greatness of the Roman misfortune: saying, That all was lost; and that the Campanians must now not help the Romans, who had nothing left wherewith to help themselves, but make war in their defence against the Carthaginians; as the Romans had sometimes done for the Campanians against the Samnites. Hereunto he is said to have added a foolish love-dive, against Hannibal and his Carthaginians; telling, how he had taught them, to make bridges of slaughtered carcases, and to feed upon mans flesh, with such other stuff, as only bewrayed his own fear. As for the Campanians themselves, he put them in mind of their present strength: they having thirty thousand foot, and four thousand horse; with money, and all provisions, in abundance. Thus he dismissed them, proud as they came, and filled them with conceit of getting a great Lordship; whereas, before they were some wretched miserable in: adventuring to seek their own liberty. Having reported this at Capua, the same Embassadors were dispatched away to Hannibal, with whom they easily made alliance, upon these conditions, that the Campanians should be absolutely free, and ruled by their own Laws; That no Citizens of theirs should be subjected unto any Carthaginian Magistrate, in what cause, wherewith in War or Peace; and that Hannibal should deliver unto the Campanians three hundred Roman prisoners, such as themselves would chuse; whom they might exchange for their Gentlemen which were in Sicily.

Against all this Negotiation, Decius Maginus, an honourable Citizen, opposed himself earnestly; using, in vain, many persuasions, to the wilful and head-strong Multitude; whom he put in mind of Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, willing them not to change old friends for new acquaintance. This did he, when they were sending Embassadors unto Hannibal; and this also did he, when the new alliance was concluded; but most earnestly, when a Carthaginian Garrison was entering the Town: at which time he gave advice, either to keep it out, or to fall upon it, and to cut it in pieces, that by such a notable piece of service, they might make amends unto the Romans, whom they had forsaken.

Advertisement hereof was given to Hannibal: who lying about Naples not far off, sent for Maginus to come speak with him in the Camp. This Maginus refused: alleging, that he was, by the late concluded Articles, free from subjection unto any Carthaginian; and therefore would not come. Hannibal thereupon halted himself towards Capua; forbearing to attempt any further upon Naples, which he thought to have taken in his way by Scalado, but found the walls too high, and was not well provided to lay siege unto it. At Capua he was entertained with great solemnity and pomp: all the people issuing forth of the Town, to behold the great Commander, which had won so many noble victories. Having taken his pleasure in the sight of that goodly City, and passed over his first entertainments, he came into their Senate, where he commended their resolution; in shaking off the Roman yoke; promising, that ere long all Italy and Rome itself, should be driven to acknowledge Capua as chief, and receive Law from thence. As for Decius Maginus, who openly took part with the Romans their enemies; he prayed them, that they would not use him as a Campanian, but a Traitor to the State, and use him accordingly, giving sentence out of hand upon him, as he deserved. This was granted: and Maginus delivered unto Hannibal; who unwilling to offend the Campanians; at his first coming, by putting to death a man to death, yet fearing that they might sue for his liberty, if he kept him alive, thought it best to send him away to Carthage. Thus Hannibal settled his friendship with the Campanians: among whom, only this Decius Maginus had openly dared to speak against him; being assisted by Perolla the Son of Pacuvius. This Perolla would have murdered Hannibal; whilst he was at supper, the first night of his coming, had not his Fathers authority kept him from attempting any such attempt. All the Town (besides) were so earnest in the love of their new Society, that they are said to have murdered all the Romans, upon whom at the present present they could lay hand ; or (which is all one) to have smothered them to death in an hot Bath . . .

The same course of fortune , with those of Capua , ran some other Towns thereabouts which dependeth on this , as their Mother-City . Nola , Nuceria , Naples , Castine , and Acerre , were the Cities next adjoining , that stood out for the Romans . Against these Hannibal went , thinking to find them weakly manned ; as they were indeed , though stoutly defended .

The Romans at this time were not in case , to put Garrisons into all their walled Towns ; but were fain to leave all places , except a few of the most suspected , unto the faith and courage of the inhabitants . Rome it self was in extremest fear of Hannibal coming , at the first report of the overthrow at Cannæ : and the grief of that loss was so general , and immoderate , that it much disturbed the provision against apparent danger . It was hard to judge , whether the loss already received , or the fear of destruction presently threatening , were the more terrible . All the Senators found work enough , to stint the noise and lamentable bewailings , whereof the streets were full . Couriers were sent forth , to bring assured tidings how all went : whereof when Letters from the Consul Varro had thoroughly informed them , they were so amazed , that they ran into barbarous superstition ; and taking direction (as was said) from their fatal books , buried alive two men and women , Gauls and Greeks , in their Ox-market . If the books of Sibyl gave them such instructions , we may justly think that Sibyl her self was instructed by the Devil . Yet it is not improbable , that extremity of fear caused them to hearken to wicked South-sayers ; whose detestable counsels they afterwards for their own honour (as ashamed of such Authors) imputed to the books of Sibyl . An Embassador was sent to Delphi , to consult with the oracle of Apollo ; and enquire with what prayers and supplications they might pacifie the gods , and obtain an end of these calamities . This is enough to discover the greatness of their fear ; though not serving to give remedy . At that time came Letters out of Sicily , from the Prætor of Ozælius ; whom the Senate had appointed , if he found it meet , to pass over into Africa . In these were contained news of one Carthaginian fleet that waited the kingdom of Hieron their good friend and confederate ; and of another fleet , riding among the Isles Ægeæ , which was in readiness to sit upon Lilybæum , and the rest of the Roman Province , if the Prætor stirred aside to the rescue of Hieron .

In the midst of these extremities , it was thought needful to call home Terentius the Consul , that he might name a Dictator , to take sovereign charge of the Weal-publick , with absolute power , as necessity required : It must needs seem strange , that all sorts of people went forth to meet the Consul , and bid him welcome home , giving him thanks for that he had not despaired of the Weal-publick . But this was done (as may seem) by order from the Senate : which therein (doubtless) provided wisely for upholding the general reputation . If this coming into the City had renewed the lamentations and outcries of the people : what else would have followed , than a contempt of their wretchedness , among those that were subject unto their Dominion ? Now in finding this occasion (though indeed he gave it not) of bestowing upon him their welcome , and thanks ; they noised abroad a fame , which came perhaps unto the ears of Hannibal , of their Magnanimity and Confidence : that might seem grounded on their remaining strength . This therefore was wisely done . But whereas Livie would have us think , that it was done generously , and out of great spirits let me be pardoned , if I believe him not . It was done fearfully , and to cover their grief : had they dared to shew their indignation , they would have struck off his head ; as in few years after , Cn. Fulvius had his life brought into question , and was banished by them , being less blame-worthy , for a smaller offence . M. Junius , by appointment of the Senate , was nominated Dictator ; and T. Strepitius , Master of the horse . These fell presently to mustering of Soldiers , of whom they raised four new Legions , and one thousand horse : though with much difficulty , as being fain to take up some that were very boys . These four Legions are elsewhere forgotten in account of the forces levied by this Dictator ; and two Legions only set down , that had been enrolled in the beginning of the year for the custody of the City . So it may be , that these two Legions being drawn into the field ; four new ones of Prætextati , or striplings were left in their places . In such raw Souldiers , and so few , little confidence was to be reposed ; for which reason they increased their number , by adding unto them eight thousand sturdy slaves , that were put in hope of liberty , if they should deserve it by manfull service . This not sufficing , the Dictator proclaimed , that whosoever ought money and could not pay it , or had committed any capital offence , should forthwith be discharged of his debt or punishment , if he would serve in the War . To arm these Companies , they were fain to take down out of their Temples and Porches , the spoils of their enemies that had been there set up : among which , were 6000 . Armour of the Gauls , that had been carried in the Triumph of C. Flaminius , a little before the beginning of this War . To such mockery had God brought the pride of the Romans , as a duereward of their insolent oppressions , that they were fain to issue forth of their own gates , in the habit of strangers , when Hannibal was ready to encounter them with his African , armed Roman-like .

About the same time it was that Carthalo with the Agents of the prisoners taken at Cannæ , came to Rome . Carthalo was not admitted into the City , but commanded , whilst he was on the way , to be gone ere night out of the Roman Territory . To the messengers of the captives audience was given by the Senate . They made earnest Petition to be ranfomed at the publick charge ; not only the tears and lamentation of their poor kinsfolk but the great need , wherein the City then stood , of able Souldiers , commending their suit ; which yet they obtained not . Besides the general custom of the Romans (held by long Tradition , and strengthened by a notable Precedent , when Regulus was overthrown , and taken prisoner in the former War) not to be too tender of such as had yielded to the enemy , much was alladged against those who now craved ranfome : but the special point was , that they were wilfully lost , since they might have saved themselves , as others did . It sufficed not unto these poor men , to say , that their offence was no greater than the Consuls ; they were told , that this was great presumption . The truth was , the State wanted money ; and therefore could not want excuses ; whereby to avoid the disbursement : whether it were so , or not , that any such Plea was held about this matter of redemption , as we find recorded . Neither must we regard it , that the slaves which were armed for the war , are said to have cost more , than the sum did amount unto , that would have ranfomed these prisoners . For this is but a tale , devised to countenance the Roman proceedings , as if they had been severe ; when as indeed they were suitable to the present fortune , poor and somewhat beggarly . Hereof it is no little proof , that Hannibal valued those Roman slaves , whom he had taken in the Camp among their Masters , at no more , than every one the third part of a common Souldiers ranfome : and likely it is , that he offered them at the price , whereat he thought them current . But if we should suppose , that by trading with Hannibal , a better bargain for slaves might have been made , than was by the State at home , in dealing with private men ; yet must we withall consider , that these private men did only lend these slaves for a while unto the Common-wealth , and were afterwards contented to forbear the price of them (when by order of the Senate they were enfranchised) untill the war should be ended . If Hannibal would have given such long day of payment , it is likely that the Romans would have been his Chapmen : but , seeing he dealt only for ready money , they chose rather to lay , We will not give , than We cannot . The like austerly , upon the same reason , but contrary pretence , was used toward the Souldiers that escaped from that great battel . These were charged for having fled : as the prisoners were , for not flying , when they might have done so . True it is , that in such cases (if ever) that which they call Ragione del Stato , may serve for an excuse : when the Common-wealth , being driven to a miserable exigent , is fain to help it self , by doing injuries to private men . And so dealt the Romans now : condemning all those that had served at Cannæ , to be transported into Sicily ; and there to serve , not as others did , untill they had fulfilled twenty years in the Wars , or else were fifty years of age , but untill this War should be ended , how long soever it lasted , and that without reward . The same thrifty censure was afterwards laid upon others , for their misbehaviour : but never upon any man of quality , save only (a good while after this , at better leisure) upon Cecilius Metellus , and a few other hard-brained fools his companions ; who , being frightened out of their wits , with the terror of so great a loss , were devising , after the battel , which way to run out of Italy , when Hannibal as yet had scarce one Town within it . The inequality of this rigour grew shortly distasteful to the Commonalty : and was openly blamed by a Tribune of the people ; nevertheless it was quietly digested , the excuse being no less apparent than the fault .

M. Junius the Dictator , having dispatched all needfull business within the City , took the field with five and twenty thousand men . What he did with this Army , I cannot find : nor more of him than this , That he spent the time about Campania ; where (as may be presumed) he was not idle. To him therefore perhaps it may be ascribed, that Hannibal did no greater evil: for of any evil done to Hannibal, by the Romans, in this their weak estate, only Marcellus had the honour. Marcellus, being then one of the Prætors, lay at Ofiss, with a Fleet ready to set sail for Sicily, having one Legion aboard his ships; and fifteen hundred other Souldiers newly taken up; with which forces he was to defend that Island, and do what harm he could in Africa. But hearing of the overthrow at Cannæ, he sent these of his new Levy to Rome, for defence of the City; and marched hastily with his Legion toward Campidunum: delivering the Fleet, empty of Souldiers, to P. Furius his Colleague. Thence was he called by the Magistrates, and chief Citizens of Nola, to help them; who were like to be forced by the multitude affected, as were the rest of the Campanians (to let in the Carthaginians, and knew not how to avoid this otherwise, than by seeming to deliberate about the articles of this new confederacy. Wherefore he made great journeys thitherward; and arrived even time enough to prevent the Enemy. Many idle walks Hannibal made betwixt Nola and Naples: assaying by fair words and terrible threats the one and the other City. Naples was strong, and not infected with any the least touch of disloyalty: had also a sure Haven, whereby it stood in the less fear of sustaining much inconvenience, by spoil of the Lands and Villages abroad in the Countrey. But at Nola it was thought a valuable consideration, That Hannibal was Master of the field: which if he laid waste, all the poor people were utterly undone. So thought the Multitude: and such talk used some, that had little fear of their own private want or poverty, but a great desire to gratify the Carthaginian. Of these, one L. Bantius was chief; a stout young Gentleman, and Souldier of especial mark, well beloved in the City, and one that had done good service to the Romans; but was found by Hannibal half dead at Cannæ; and after much gentle usage, good attendance, and cure of his wounds, friendly dismissed with liberal gifts. He therefore thought, that it concerned him in honour, to return the greatest thanks he could unto so courteous an enemy. Marcellus perceiving this, wrought upon the same easie nature of the Gentleman: and taking notice of him, as if it had been by chance, seemed to wonder, why

one that had so well deserved of the Roman State, had not repaired unto him the Prætor, who desired nothing more than such acquaintance. So with many commendations, gifts, and loving entertainment, being himself also a man highly reputed for his personal valour, he made this Bantius so far in love with him; that no thing could be attempted within Nola, against the Romans, whereof he had not presently advertisement. At the coming of Marcellus, Hannibal removed from about Nola; and assayed, as formerly he had done, the Neapolitans: but they had lately taken in a Roman Garrison; upon confidence whereof they gave him a peremptory answer, to his discontent. Thence went he to Nuceria, which he took by composition; and so returned back again to Nola. He was not ignorant, what good affection the common people of Nola bore unto him: who although they durst not stir in his quarrel, being over-awed by the Roman Garrison; yet if they saw Marcellus hardly bestead, and forced to turn his care from watching them within, to repelling the enemies assailing him without, like enough it seemed, that they would not be wanting unto the accomplishment of their own desires. He therefore brought his Army close to the Town, and skirmished often with Marcellus: not in hope thereby to do much good, but only to make shew of a meaning to force the Town; which he sought in the mean while to take by intelligence. In the night time there passed messages between him and the Citizens his partakers: where by it was concluded, That if once Marcellus, with all his forces, could be trained into the field, the multitude within the Town should presently rise; and seizing upon the gates, exclude him as an Enemy. Of this Negotiation Marcellus was advertised: and fearing lest the Conspirators would shortly adventure, even to find him busied within the City, whilst the Carthaginians should scale the walls; he thought it the surest way, to cut off the Enemies hope, and send him away betimes. Wherefore ordering his men in three companies, within three several gates, looking towards the enemy: he gave a straight command, that all the Citizens should keep their houses. Thus he lay close a good part of the day, to the enemies great wonder, against whom he had customarily issued forth before more early, every day, to skirmish. But when it was further noted, that the walls were bare, and not a man appearing on them;

them; then thought Hannibal, that surely all was discovered, and Marcellus now busied with the Citizens. Whereupon he had his men bring ladders, and make ready for the assault: which was done in all haste. But when the Carthaginians were at the very walls, and thought nothing less, than that the Romans would meet them in the field: suddenly the middle gate was opened, wherewith Marcellus, with the best and oldest of his Souldiers, brake forth upon them, with a great noise, to make his unexpected fall the more terrible. Whilst the Carthaginians, much out of order, were some of them flying before Marcellus, the rest making head against him: the other two gates opened, wherewith in like sort issued they of the new levied Companies, upon the enemies backs. The sudden terrour was more available unto the Romans, than their force; yet the Execution was so great, that this was accounted as a victory, and reputed one of the bravest Acts performed in all that War, forasmuch as hereby it was first proved, that Hannibal might be overcome. After this, Marcellus being freed from his enemies that were departed, took a strict account of the Citizens of Nola; condemning above threescore and ten of high Treason, whose heads he struck off; and so leaving the Town in quiet obediences unto their Senate, went and incamped hard by about Suessula. Hannibal in the mean season was gone to Aceræ: where being excluded, he thought it no wisdom to lose time in persuasions, but laid siege unto it, and began on all sides to close it up. This terrified the People, who knew themselves unable to hold out. Therefore before his Works were finished, and they quite surrounded; they stole out by night, and left him the Town empty: which he sacked and burnt. Then hearing news of the Dictator, that he was about Casiline, thither went Hannibal; as being unwilling that an enemy so near should disquiet him at Capua; where he meant to Winter. It seems, or rather indeed it is plain, that the late victory of Marcellus had nothing abated the spirit of the Carthaginian: who durst with a small part of his Army seek out the Dictator, that had with him the heart of the Roman strength. Wherefore the joy of his Enemies, upon so slight an occasion as the death of some two thousand of his men, at the most, and those not slain in plain battle, but by a sudden eruption; witnesseth chiefly, in what great fear they stood of Hannibal, and how Crest-fallen they were: that having three years since demanded at Carthage the body of Hannibal, to be delivered unto their pleasure, by his own Citizens; could now please themselves, as with good news, to hear, That in a skirmish not far from Rome, he appeared to be a man, and not resistless. At Caslinum the Dictator was not: but many Companies of Italians, Confederates of Rome, were gotten into the Town, and held it. Five hundred of the Prænestines there were, and about four hundred of Perusia, with some of the Latins. All these had the good hap, to come too late to the battle at Cannæ, being sent by their several States to the Camp: whither whilst they were marching, the tidings of that great misfortune encountered them, and sent them back sorrowful; for they loved well their Lords the Romans, under whose government they lived happily. So came they all, one after another to Casiline, where they met and stayed. Neither had they stayed there long, ere they heard news from Capua. How that great City became the Ring-leader of all the Campanians into rebellion. The people of Casiline were affected as they of Capua: and therefore sought how to rid their hands of those Prænestines and their fellows; but the Souldiers were too hard for them, and after many trains laid one for another, at last they slew all the Townsmen in a night, and fortified the Western part of the Town (for it was divided by the River Vulturnus) against the Enemy. If they had run away with the goods, and pretended, that these of Casiline were as the rest of the Campanians, all Traitors; they themselves might have been reputed, as no better than the Mamertines. But their constancy in defence of the place witnesseth, upon what honest reasons they surprised it. Hannibal came thither, thinking to have encountered with greater forces: but these few found him more work than he expected. Divers assaults he gave, but was still repelled with loss: and many sallies they made, with variable event. The Enemy mined; and they countermined: opposing so much industry to his force, that he was driven to close them up, and seek to win them by famine. T. Sempronius Gracchus, that was Master of the Horse, lay with the Roman Army higher up the River: who fain would have relieved Casiline, but that the Dictator being gone to Rome about some matters of Religion, had given him an express charge not to fight till his return. Marcellus from Suessula could not come: his way being stopped by the overflowings of Vulturnus; the Nolans also beseeching him not to leave them, who were in danger of the Campanians, if he departed. Thus it is reported: but if the water

stayed his journey, such intreaties were needless. Neither is it like that the Dictator tarried at Rome so long, as till extrem famine had consumed the Garrison in Capitoli. Wherefore it may be thought, that the Town was lost; because the Romans durst not adventure to raise the siege. Barrels of Corn were sent by night, floating down the River; and when some of these, being carried awry by an Eddie of water, stuck among the Willows on the bank, whereby this manner of relief was discovered and prevented; Gracchus cast a great quantity of Nuts into the stream, which faintly sustained the poor besieged men. At length when all food was spent, and whatsoever grew green under the Walls was gathered for Sallets, the Carthaginians ploughed up the ground; wherein the besieged presently sowed Rape-seed. Hannibal seeing this, admired their patience; and said, That he meant not to stay at Capitoli until the Rapes were grown. Wherefore though hitherto he had refused to hearken unto any Composition, as intending to make them an example to all others, by punishing their obstinacy; yet now he was content, to grant them their lives at an indifferent ransom; which when they had paid, he quietly dismissed them, according to his promise: Seven hundred Carthaginians he placed in Capitoli, as a Garrison for defence of the Campanes; unto whom he restored it. To the Transalpine Souldiers great thanks were given, and loving rewards; among which they had offer, in regard of their virtue, to be made Citizens of Rome. But their present condition pleased them so well, that they chose rather to continue, as they were in Præneste: which is no weak proof, of the good estate wherein the Cities flourished, that were subject to the Roman Government. This siege of Capitoli was not a little beneficial to the Romans; as having long detained Hannibal, and consumed much of his time, that might otherwise have been better spent. For winter overtook him long before he could dispatch the business: which, how to quit with his honour he knew not, when he was once engaged. Therefore he wintered at Capua: where he refreshed his Army, or rather corrupted it, as all Historians report, and made it effeminate; though effeminate as it was, He therewithall did often beat the Romans in following times, as shall appear hereafter.

Of the great supply that was decreed at Carthage, to be sent to Hannibal into Italy. How by the malice of Hanno, and slack or parsimony of the Carthaginians, the supply was too long deferred. That the riches of the Carthaginians grew faster, than of the Romans. Of Fabius and other old Romans Historians, how partial they were in their writings.

When Mago, the son of Amilcar had spent some time about the taking in such Italians, as fell from the Romans after the battel at Canna; his brother Hannibal sent for him to Capua, and thence dispatched him away to Carthage, with the joyful message of Victory. He told the Carthaginian Senate with how many Roman Generals his brother had fought, what Consuls he had chased, wounded or slain; how the stout Romans, that in the former war never shunned any occasion of fight, were now grown so calm, that they thought their Dictator Fabius the only good Captain, because he never durst adventure to come to battel; That not without reason their spirits were thus abated, since Hannibal had slain of them above two hundred thousand, and taken above fifty thousand prisoners. He further told them of the Brutians, Apulians, Sammites, Lucans; and other people of Italy, that followed the fortune of those great victories, had revolted unto the Carthaginians. Among the rest he magnified Capua, as a goodly City, and fit to be not only (as already it was) Head of all the Capuans, but the chief seat of their Dominion in Italy; and there he informed them, how lovingly his brother had been entertained, where he meant to rest that winter attending their supply. As for the war, He said it was even at an end; if they would now pursue it closely, and not give the Romans any breathing time, wherein to re-collect themselves, and repair their broken forces. He willed them to consider, that the war far from home, in the Enemies Country: that so many battels had much diminished his brothers Army: that the Souldiers, who had so well deserved, ought to be considered with liberal rewards; and that it was not good to burden their new Italian friends, with exactions of money, corn, and other necessities; but that these things must be sent from Carthage; which the victory would requite with large amends. Finally, he caused the golden rings, taken from the fingers of the Roman Knights that were slain, to be poured out openly in the Court: which being measured, filled (as some say) three bushels; or as others would rather have it) no more than one; adding, that by this might appear the greatness of the Roman calamity, so far as as none but the principal of that order, were accustomed to wear that ornament.

* Thus Livy reports it; and credible it is, that while Rome was poor, the bravery of private men was not altogether so great, as the Law would have permitted, though otherwise Jus Annui, The wearing of the Ring, was the general privilege of the Roman Equites.

Who so considers the former Punic War, may easily find, that the State of Carthage never did receive, in all the durance thereof, any such hopeful advertisements from their Captains abroad. Wherefore it is no marvel, if the errand of Mago found extraordinary welcome. In the vehemency of this joy, Himilco, a Senator adverse to the faction of Hanno, is said to have demanded of that great perfwader unto peace with Rome, Whether he were still of opinion, that Hannibal should be yielded up unto the Romans; or whether he would forbid them to give thanks unto the gods, for this their good success. Hereunto though it be not likely that Hanno made the same formal answer, which Livius puts into his mouth, calling the Carthaginian Senators Patres Conscripti, by a term proper to the Romans; and putting them in mind of his own shameful overthrow received at the Islands Agathis: yet the sum of his speech appears to have been no less malicious than is set down, so far as as Hannibal himself, at his departure out of Italy, exclaimed against the wickedness of this Hanno; saying, that his hatred against the Barchinies, had oppressed their Family, when otherwise it could not, with the ruine of Carthage. Therefore it may well be, that he made such a jest of these victories, as is reported; saying, it ill befecemed him, who had vanquished the Romans to call for more help, as if he had been beaten; or him, that had taken their Camp, filled forthwith with spoil, to make request for meat and money. To these cavils, if answer were needfull, it might be said, That other booty than of horses and slaves, little was to be found in the Roman Camp: the best of the Souldiers carrying no other wealth into the field, than a few silver studs in the bridles and trappings of their horses. If Hannibal had taken any main convoy of money and provisions, going to supply all wants of a great Army in some other Province, (as the two Scipios are afterwards said to have done, when they wan the Camp of Asdrubal, that carried along with him all the wealth of Spain, in his journey towards Italy) then might such an objection more justly have been made unto his demand of a supply. But the most likely part of Hanno's Oration, and wherein he best might hope to prevail, contained a perswasion to use their fortune with moderation; and now to seek peace, whilest they had so much the better in war.

What would have been the issue of this counsel, if it had been followed, it were not ealie to say. For though it be likely, that the Roman pride would have brooked much indignity, in freeing Italy from the danger of war; yet it is not likely that the faith, so often broken to the Carthaginians in former times, would have been kept entire, when any opinion of good advantage had called for revenge of so many shameful overthrows; since after this war ended, and a new league concluded, no submissive behaviour could preserve Carthage from ruine, longer, than until such time as Rome was at leisure from all other wars. This counsel therefore of Hanno, though it might seem temperate, was indeed very pestilent; and served only to hinder the performance of a noble resolution. For it was concluded by a main consent of the Senate, that forty thousand Numidians, forty Elephants, and great abundance of silver, should be sent over to Hannibal: and that, besides these, twenty thousand foot, and four thousand horse, should be levied in Spain; not only to supply, as need should require, the Armies in their Province, but to be transported into Italy.

This great Aid, had it been as carefully sent, as it was readily decreed; the Roman Historians would not have found cause, to tax the retchless improwidence of Hannibal, in forbearing to march directly from Canna to Rome, or in refreshing his Army among the delights of Capua: the next years work would have finished the business, with less dangerous adventure; and the pleasures, which his men enjoyed among the Campanes, would have been commended, as rewards by him well thought upon, wherewith to animate both them and others, that were to be employed in the following War. But either the too much carelessness of those, that were loth to make haste in laying out their money, before extreme necessity required it; or the crafty malice of Hanno, and his fellows, working upon the private humours of men, that had more feeling of their own commodity, than sense of the publick need; utterly perverted, and made unprofitable in the performance, the order that had been so well set down. The * Elephants * Liv. 24.

uncertain it is how long after. But those great forces of threecore thousand foot, and four thousand horse, came not into Italy, till much was lost of that which already had been gotten, and a great part of the old Carthaginian Army, was first consumed by time, and sundry accidents of war. Only some small numbers, no way answering unto the proportion decreed, were sent into Spain; and the journey of Asdrubal thence through France into Italy much talked of, but he not enabled thereunto, till many years were past, and the Romans had recovered their strength.

Here we may note, what great riches the Carthaginians drew into their City, both by the Tributes received from their subjects, and by their wealthy Trade of Merchandize. For it is not long, since the War of the Mercenaries, and the perfidious tyranny of the Romans, extorting in time of greatest necessity twelve hundred talents; had exceedingly impoverished Carthage: which was before brought into great want, even by the expence of so much money, as was to be disbursed for redeeming of peace, after the loss of Agates. Yet we see, what great Armies of Numidians, and Spaniards, besides those already on foot, are appointed to the service in Italy, and how little the Carthaginians fear the want of money in these chargeable undertakings: whereas the Romans on the other side, having three or four years together been forced to some extraordinary cost, are fain to go upon credit; even for the price of those slaves, which they bought of their own Citizens to arm for their defence. Such advantage in means to enrich their Treasury, had the wealthy Merchants of Carthage, trading in all parts of the Mediterranean Sea, even from Tyrus their Mother-City in the bottom of the Straights unto the great Ocean, above the Romans: who lived on the fruits of their ground, and received their Tributes from people following the same course of life. When the time therefore was come, that the hatred of Rome found leisure to shew itself, in the destruction of Carthage; the impudence of Roman fullhood, in seeking an honest colour wherewith to shadow the intended breach of Faith, discovered plainly whence the jealousy was bred, that this mighty City would again rebell. For the Carthaginians, having given up hostages, even before the Roman Army did set forth, to perform whatsoever should be enjoyed them, with condition, that their City might not be destroyed; and having accordingly, when they were so required, yielded up all their weapons, and engines of War; the Romans told them plainly, That the City of Carthage, which was the body of the Citizens, should be friendly dealt withall, but the Town must needs be demolished, and removed into some other place, that should be twelve miles distant from the Sea. For (said the Romans) This Trade of Merchandize, by which ye now live, is not fit for peaceable men, such as ye promise to become hereafter, as is the Trade of Husbandry; an wholesome kinde of life, and enduing men with many laudable qualities which enable their bodies, and make them very apt for conversation. This villanous dealing of the Romans, though sugred with glossing words, plainly shews, what good observation the elder Cato had made of the hasty growth of Carthage in riches. For, when being demanded his opinion in the Senate about any matter whatsoever it were, he added still this conclusion, Thou I think; and that Carthage should be destroyed: He may seem, not only to have had regard unto that present wealth, which at his being there he had found in the City, but much more unto these times, and the great height whereunto it rose, even suddenly as we see, out of many calamities, whilst the Romans thought, that it had not been in case to dare so terrible a War.

But as the Carthaginians, in gathering wealth, were more industrious and skilfull than the Romans; so came they far short of them in the honourable care of the publick good: having every one, or most of them, a more principal regard of his own private benefit. This made them (besides the negligence commonly found in victors) when the first heat of their affection (wherein they concluded to pursue the war strongly) was over-past, go more leisurely to work, than had been requisite in the execution. It was easie for Hanno to persuade covetous men, that they should first of all defend their own in Spain. This might be done with little charge. Afterwards, when that Province was secured, they might send an Army into Italy, to go to work orderly by degrees. For it was no wisdom to commit all the strength of the Common-wealth to one hazard of fortune, against the enemies, or (which perhaps were worse) to the government of an ambitious man, and his brethren; who having once (if they could so do) finished the war, might easily make * Hannibal a King, and send subdue Carthage, with the forces that they had given him to the conquest of Rome.

By such malicious working of Hanno, and by their own slackness, incredulity, dullness, or niggardize, the Carthaginians were persuaded rather to make small disbursements in Spain, than to set up all their reit at once in Italy. Yet was it indeed impolish to hold a Countrey of so large extent, and so open a coast as that of Spain, free from all incursion of the Enemy: especially the affection of the Naturals being (as in a new conquest) ill established. A better way therefore it had been, to make a running War, by which the Romans might have been found occupied, even with the ordinary Carthaginian Garrisons or some little addition thereunto. For if it were thought meet, to defer the prosecution of their main intendment against Rome it self, untill such time as every little thorn were pulled out of the sides of so great a Province, then must Emporie have been besieged and forced: which, by reason of alliance with the Mallians, gave unto the Romans, at all times when they pleased, a ready and secure Harbour. But the Town of Emporie, was too strong to be won in haste: it had long defended it self against the Barbarians; having not above four hundred paces of wall to the main Land, and exceedingly well fortified: a great Spanish Town of the same name, lying without it, that was three miles in compass, very strong likewise, and friend unto the Gracians, though not over much trusted. Wherefore to force this Town of Emporie, that was, besides the proper strength, like to be so well assisted by the Mallians, Romans, and some Spaniards, would have been a work of little less difficulty, than was the Roman war (in appearance) after the battel at Cannæ: yea, it had been in effect none other, than to alter the seat of the war; which Hannibal had already fixed, with better judgement, near unto the gates of Rome. The difficulty of this attempt, being such as caused it altogether to be forborn; great folly it was to be much troubled about expelling the Romans utterly out of Spain: whom they might more easily have diverted thence, and drawn home to their own doors, by making strong war upon their City. For even so the Romans afterwards removed Hannibal into Africa, by sending an Army to Carthage; and by taking the like course, they now endeavoured to change the seat of the war transferring it out of Italy into Spain. But the private affections of men, regarding the common good no otherwise, than as it is accessory to their own purposes, did make them easily wink at opportunities, and hope that somewhat would fall out well of it self, though they set not to their helping hands. Hanno was a malicious wretch: yet they that thought him so, were well enough contented to hearken unto his discourses, as long as they were plausible, and tended to keep the purse full. In the mean while they suffered Hannibal, and all the noble house of Amilcar, to weary themselves in travel for the Common-wealth: which all Carthage in general highly commended, but weakly assisted; as if the industry of these Barchines had been somewhat more than needfull. Surely the Carthaginians, in general, were far less honourable than the people of Rome: not only in government of their subject Provinces, but in administration of their own estate; few of them preferring the respect of the Weal-publick above their private interest. But as they thrived little in the end, by their parsimony used toward their own Mercenaries, when the former Roman war was finished: so the conclusion of this war present, will make them complain, with feeling sighs of their negligence in supplying Hannibal, after the victory at Cannæ; when gladly they would give all their Treasures, to redeem the opportunity, that now they let pass, as if it were cost enough to send a few handfuls into Spain.

That both the Spanish business, and the state of Africa it self, depended wholly, or for the most part, upon success of things in Italy, the course of actions following will make manifest. Particularly, how matters were ordered in Spain by the Carthaginian Governours, it is very hard and almost impossible to set down. For, though we must not reprehend, in that worthy Historian Livy, the tender love of his own Countrey, which made him give credit unto Fabius and others, yet must we not, for his sake, believe those lies, which the impartial judgement of Polybius hath condemned, in the Writers that gave them original. It were needles to rehearse all that may be found in Polybius, concerning the untruth of that Roman Historian Fabius. One example may suffice. He saith of Amilcar and his men at Eryx, in the former war, That, having clean spent their strength, and being even broken with many miseries, they were glad to submit themselves unto the Romans. Contrary hereunto we find in the life of Amilcar, set down by Amilius Probus, That Eryx was in such sort held by the Carthaginians, that it seemed to be in as good condition, as if in those parts there had not been any war. These words, being referred to the brave resolution of the Carthaginian soldiers, and the singular vertue of their General, insinuating such spirit into them, may be taken as not over liberal. For in the treaty of peace between Amilcar and Capulus, when uncertain it is how long after. But those great forces of threecore thousand foot, and four thousand horse, came not into Italy, till much was lost of that which already had been gotten, and a great part of the old Carthaginian Army, was first consumed by time, and sundry accidents of war. It were needles to rehearse all that may be found in Polybius, concerning the untruth of that Roman Historian Fabius. One example may suffice. He saith of Amilcar and his men at Eryx, in the former war, that, having clean spent their strength, and being even broken with many miseries, they were glad to submit themselves unto the Romans. Contrary hereunto we find in the life of Amilcar, set down by Amilius Probus. That Eryx was in such fort held by the Carthaginians, that it seemed to be in a good condition, as if in those parts there had not been any war. These words, being referred to the brave resolution of the Carthaginian soldiers, and the singular virtue of their General, insinuating such spirit into them, may be taken as not over liberal. For in the treaty of peace between Amilcar and Catulus, when the Roman first of all required, that this Garrison of Eryx should lay down their arms and forsake Sicily, threatening, that otherwise he would not talk of any composition: Amilcar boldly bade him chuse, whether he would talk of it or no; for that the Arms which his Country had put into his hands to use against her enemies, it was not his purpose to yield up unto them. Now since the Romans, contrary to their custom upon like advantages, were content to let Amilcar have his will, and not to stand with him upon point of honour, whilst otherwise they might quietly rid their hands of him; plain enough it is, that they were far from thinking him a man consumed with miseries, as Fabius would have him seem. Hereunto agrees the relation of Polybius: who flatly, and by name, chargeth Fabius with untruth; saying, That howsoever Amilcar and his Souldiers had endured all extremity, yet they behaved themselves as men that had no sense thereof; and were as far from being either vanquished or tyred, as were their Enemies. Such being the difference between Fabius (as also perhaps between other old Writers of the Roman story) and those that had more regard of truth, than of flattering the mighty City of Rome: we must take it in good part, that howsoever Livie introduceth Hanno, in one place, joyning very foolishly his own shameful overthrow at the Islands * Agates, with the great services of Amilcar at Eryx, as if both of them had had a like event; yet elsewhere he forbeareth not to put a more likely tale (though with as impudent commendation of his own unhappy conduct) into the same Hanno his mouth, making him say, That the affairs of Carthage went never better, than a little before the loss of their Fleet in that battle at Sea; wherein himself was General. Now, concerning the doings of the Scipio's in Spain, there is cause to with, that this Fabius, with Val. Antias, and others of the like stamp, had either written (if they could not write more temperately) nothing at all; or that the tender affection of Livie to his Rome, had not caused him to think too well of their relations; which are such as follow.

§. XI.

Strange reports of the Roman victories in Spain, before Aldrubal the Son of Amilcar, followed thence his Brother Hannibal into Italy.

I^T hath been shewed already, how P. Cornelius Scipio the Consul returning from Gaul into Italy, to encounter with Hannibal at his descent from the Alps, sent before him his Brother Cneus, with part of his Fleet and Army, into Spain. Two Roman Legions, with fourteen thousand foot of the Confederates, and twelve hundred horse, had been allotted unto the Consul, therewith to make war in Spain against Hannibal; who, since he was marching into Italy with the strength of his Army, P. Scipio believed, that a good part of these his own forces might well be spared from the Spanish Expedition; and therefore made bold to carry some of the number back with him, leading on his Brother with the rest, as his Lieutenant. Publius himself remained in Italy all the time of his Consulship; which being expired, he was sent Proconsul into Spain by the Senate, with an Army of eight thousand men, and a Fleet of thirty Gallies.

The Acts of these two Brethren in their Province, were very great; and, as they are reported, somewhat marvellous. For they continually prevailed in Spain against the Carthaginians; whom they vanquished in so many battels, and withdrew from their Alliance so many of the Spaniards their Confederates, that we have cause to wonder how the enemy could so often find means to repair his forces, and return strong unto the field. But as the Romans, by pretending to deliver the Country from the tyranny of Carthage, might easily win unto their Confederacy, as many as were galled with the African yoke, and durst adventure to break it: so the ancient reputation of the first Conquerors might serve to arm the Naturals against these Invaders, and to reclaim those that had revolted unto the Romans, were it only by the memory of such ill success, as the like rebellions in former times had found. Hereto may be added the Carthaginian Treasure; which easily raised Souldiers, among those valiant (but in that Age) poor, and gold-thirsty Nations. Neither was it of small importance, that so many of the Spaniards had their children, kinsmen, and friends, abroad with Hannibal in his Italian Affairs; or serving the Carthaginians in Affick. And peradventure, if we durst be bold to say it; the victories of the Scipio's were neither so many, nor so great as they are set out by Livie. This we may be bold to say, that the great Captain Fabius, or Livie in his person, maketh an objection unto Scipio, which neither Scipio, nor Livie for him, doth answer. That if Aldrubal were vanquished, as Scipio would say by him in Spain: strange it was, and as little to his honour, as it had been extremely dangerous to Rome, that that the same vanquished man should invade Italy. And it is indeed an incredible narration. That Aldrubal, being enclosed on all sides, and not knowing how to escape out of battel, gave only by the steep descent of Rocks, over a great River that lay at his back, ran away with all his money, Elephants and broken troops, over Tagus, directly towards the Pyrenes, and so toward Italy upon which he fell with more than three-score thousand armed Souldiers. Neither do I see, how it hangs well together. That he chose a piece of ground very defensible, but most incommodious for his retreat, if he should happen to be vanquished; and yet, that he sent all his money and Elephants away before him, as not intending to abide the enemy: Or how it could be true, that theft his Elephants being so sent before, could hinder the Romans (for so have they said to have done in the last battel between him and Scipio) from breaking into his Camp. Wherefore we can no more than be sorry, that all Carthaginian records of this War, and Spanish, (if there were any) being utterly lost, we can know no more thereof, than what it hath pleased the Romans to tell us; unto whom it were no wisdom to give too much credit. In this regard, I will summarily run over the doings of the Scipio's in Spain, not greatly insulating on particulars, whereof there is no great certainty.

Cn. Cornelius landed at Emporie, an Haven Town, not far within the Pyrenes, retaining still the same name with little inflexion. That by the flame of his clemency he allured many Nations to become subject unto Rome, as the story begins of him, I could easily believe, if I understood by what occasion they had need to use his clemency, or he to give such famous example thereof, being a meer stranger, and having no jurisdiction in the Country. Yet it is certain, that he was a man very courteous, and one that could well insinuate himself in the love of the Barbarians, among whom, his dexterity in practice had the better success, for that he seemed to have none other errand than setting them at liberty. This pretext availed with some: others were to be hired with money: and some he compelled to yield by force or fear; especially when he had won a battel against Hanno. Into all Treaties of Accord, made with these people, likely it is, that he remembered to insert this Article, which the Romans in their Alliances never forgot, unless in long times past, and when they dealt with the Carthaginians, or their Superiours; Majestyatem Pop. Rom. commiserat, which is, as Tully interprets it,

That they should gently (or kindly) uphold the Majesty of the people of Rome. This was in appearance nothing troublesome; yet implied it indeed an obscure covenant of subjection. And in this respect it may be true, That the Spaniards became ditiois Romanæ, of the Roman jurisdiction; though hereafter they will say, they had no such meaning. That part of the Country wherein Scipio landed, was newly subdued by Hannibal in his passage toward Italy; and therefore the more easily shaken out of obedience, particularly in the Burguntians; Hannibal had found at his coming among them such an apprehension of the Roman greatness, as made him suspect, that any light occasion would make them start from the Carthaginians. Wherefore he not only appointed Hanno Governour over them, as over the rest of the Province between Iberus and the Pyrenes, but made him also their Lord; that is, (as I conceive it; for I do not think he gave the Principality of their Country unto Hanno and his Heirs) he made him not only Lieutenant-general over them, in matters of War, and things concerning the holding them in obedience to Carthage; but took from them all inferior Officers of their own, leaving them to be governed by Hanno at his discretion. These therefore had good cause to rejoice at the coming of Scipio; with whom, others also (no doubt) found reasons to joy, it being the custom of all conquered Nations in hatred of their present Lords, to throw themselves indifferently into the protection of others, that many times prove worse than the former. So were the Neapolitans, and Milanots, in the age of our Grand-fathers, weary by turns of the Spaniards and French; as more sensible still of the present evil which they felt, than regardless of the greater mischief, wherein they ran by seeking to avoid it. This bad affection of this Province, would not suffer Hanno to temporize. Tenthousand foot, and a thousand horse, Hannibal had left unto him: besides which, it is like, that some forces he was able to raise out of his Province. Therefore he adventured a battel with Scipio, wherein he was overthrown and taken. Following this victory, Scipio besieged Stiffum, a Town hard by, and won it. But Aldrubal having passed Iberus, and coming too late to the relief of Hanno, with eight thousand foot, and a thousand horse, fell upon the Roman Sea-forces, that lay not far from Tarraco, whom he found careless, as after a victory, roaving abroad in the Country; and with great slaughter drave them aboard their ships. This done, he ran up into the Country, where he withdrew the Ilergetes from the Roman party, though they had given Hostages to Scipio. Scipio in the mean season was gone to visit and aid his Fleet; where having felt things in order, he returned back, and made toward Asdrubal; who durst not abide his coming, but withdrew himself again over Iberus. So the Ilergetes were compelled by force, having lost Athanagia their chief City, to pay a fine to the Romans, and increase the number of their Hostages. The Asfantani likewise, Confederates of the Carthaginians, were besieged in their chief Town, which they defended thirty days; hoping, in vain, that the sharp Winter, and great abundance of Snow that fell, would have made the Romans to dislodge. But they were fain at length to yield; and for this their obstinacy, they were amerced twenty talents of silver. During the siege, the Lacetani came to help their distressed neighbours; and were beaten home by Scipio, leaving twelve thousand of their Company dead behind them. I cannot but wonder how these Lacetani, that are said to be the first which embraced the friendship of Scipio, should, without any cause remembered, become Carthaginian on the sudden, in the next news that we hear of them. As also it is strange, that all the Sea-coast Northward of Iberus, having lately become voluntarily disruptum Romanæ, subject unto Rome, should, in continuance of the Story, after a few lines, hold war against Scipio, without any resistance of the Carthaginians. Neither can I believe, that Asdrubal, as it were by a charm, stirred up the Ilergetes, making them lay aside all care of their Hostages, and take Arms in his quarrel; whilst himself had not the daring to stand against Scipio, but ran away, and saved himself beyond Iberus. Phibius perhaps, or some Carthaginian Writer, would have told it thus: That Scipio adventuring too far into the Country, was beaten by Asdrubal back to his ships, whence he durst not stir until Winter came on: at what time the Carthaginian returned into the heart of his Province, leaving some few Garrisons to defend those places, that after Scipio won, by returning upon them, unlooked for through a deep Snow. As for the Lacetani, Ilergetes, and the rest, we may reasonably think, that they sought their own benefit; helping themselves one while by the Romans against the Carthaginians; and contrariwise, upon sense of injuries received, or apprehension of more grievous tyranny, under which they feared to be brought by these new Masters, hearkning again unto the comfortable promises of those that had ruled them before. For that it was their intent to live under their own Country Laws, and not under Governours sent from Rome or Carthage, their demeanour in all Ages following may testify: even from henceforth unto the dayes of Augustus Cæsar, till when they were never thorowly conquered.

The year following this, Cn. Scipio had a victory against the Carthaginians in fight at Sea; or rather came upon them unlooked for, while they rode at Anchor, most of their men being on shore. All their ships that ran not too far on ground, he took; and thereby grew Master of the whole coast; landing at pleasure, and doing great hurt in all places that were not well defended. After this victory, above one hundred and twenty Nations, or petty estates in Spain, are said to have submitted themselves unto the Romans, or given Hostages; whereby Asdrubal was compelled to flye into the uttermost corners of the Land, and hide himself in Lusitania. Yet it followes, that the Ilergetes did again rebel; that Asdrubal hereupon came over Iberus; and that Scipio (though having easily vanquished the Ilergetes) went not forth to meet him, but stirred up against him the Celiberians, that lately were become his subjects, and had given him Hostages. These took from the Carthaginians three Towns, and vanquished him in two battels; wherein they slew fifteen thousand of his men, and took four thousand prisoners. Then arrived P. Scipio, with the supply before mentioned; and henceforward the two Brethren joyntly administered the business in Spain.

The Carthaginians being occupied in the Celiberian War, the two Scipios did hand conscienter, without both fear or doubt, pass over Iberus, and besieged Saguntum. Little cause of doubt had they, if Cn. had already subdued many Nations beyond it, and among many other, the same Celiberians, that with their proper forces were able to vanquish Asdrubal. Bostar, the Governor of Saguntum, a simple man, suffered himself to be persuaded by one Acedux a Spaniard, that the only way to get the favour and hearty good will of the Country, was by freely restoring unto them their Hostages; as resting without any pledge, assured of their faith. But the crafty Spaniard, being trusted with this message and restitution of the Hostages, carried them all to the Roman General; persuaded them, as he had done Bostar, to make the Liberality their own. Hereby the Romans purchased much love, if

if the tale were true; and if it were not rather true, as after ward, and ere this we find that all the Spanish Hostages were left in new Carthage. I am weary of rehearsing so many particularities, whereof I can believe few. But since we find no better certainties, we must content our selves with these.

The year following was like unto this: Asdrubal must be beaten again. The two Scipios divide their forces: Cn. makes war by Land, P. by Sea. Asdrubal, with much labour and entreaty, hath gotten four thousand foot, and five hundred horse out of Affick: He repairs his Fleet, and provides every way to make resistance. But all his chief Sea-men, and Masters of his Ships, revolt unto the Romans; because they had been chidden the last year for their negligence, which had betrayed the Navy. The revolt of these ship-masters animates to rebellion the Carpetians, or Carpetani, an Island people about Toledo, in the very Center of Spain. These do much mischief, so that Asdrubal is fain to make a journey to them. His sudden coming cuts off some of them, that were found scattered abroad in the fields. But they, making a head, so valiantly assail him, that they drive him for very fear, to encamp himself strongly on an high piece of ground; whence he dares not come forth to give them battel. So they take a Town by force, wherein he had laid up all his provisions; and shortly make themselves Masters of the Country round about. This good success breeds negligence; for which they dearly pay. Asdrubal comes upon them, takes them unprepared, beats them, kills the most of them, and disperseth the rest; so that the whole Nation yieldeth to him the next day. Then come directions from Carthage, that Asdrubal should lead his Army forth into Italy; which we may wonder why the Carthaginians would appoint him to do, if they had been informed by his letters in what hard case he was; and had so weakly supplied him, as is shewed before. But thus we find it reported; and that upon the very rumour of this his journey, almost all Spain was ready to fall to the Romans. Asdrubal therefore presently sends word to Carthage. That this must not be so: or, if they will needs have it so, that then they must send him a successor, and well attended with a strong Army, which to employ they should find work more than enough; such notable men were the Roman Generals. But the Senate of Carthage is not much moved with this excuse; Asdrubal must needs be gone: Himilco, with such forces as are thought expedient for that service, both by Land and Sea, is sent to take the charge of Spain. Wherefore Asdrubal hath now no more to do, than to furnish himself with store of money, that he might have wherewithal to win the friendship of the Gauls; through whose Countries he must pass, as Hannibal had done before him. The Carthaginians were greatly to blame, for not remembering to ease him of his care. But since it can be no better, he lays great Impositions upon all the Spaniards his subjects; and having gotten together as much treasure as he could, onward he marcheth toward Iberus. The Scipios' hearing these news, are careful how to arrest him on the way. They besiege Ibera (so called of the Rivers name running by it) the richest Town in all those quarters, that was confederate with Asdrubal; who thereupon steps aside to relieve it. The Romans meet him, and fight a battel with him; which they win the more easily, for that the Spaniards, his followers had rather be vanquished at home, than get the victory, and afterwards be haled into Italy. Great numbers are slain; and few should have escaped, but that the Spaniards ran away ere the battels were fully joyned. Their Camp the Romans take and spoil; whereby (questionless) they are marvellously enriched; all the money that could be raked together in Spain being carried along in this Italian Expedition. This dayes event joyns all Spain to the Romans, if any part of the Country stood in doubt before; and puts Asdrubal so far from all thought of travelling into Italy, that it leaves him small hope of keeping himself safe in Spain. Of these exploits advertisement is sent to Rome, and Letters to the Senate, from P. and Cn. Scipio, whereof the Contents are, That they have neither money, apparel, nor bread, wherewith to sustain their Army and Fleet; that all is wanting: so as unless they may be supplied from Rome, they can neither hold their forces together, nor tarry any longer in the Province. These Letters come to Rome in an evil season; the State being scarcely able, after the loss at Cannæ, to help it self at home. Yet relief is sent; how hardly, and how much to the commendations of that love and care, which the private Citizens of Rome bare unto the Common-wealth, shall be inserted elsewhere into the relation of things, whereof the truth is less questionable. At the coming of this supply, the two Scipios pursue Asdrubal, and hunt him out of his lurking holes. What else can we think, that remember the last news of him, and how fearfully he mistrusted his own safety? They find him, and Mago and Amilcar the Son of Bomilcar, with an

Uuuuu 2 Army

Army of three score thousand men, besieging Illiturgi: (which the learned Ortelius, and others probably conjecture to have stood, where Carinena is now in the Kingdom of Aragon;) for there was Illiturgi, afterwards called Forum Julii, quite another way.) A Town of the Illegres their nearest Neighbours, for having revolted unto the Romans. The Town is greatly distressed; but most of all, for want of victuals. The Romans therefore break through between the Enemies Camps, with terrible slaughter of all that resisted them; and having victualled the place, encourage Townsmen to defend their walls as stoutly, as they should anon behold them fighting manfully with the besiegers, in their behalf. So they issue forth, about sixteen thousand against three score thousand: and killing more of the enemies, than themselves were in number, drive all the three Carthaginian Commanders, every one out of his quarters; and took that day, besides prisoners and other booty, fifty and eight Ensigns.

The Carthaginian Army, being thus beaten from Illiturgi, fall upon Inebili, that stood a little Southward from the mouth of Iberus. The Spaniards are blamed, as too greedy of earning money by war, for thus re-inforcing the broken Carthaginians. But it may be wondered, whence the Carthaginians had money to pay them: since Asdrubal was lately driven to poll the Country, wanting money of his own; and being beaten in his journey, had lost his wealthy carriages when his Camp was taken after the battle by Iberus. Howsoever it happens, the Carthaginians (according to their custom) are beaten again at Inebili: where there were of them above thirteen thousand slain, and above three thousand taken; besides two and forty Ensigns, and nine Elephants. After this, (in a manner) all the people of Spain fell from them unto the Romans. Thus could Fabius, Valerius, Antius, or some other Historian, to whom Livy gave credit, conquer all Spain twice in one year, by winning famous victories; whereof these good Captains, P. and Cn. Scipio, perhaps were not aware.

The Romans notwithstanding this large access of Dominion, winter on their own side of Iberus. In the beginning of the next year, great Armies of the Spaniards rise against Asdrubal; and are overthrown by him. P. Scipio, to help these his friends, is forced to make great haste over the River. At Castrum Alutum, a place in the mid-way between new Carthage and Saguntum, famous by the death of the great Amilcar, Publius Scipio incampeth: and stores the place with victuals, being strong and defensible; as intending to make it his seat for a while. But the Country round about it is too full of Enemies: the Carthaginian horse have charged the Romans in their march, and are gone off clear; falling also upon some stragglers, or such as lagged behind their fellows in march, they have cut off two thousand of them. Hereupon it is thought behoeful, to retire unto some place more assured. So Publius withdraws himself unto Mons victorie: that rising somewhat Eastward from Inebili, overlooketh the Southern Out-let of Iberus. Thither the Carthaginians pursue him: His brother Cn. repairs unto him; and Asdrubal the son of Gaiso, with a full Army, arrives to help his Companions. As they lie thus near incamped together, P. Scipio with some light-armed, going closely to view the places thereabouts, is discovered by the enemies: who are like to take him, but that he withdraws himself to an high piece of ground; where they besiege him, until his brother Cn. fetch him off. After this (but I know not why) Castulo, a great City of Spain, whence Hannibal had taken him a wife, joyneth with the Romans; though being far distant from them, and seated on the head of the River Betis. Nevertheless the Carthaginians pass over Iberus, to besiege Illiturgi again, wherein lodgeth a Roman garrison; hoping to win it by famine. We may justly wonder, what should move them to neglect the rebellion of Castulo, yea and the Roman Army lying so close by them, and to seek adventures further off, in that very place, wherein they had been so grievously beaten the year before. But thither they go: and thither follows them Cn. Scipio with one Legion: who enters the Town by force, breaks out upon them the next day, and in two battels kills above twelve thousand, and takes more than a thousand of them prisoners, with six and thirty Ensigns. This victory (doubtless) is remarkable: considering that the greatest Roman Legion at this time, consisted of no more than five thousand men. The vanquished Carthaginians besiege Bigarra: but that siege is also raised by Cn. Scipio. Thence the Carthaginians remove to Manda; where the Romans are soon at their heels. There is a great battle fought, that lasted four hours, wherein the Romans get a notable victory: and a more notable would have gotten, had not Cn. Scipio been wounded. Thirty nine Elephants are killed, and twelve thousand men; three thousand prisoners taken, and seven and fifty Ensigns. The Carthaginians flee to

Arvinge; and the Romans pursue them. Cn. Scipio in a Liv. lib. 24. winter is carried into the field, and vanquished the Carthaginians again; but kills not half so many of them, as before; good cause why, for there are fewer of them left to fight. Notwithstanding all these overthrows, the Spaniards, a people framed even by nature to set war on foot, quickly fill up the broken troops of Asdrubal, who having also hired some of the Gauls, adventures once more to try his fortune with the Romans. But he is beaten again: and loseth eight thousand of his men; besides Prisoners, Elephants, Ensigns, and other appurtenances. After so many victories, the Romans are even ashamed to leave Saguntum entrapped unto the Carthaginians; since, in behalf of that City, they had at first entred into this war. And well may we think it strange, that they had not recovered it long before, since we may remember, that long before this they had won all the Country once and again. But it must not be forgotten, that they had ere now besieged Saguntum; and were fain (as appears) to go their way without it: so as they need not to blush, for having so long forbore to do that which ere now they had attempted, but were unable to perform. At the present they won Saguntum: and restored the possession thereof unto such of the poor dispersed Citizens as they can find out. They also waste and destroy the Country of the Turdetani, that had ministred unto Hannibal matter of quarrel against the Saguntines. This last action (questionless) was much to their honour; and wherein we may be assured, that the Carthaginians would have disturbed them if they had been able.

But overlooking now this long continuance of great victories, which the Romans have gotten in Spain, other print or token of all their brave exploits, we can perceive none, than this recovery of Saguntum: excepting the stopping of Asdrubal's journey; which was indeed of greatest importance, but appertaining to their own defence. For they have landed at Emporie, an Haven Town, built and peopled by a Colony of the Phocceans, kin to the Massilians, friends to the Romans; They have easily won to their party, lost, recovered, and lost again, some petty bordering Nations of the Spaniards, that are carried one while by persuasion, other whiles by force, and sometimes by their own unfetled passions; and now finally they have won a Town, whereof the Carthaginians held entire possession, who had rooted out the old inhabitants. Wherefore we may easily believe, that when they took Saguntum (if they took it not by surprise; which is to be suspected, since in this Action we find no particulars remembered, as when the same place was taken by Hannibal) they had gotten the better of their Enemies in some notable fight. In like sort also must we think, that all those battels lately remembered, after every one of which Asdrubal (late down before some place, that had rebelled, or seemed ready to rebel, were prosperous unto the Carthaginians. For it is not the custom of Armies vanquished, to carry to war from Town to Town, and beleaguer Cities of their Enemies; but to fortify themselves within their own places of strength, and therein to attend the levy and arrival of new supplies. And surely, if the Romans had been absolute Masters of the field, when they won Saguntum, they would not have consumed a whole year following, in practising only with the Celtiberians the next adjoining people. Yet made they this, little less than two years business. Of these Celtiberians we hear before, That they had yielded up themselves unto the Romans; for security of their faith, given hostages to Scipio; and, at his appointment, made war against the Carthaginians, with their proper forces. Wherefore it is strange, that they are now thus hardly wrought; and not without express condition of a great sum, hired to serve in the Roman Camp. How this may hold together I cannot perceive; unless perhaps in those days it were the Roman custom, or rather the custom of some bad Author whom Livy follows, to call every messenger, or straggler, that entred that camp, an Hostage of that people from whom he came.

The Celtiberians at length, hired with great rewards, send an Army of thirty thousand to help the Romans: out of which, 3000. of the fittest men are chosen, and carried into Italy, there to deal with their Country-men that follow Hannibal in his wars. But if any of these three hundred return back into Spain, it is to be feared, that he brings with him such news of the riches and welfare of Hannibal's men, that all his fellows at home are the less unwilling to follow Asdrubal, when he shall next have a desire to lead them into Italy. Hereof we find more than probability, when these mercenary Celtiberians meet the Carthaginian Army in the field. The two Scipio's, presuming on this access of strength, divide their Forces, and seek out the Enemies, who lie not far off with three Armies. Asdrubal the son of Amilcar, is nearest at hand; even among the Celtiberians, at Antioch.

With

With him Cn. Scipio doubts not to take good order: but the fear is, that this one part of the Carthaginian forces being destroyed; Mago the Son of Gefco, hearing the news, will make use of their distance, which is five dayes march, and by running into the furthest part of the Country save themselves from being overtaken. Publius therefore must make the more haste, and take with him the better Souldiers, that is, two parts of the old Roman Army, leaving the third part, and all the Celtiberians, to his Brother. He that hath the longer journey to make, comes somewhat the sooner to his lives end. Mago and Asdrubal, the Son of Gefco, are not studying how to run away: they find no such necessity. They joyn their forces together, meet with Publius Scipio, and lay at him so hardly, that he is driven to keep himself close within his Trenches; wherein he thinks himself not will assured. Especially he is vexed by Masunissa, Prince of the Masseyli, Numidians, bordering upon Mauritania, in the Region called now Tremisen: to whom the chief honour of this service is ascribed, for that he becomes afterward Confederate with the Romans. In this dangerous case, P. Scipio gets intelligence, that Indibilis a Spanish Prince, is coming with seven thousand and five hundred of the Suffetani, to joyn with his Enemies. Fearing therefore to be strait shut up, and besieged, he issues forth by night, to meet with Indibilis upon the way, leaving T. Fonteius his Lieutenant, with a small company to defend the Camp. He meets with Indibilis; but is not able, according to his hope, to defeat him at the first encounter. The fight continues so long, that the Numidian horse appear (whom he thought to have been ignorant of his departure) and fall upon the Romans on all sides: neither are the Carthaginians far behind; but come so fast upon him in a Rear, that P. Scipio, uncertain which way to turn, yet fighting and animating his men, where need most requireth, is struck thorow with a lance, and slain: very few of his Army escaping the same destiny, through benefit of the dark night. The like end hath Cn. Scipio within nine and twenty dayes after. At his meeting with Asdrubal, the Celtiberian Mercenaries all forsake him, pretending that they had war in their own Country. If Antiochus, where Asdrubal then lay, were, as Ortelius following Bucerus takes it, a Celtiberian Town; this was no vain pretence, but an apparent truth. But we may justly believe, that they were won by Asdrubal, and easily persuaded to take as much money for not fighting, as they should have had for hazarding their lives. C. Scipio therefore being unable to stay them, and no less unable, without their help either to resist the enemy, or to joyn with his Brother, maketh a very violent retreat; herein only differing from plain flight, that he keeps his men together. Asdrubal presseth hard upon him: and Mago, with Asdrubal the Son of Gefco, having made an end of Publius, hasten to dispatch his Brother after him. Scipio steals from them all by night, but is overtaken the next day by their horse, and arrested, in an open place of hard stony ground, where grows not so much as a shrub, unfit for defence of his Legions against such enemies. Yet a little Hill he finds of easie ascent on every side; which he takes for want of a more commodious place, and fortifies with pack-saddles, and other luggage, for default of a better Palisado. These weak defences the Carthaginians soon tear in sunder: and, breaking in on all hands, leave very few of them alive; that saving themselves, I know not how, within some woods adjoining, escape unto T. Fonteius, whom Publius had left in his Camp, as is before said. It is a terrible overthrow, they say, out of which no man escapes. Yet, how they who were thus hemmed in on every side, in so bare a ground as afforded not a shrub to cover them, could break out, and throw themselves within woods adjoining, I should much wonder; did not a greater miracle following call away mine attention. T. Fonteius is in P. Scipio's Camp, on the North side of Iberus, fearful (as may be supposed) of his own life; since his General, with two parts of the Roman Army, had little hope to remain long safe within it. Thither comes L. Martius, a young Roman Gentleman of a noble Spirit; who having gathered together the scattered Souldiers, and drawn some Companies out of their Garrisons, makes a pretty Army. The Souldiers, being to chuse a General by most voices, prefer this L. Martius before Fonteius the Lieutenant, as well they may. For Asdrubal the Son of Gefco, coming upon them; this L. Martius so encourageth his men (fondly weeping when he led them forth, upon remembrance of their more honourable Generals lately slain) and admonisheth them of their present necessity, that he beats the Carthaginians into their Trenches. A notable victory perhaps he might have gotten, but that he wisely sounds the retreat; reserving the fury of his Souldiers to a greater occasion. The Carthaginians are at first amazed, and wonder whence this new boldness grows, in enemies lately

vanquished, and now again little better than taken: but when they see, that the Roman dares not follow his advantage, they return to their former security; and, utterly despising him, set neither Corps de garde nor Sentinel, but rest secure, as if no enemy were near. Martius therefore animates his Souldiers with lively words; and tells them, That there is no adventure more safe, than that which is furthest from suspicion of being undertaken. They are soon persuaded to follow him, in any desperate piece of service. So he leads him forth by night, and steals upon the Camp of Asdrubal; where, finding no guard, but the enemies fast asleep, or very drowsie, he enters without resistance, fires their Cabbins, and gives a terrible alarm; so that all affrighted the Carthaginians run head-long one upon another, they know not which way. All passages out of their Camp, Martius hath preposited, so that there is no way to escape, save by leaping down the Rampart; which as many do, as can think upon it, and run away toward the Camp of Asdrubal the Son of Amilcar, that lay six miles off. But Martius hath way-laid them. In a Valley between their two Camps he hath bestowed a Roman cohort, and I know not what number of Horse; so that into this Ambush they fall every one, and are cut in pieces. But, lest perchance any should have escaped, and give the alarm before his coming; Martius hastens to be there as soon as they. By which diligent speed, he comes early in the morning upon this further Camp; which with no great difficulty he enters, and partly by apprehension of danger which the Enemies conceived, when they beheld the Roman shields, foul, and bloodied with their former execution, he drives head-long into flight, all that can save themselves from the fury of the sword. Thirty seven thousand of the enemies perish in this nights work; besides a thousand eight hundred and thirty, taken prisoners. Hereunto Valerius Antius adds, that the Camp of Mago was also taken, and seven thousand slain; and that in another battel with Asdrubal, there were slain ten thousand more; besides four thousand three hundred and thirty taken prisoners. Such is the power of some Historians. Livie therefore hath elsewhere well observed, That there is none so intemperate, as Valerius Antius, in multiplying the numbers that have fallen in battels. That, whilst Martius was making an Oration to his Souldiers, a flame of fire shone about his head, Livie reports as a common tale, not giving thereto any credit: and temperately concludeth, That this Captain Martius got a great name, which he might well do, if with so small forces, and in such distress, he could clearly get off from the Enemies, and give them any parting blow, though it were far less than that which is here set down.

Of these occurs L. Martius sent word to Rome, nor forgetting his own good service, whatsoever it was, but setting it out in such wise, as the Senate might judge him worthy to hold the place of their Vicegerent in Spain: which the better to intimate unto them, he styled himself Propretor. The Fathers were no less moved with the tydings than the case required; and therefore took such careful order, for supplying their forces in Spain; that although Hannibal came to the gates of Rome, ere the Companies levied to serve that Province, could be sent away; yet could they not stay a tyde for defence of the City it self, but shipped them in all haste for Spain. As for the title of Propretor, which Martius had assumed, they thought it too great for him, and were offended at his presumption in usurping it: foreseeing well, that it was matter of ill consequence, to have the Souldiers abroad make choice among themselves, of those that should command Armies and Provinces. Therefore Claudius Nero was dispatched away with all convenient haste, into Spain: carrying with him about six thousand of the Roman foot, and as many of the Latines, with three hundred Roman horse, and of the Latines eight hundred.

It happened well that about these times, the affairs of Rome began to prosper in Italy, and offered means of sending abroad such a strong supply: otherwise the victories of Martius would ill have served, either to keep footing in Spain, or to stop the Carthaginian Armies from marching towards the Alps. For when Claudius, landing with his new forces, took charge of that remainder of the Army, which was under Martius and Fonteius; he found surer tokens of the overthrows received, than of those miraculous victories, whereof Martius had made his vaunts unto the Senate. The Roman party was forsaken by most of the Spanish friends; whom how to reclaim, it could not easily be devised. Yet Claudius advanced boldly towards Asdrubal the Brother of Hannibal; whom he found among the Ausitanis, near enough at hand, incamped in a place called Lapides Atri; out of which there was no issue, but only through a strait, whereon the Roman seized at the first coming. What should have tempted any man of understanding to to incamp in such a place, I do not find : and as little reason can I find in that which followed. For it is said, that Asdrubal seeing himself thus lockt up, made offer to depart forthwith out of all Spain, and quit the Province to the Romans, upon condition that he and his Army might be thence dismissed. That he spent many days, in entertaining parley with Claudian about his business ; That night by night he conveyed his footmen (a few at a time) through very difficult passages, out of the danger ; and that finally taking advantage of a misty day, he stole away with all his Horse and Elephants, leaving his Camp empty. If we consider, that there were at the same time, besides this Asdrubal, two other Carthaginian Generals in Spain ; we shall find no less cause to wonder at the simplicity of Claudian, who hoped to conclude a bargain for so great a Country, with one of these three Chieftains, than at the strange nature of those passages, through which the footmen could hardly creep out by night ; the Horse and Elephants easily following them in a dark misty day. Wherefore in giving belief to such a tale, it is needful that we suppose, both the danger wherein the Carthaginians were, and the conditions offered for their safe departure, to have been of far less value. Howsoever it was ; neither this, nor ought else that the Romans could do, served to purchase any new friends in Spain, or to recover the old which they had lost. Like enough it is, that the old Souldiers, which had chosen Martius their Propretor, took it not well, that the Senate, regardless of their good deserts, had repealed their election, and sent a Propretor whom they fancied not so well. Some such occasion may have moved them to desire a Proconsul, and (perhaps) young Scipio by name ; as if a title of greater dignity were needful to work regard in the Barbarians ; and the beloved memory of Cn. and Publius likely to do good, were it revived in one of the same family. Whether upon these, or upon other reasons ; C. Claudius was recalled out of the Province ; and Publius the Son of P. Scipio sent proconsul into Spain.

This is that Scipio, who afterward transferred the war into Africa : where he happily ended it, to the great honour and benefit of his Country. He was a man of goodly presence, and singularly well conditioned ; especially he excelled in Temperance, Continency, Bounty, and other virtues that purchase love ; of which qualities what great use he made, shall appear in the tenour of his actions following. As for those things that are reported of him, favouring a little too much of the great Alexanders vanity ; how he used to walk alone in the Capitol, as one that had some secret conference with Jupiter ; how a Dragon (which must have been one of the gods ; and, in likelihood, Jupiter himself) was thought to have conversed with his Mother, entering her Chamber often, and vanishing away at the coming in of any man ; and how of these matters he nourished the rumour, by doubtful answers ; I hold them no better than fables, devised by Historians, who thought thereby to add unto the glory of Rome : that this Noble City might seem not only to have surpassed other Nations in virtue of the generality, but also in great worth of one single man. To this end nothing is left out ; that might serve to adorn this Roman Champion. For it is confidently written, as matter of unquestionable truth, That when a Proconsul was to be chosen for Spain, there durst not any Captain of the principal Citizens offer himself as Petitioner for that honourable, but dangerous charge ; That the people of Rome were much astonished thereat ; That when the day of Election came, all the Princes of the City stood looking one another in the face, not one of them having the heart to adventure himself in such a desperate service ; and finally, that this P. Cornelius Scipio, being then about four and twenty years of age, getting up on a high place where he might be seen of all the multitude, requested and obtained, that the office might be conferred upon him. If this were true, then were all the victories of L. Martius no better than dreams : and either very unreasonable was the fear of all the Roman Captains, who durst not follow Claudian Nero, that not long before was gone into Spain Propretor ; or very bad intelligence they had out of the Province, which Asdrubal the Carthaginian, as we heard even now, was ready to abandon. But upon these incoherences, which I find in the two partial Roman Historians, I do not willingly insist.

P. Scipio was sent Proconsul into Spain ; and with him was joyned M. Junius Silanus, as Propretor, and his Coadjutor. They carried with them ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse, in thirty Quingentum Gallies, with these they landed at Emporia, and marched from thence to Tarracon alongst the Sea-coast. At the same of Scipio's arrival, it is said, that Embassages came to him from all quarters of the Province ; which he entertained with such a Majesty, as bred a wonderful opinion of him. As for the enemies, they were greatly afraid of him ; and so much the greater was their fear, by how how much the less they could give any reason of it. If we must believe this, then must we needs believe, that their fear was even as great as could be : for very little cause there was, to be terrified with the fame of so young a man, which had as yet performed nothing. All the Winter following (or, as some think, all the next Year) he did nothing ; but spent the time perhaps, as his forgoers had done, intreating with the Spaniards. His first enterprise was against new Carthage : upon which he came unexpected, with five and twenty thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse ; his Sea-forces coasting him, and moderating their course in such wise, that they arrived there together with him. He assailed the Town by Land and Sea ; and won it by assault the first day. The Carthaginians lost it, by their too much confidence upon the strength of it : which caused them to man it more slenderly, than was requisite. Yet it might have been well enough defended, if some Fishermen of Tarracon had not discovered unto Scipio, a secret passage unto the walls ; whereof the Townsmen themselves were either ignorant, or thought (at least) that their enemies could have no notice. This City of new Carthage, resembled the old and great Carthage in situation ; standing upon a demy-Island, between an Haven and a great Lake. All the Western side of the walls, and somewhat of the North, was fenced with this Lake ; which the Fishermen of Tarracon had sounded ; and finding some part thereof a shelf, whereon at low-water men might pass knee-deep, or (at most) wading up to the Navil, Scipio thrust therein some companies of his men ; who recovered the top of the walls without resistance : the place being left without guard ; as able to defend itself by the natural strength. These falling suddenly upon the backs of the Carthaginians within the City, easily forced a gate, and gave free entrance to the Roman Army. What booty was found within the Town, Livie himself cannot certainly affirm ; but is fain to say, that some Roman Historians told lies without measure, in way of amplification. By that small proportion of riches, which was afterward carried by Scipio into the Roman Treasury, we may easily perceive, how great a vanity it was to say, that all the wealth of Africa and Spain was heaped up in that one Town. But therein were bestowed all the Spanish Hostages (or at least of the adjoining Provinces) whom Scipio intreated with singular courtesie : restoring them unto their kindred and friends, in such gracious manner, as doubled the thanks due to so great a benefit. Hereupon a Prince of the Celtiberians, and two petty Kings of the Ilergetes and Lacertani, nearest Neighbours to Tarracon, and dwelling on the North-side of Iberus, forsook the Carthaginian party, and joyned with the Romans. The speech of Indibilis, King of the Ilergetes, is much commended ; for that he did not vaunt himself, as commonly Fugitives use, of the pleasure, which he did unto the Romans, in revolting from their enemies ; but rather excused this his changing side, as being thereto compelled by injuries of the Carthaginians, and invited by the honourable dealing of Scipio. This temperate estimation of his new professed friendship, was indeed no unsure token, that it should be long-lasting. But if the Ilergetes had long ere this (as we have heard before) forsaken the Carthaginian party, and stoutly held themselves as friends to Cn. Scipio ; then could nothing have been devised more vain, than this Oration of Indibilis their King, exclaiming, as new, his taking part with the same, when he should have rather craved pardon for his breach of alliance, formerly contracted with the Father and the Uncle. Most likely therefore it is, that howsoever the two elder Scipio's had gotten some few places among these their Neighbours, and held them by strength ; yet were the Romans never masters of the Country, till this worthy Commander, by recovering their Hostages from the Carthaginians, and by his great munificence in sending them home, won unto himself the assured love and assistance of these Princes : The Carthaginian Generals, when they heard of this loss, were very sorry : yet nevertheless they set agood face on the matter ; saying, that a young man, having stoln a Town by surprise, was too far transported, and over-joyed, but that shortly they would meet with him, and put him in mind of his Father and Uncle ; which would alter his mood, and bring him to a more convenient temper.

Now if I should here interpose mine own conjecture ; I should be bold to say, that the Carthaginians were at this time busie, in setting forth towards Italy ; and that Scipio, to divert them, undertook new Carthage, as his Father and Uncle, upon the like occasion, fate down before Ibera. And in this respect I would suppose, that it had not been much amiss, if the passage over the Lake had been undiscovered, and the Town held out some longer while. For howsoever that particular Action was the more fortunate, in coming to such good issue upon the first day : yet in the generality of the business, between between Rome and Carthage, it was more to be wished, that Asdrubal should be stayed from going into Italy, than that half of Spain should be taken from him. Whereas therefore he had nothing left to do, that should hinder his journey; Mago, and Asdrubal the son of Gefco, were thought sufficient to hold Scipio work, in that lingering War of taking and retaking Towns, whilst the main of the Carthaginian forces, under Asdrubal the son of Amilcar, went to a greater enterprise: even to fight in trial of the Empire. But the Roman Historians tell this after another fashion; and say, That Asdrubal was beaten into Italy: whether he ran for fear, as thinking himself ill assured of the Spaniards, as long as they might but hear the name of Scipio. Scipio, say they, coming upon Asdrubal; his Vant-cursors charged so lustily the Carthaginian horse, that they drove them into their Trenches: and made it apparent, even by that small piece of service, how full of spirit the Roman Army was, and how dejected the Enemy. Asdrubal therefore by night retired out of that even ground, and occupied an Hill, compassed on three sides with the River, very steep of ascent, and not easie of access on the forside; by which himself got up, and was to be followed by the Romans. On the top of it there was a Plain, whereon he strongly encamped himself: and in the mid-way, between the top and root of the Hill, was also another Plain; into which he descended, more upon bravery, that he might not seem to hide himself within the Trenches; than for that he durst adventure his Army to the hazard of a battail, for which this was no equal ground. But such advantage of place could not save him from the Romans. They climbed up the Hill to him; they recovered even footing with him; drove him out of this lower Plain, up into his Camp on the Hill top: whether although the ascent were very difficult, and his Elephants bestowed in the smoothest places to hinder their approach; yet compassing about, and seeking passage where it was hardest to be found; but much more strongly breaking their way, where the Carthaginians had got up before them, they drove both men and Elephants head-long. I know not whither: for it is said, that there was no way to flye. Out of such a battel, wherein he had lost eight thousand men, Asdrubal is said to have escaped; and gathering together his dispersed troops, to have marched toward the Tyreneers, having sent away his Elephants ere the fight began. Nevertheless, Mago, and Asdrubal the son of Gefco, are reported after this to have consulted with him about this War; and finally to have concluded, that go he needs must, were it but to carry all the Spaniards as far as might be, from the name of Scipio. How likely this was to have been true, it shall appear at his coming into Italy; whence these incoherent relations of the Spanish affairs have too long detained us.

§. XII.

The great troubles that Hannibal raised in all quarters, to the City of Rome. Posthumus the Roman General, with his whole Army, is slain by the Gauls. Philip King of Macedon enters into a League with Hannibal, against the Romans. The Romans joining with the Aetolians, make war upon Philip in Greece: and afterwards conclude a peace with him, the better to intend their business against the Carthaginians.

WE left Hannibal wintering at Capua: where he and his new Confederates rejoiced (as may be thought) not a little, to hear the good news from Carthage of such mighty aid; as was decreed to be sent thence unto him. In former times he had found work enough, to carry the Roman corn into his own barns, and to drive away their Cattle to Geryon: his victories affording him little other profit, than sustenance for his Army; by making him master of the open field. He might perhaps have forced some walled Towns in like sort as he did Geryon, and the Castle of Canne: but had he spent much time, about the getting of any one place well defended; the hunger, that his Army must have endured the Winter and Spring following, untill corn were ripe, would have grievously punished him for such employment of the Summer. This may have been the reason, why he forbore to adventure upon Rome, after his victory at Canne. For had he failed ('as it was a matter of no certainty) to carry the City at his first coming; want of victuals would have compelled him to quit the enterprise. Yea many of the people that opened so hastily their gates unto him, upon the fresh bruit of his glorious success, would have taken time of deliberation, and waited perhaps the event of another battel; if being, either for want of means to force the City, or of necessities to continue a siege before it, repelled (as might seem) from the walls of Rome, he had presented himself unto them with a lessened reputation; somewhat later in the year; when time to force their obedience was was wanting, unless they would freely yield it. But this great part of the care and travaise was past, when so many States of Italy were become his: the year following, the Samnites, and other old enemies of Rome, were like to receive a notable pleasure of their new alliance with Carthage, by helping to lay siege unto that proud City, which so long had held them in subjection. Thus the winter was passed over joyfully, faving that there came not any tidings of the preparations, to second the welcome report of those mighty forces, that were decreed and expected. The Spring grew on: and of the promised supply there arrived no more, than only the Elephants. How late it was ere these came, I find not: only we find, that after this he had above thirty of them; whereas all, save one, that he brought over the Alps, had been lost in his journey through the Marishes of Hetruria. Very bad excuse of this exceeding negligence, they that brought the Elephants could make unto Hannibal. If they were his friends, they told him truly, what mischiefs the perswasion of Hanno wrought among the too niggardly Carthaginians. Otherwise, they might perhaps inform him, that it was thought a safer, though a farther way about, to pass along through Spain and Gaul; as he himself had done; and increase the Army, by hyring the Barbarians in the journey; than to commit the main strength of their City, to the hazard of the Seas: especially wanting a commodious Haven, to receive the Fleet that should carry such a number of Men, Horses, and Elephants, with all needful provisions. With these allegations Hannibal must rest content; and seek, as well as he can, to satisfy his Italian Confederates. Therefore when time of the year served, he took the field: and having finished what rested to be done at Capitulum, fought to make himself Master of some good Haven-town thereabout; that might serve to entertain the Carthaginian Fleet, or take from his Enemies at home all excuse, which they might pretend by want thereof. To the same purpose, and to do what else was needful, he sent Himilco unto the Locrians, and Hanno to the Lucans: not forgetting at once to assuage all quarters of Italy, yea, the Isles of Sicily and Sardinia, since the siege of Rome must needs be deferred unto another year. Hanno made an ill journey of it, being met, or overtaken, by T. Sempronius Longus: who slew above two thousand of his men; with the loss of fewer than three hundred Romans. But Himilco sped far better. By help of the Bruttians, his good friends, he won Petelia, or Petelia, by force; after it had held out some months. He won likewise Confinia, and Crotan, that was forsaken by the Inhabitants. Also the City of Locri, which was of great importance, yielded unto him: as did all other places thereabout; except only the Town of Rhegium, over against Sicily.

The great faith of the Petilians is worthy to be recorded, as a notable testimony of the good government, under which the Roman subjects lived. As for the Samnites, Campenes, and others, whose earneftness in rebellion may seem to prove the contrary; we are to consider, That they had lately contended, with Rome for Sovereignty, and were now transported with ambition: which reason can hardly moderate, or benefit alay. The Petilians, in the very beginning of their danger, did send to Rome for help: where their messengers received answer from the Senate, That the publick misfortunes had not left means, to relieve their Associates that were so far distant: The Petilian Messengers (Embassadors they are termed; as were all others, publicly sent from Cities of the Roman subjection, that had a private jurisdiction within themselves) fell down to the ground, and humbly besought the Fathers, not to give them away: promising to do and suffer whatsoever was possible, in defence of their Town, against the Carthaginians. Hereupon the Senate fell to consultation again: and having thoroughly considered all their forces remaining plainly confessed, that it was not in their power to give any relief. Wherefore these Embassadors were willed to return home, and to bid their Citizens provide hereafter for their own safety, as having already discharged their faith to the utmost. All this notwithstanding, the Petilians (as was said) held out some months; and having striven in vain to defend themselves, when there was no apparent possibility gave to the Carthaginians a bloody victory over them; being vanquished as much by famine, as by any violence of the Assaults.

The Romans at this time were indeed in such ill case, that Hannibal with a little help from Carthage, might have reduced them unto terms of great extremity. For whereas in a great bravery, before their loss at Canne, they had shewed their high minds, by entertaining the care of things far off, notwithstanding the great war that lay upon them so near at hand: it now fell out miserably all at once, that their fortune abroad was no whit better than at home. L. Posthumus Albinus their Prætor they had sent, with an Army of five and twenty thousand, into Gaul: to the Illyrian King Pinus they had sent for their tribute due, whereof the pay-day was past; willing him, if he desired forbearance, to deliver Hostages for his performance of what was due; and to Philip King of Macedonia they had sent, to require, that he should deliver up unto them Demetrius Pharius their Subject and Rebel, whom he had received. But now from all quarters they hear tidings, little suitable to their former glorious conceits. Posthumus with all his Army was cut in pieces by the Gauls, in such sort, that scarce ten men escaped. The manner of his overthrow was very strange. There was a great Wood, called by the Gauls, Litana; throw which he was to pass. Against his coming, the Enemies had sawed the trees so far, that a little force would serve to cast them down. When therefore Posthumus, with his whole Army, was entered into this dangerous passage; the Gauls that lay about the Wood, began to cast down the trees; which falling one against another, bore all down so fast, that the Romans were overwhelmed, Men and Horses, in such wise, that no more escaped, than is said before. How this tedious work of sawing, so many trees, could take desired effect, and neither be perceived, nor made frustrate, either by some wind that might have blown all down before the Romans entered, or by some other of those many accidents, whereto the device was subject, do not well conceive. Yet some such thing may have been done, and what failed in the stratagem, supplied with the Enemies sword. It is not perhaps worthy to be omitted, as a monument of the savage condition, wherewith Lombardie, a Country now so civil, was infected in elder times; that of Posthumus his skull, being cleaved and trimmed up with gold; a drinking cup was made, and consecrated in their principal Temple, as an holy vessel for the use of the Priest in their solemnities. Of this great overthrow, when word was brought to Rome, the amazement was no less than the calamity. But sorrow could give no remedy to the mischief; and anger was vain, where there wanted forces to revenge. Tribute from the Illyrians there came none; neither do I find that any was a second time demanded; this we find, that with Plautus, and Scordileus, Illyrian Kings as, also with Gentius, who reigned within a few years following, the Romans dealt upon even terms; entreating their assistance against Philip and Perseus; not commanding their duty, as Vassals. The Macedonian troubled them yet a little further.

For having assured his affairs in Greece, and enjoying leisure to look into the doings abroad, he sent Embassadors to Hannibal, with whom he made a league, upon these conditions; That the King in person should come into Italy, and with all his forces, by Land and Sea, assist the Carthaginians in the Roman war, until it were finished; That Rome, and all Italy, together with all the spoil therein to be gotten, should be left intire unto the State of Carthage; and that afterwards Hannibal, with his Army, should pass into Greece, and there assist Philip, until he had subdued all his enemies (which were the Atolians, Thracians, King Amicus, and others), leaving seemingly unto him the full possession of that Country, and the Isles adjoining. But such predisposition of Kingdoms and Provinces, is lightly controlled by the divine providence, which therein shews it self; not (as Herodotus falsely terms it, and like an Atheist) envious or malicious; but very just and Majestic in upholding that unspakable greatness of Sovereignty, by which it rules the whole World, and all that therein is.

The first Embassadors that Philip sent, fell into the Romans hands, in their journey towards Hannibal; and being examined what they were, adventured upon a bold lye, saying, That they were sent from the King of Macedonia to Rome, there to make a League with the Senate and people, and offer his help in this time of great necessity. These news were so welcome, that the joy thereof took away all care of making better inquiry. So they were lovingly feasted, and freely dismissed with guides, that should lead them the way; and shew them how to avoid the Carthaginians. But they being thus instructed concerning their journey, fell willfully into the Camp of Hannibal; who entertained them after a better fashion, and concluded the business about which they came, upon the points before remembered. In their return homeward, they happened again unluckily to be deceived by the Roman Fleet; which mistrusting them to be of the Carthaginian party, gave them chase. They did their best to have escaped; but being overtaken, they suffered the Romans to come shoords and trossing to the lye that once had served them, said it again. That having been sent from King Philip to make a league with the people of Rome, they were notable by reason of the Carthaginians lying between, to get any further than to M. Valerius the Prætor, unto whom they had signified the good affection of the King, their Master. The tale was now less credible than before:

before: and (which marred all) Gesco, Postar, and Magi, with their followers, Carthaginians, that were sent with them from Hannibal to ratifie the agreement, being presently detected, made the matter apparent. Wherefore a little inquisition served to find all out: so that at length Hannibal's own letters to King Philip were delivered up, and the whole business confected. The Embassadors and their followers were sent close prisoners to Rome; where the chief of them were cast into prison, and the rest sold for bond-slaves. Yet one of their ships that escaped, carried word into Macedonia of all that had happened. Whereupon new Embassage was sent, that went and returned with better speed; concluding, as was agreed before, only with some loss of time.

The Romans were exceedingly perplexed; thinking with what heavy weight this Macedonian war, in an evil hour, was likely to fall upon them, when their shoulders were over-burdened with the load of the Carthaginian. Yet they took a noble resolution, and suitable unto that, whereby they kept off the storm, that else would have beaten upon them from Spain. They judged it more easie with small force to detain Philip in Greece, than with all their strength to rebuff him in Italy. And herein they were in the right; for that the very reputation of a King of Macedonia, joining with Hannibal in such a time, would have sufficed to shake the allegiance, not only of the Latines, and other, their most faithful Subjects, but even of the Roman Colonies, that held all privileges of the City. It will appear by the following success of things, M. Valerius the Prætor, with twenty Quinguereme Gallies, was appointed to stand upon the Macedonian, and to set on foot some commotion in Greece; or to quench the troubles already therein begun. Philip was busie about the Sea Towns, that looked towards Italy, setting upon Apollonia, and thence falling upon Oricum, which he won, and so returned to Apollonia again. The Epikori craved help of M. Valerius, or rather, excepted his kind offers; who had upon other business to do. The Garrison that Philip had left in Oricum, was strong enough to hold the Towns men in good order, but not to keep out the Romans; of whose party to attempt any thing against him, on that side the Sea, Philip as then had no suspition. Valerius therefore easily regained the Town, and sent thence a thousand men, under Neuvius Crispus, an undertaking and expert Captain, which got by night into Apollonia. These made a notable fall, and brake into Philip's Trenches with so great slaughter, that they forced him to forsake his Camp, and raise the siege. The King purposed (as it is said) to have departed thence by Sea; but Valerius, coming with his Fleet from Oricum, stopped up the mouth of the River, so that he was fain to burn his ships (which belike were no better than long boats) and depart ill furnished of carriages by Land. After this Valerius dealt with the Atolians, a Nation alwaies enemy to the Crown of Macedonia; and easily persuaded them (being so affected, as hath else where been shewed) to make strong war on Philip; wherein he promised them great assistance from the Romans. That which most moved the troublesome spirits of the Atolians, was the hope of getting Acarnania; after which they had gaped long, and whereof the Roman was as liberal in making promise, as if already it had been his own. So a league was made between them; and afterward solemnly published at Olympia, by the Atolians, and by the Romans in their Capitol. The conditions were, that from Atolia to Coreyra, in which space Acarnania was contained, all the Country should be subdued, and left unto the Atolians, the pillage only to be given to the Romans. And that if the Atolians made peace with Philip, it should be with Provision, to hold no longer than whilst he abstained from doing injury to the Romans, or their Associates. This was indeed the only point whereto Valerius aimed, who promised as much on the Romans behalf, That they should not make peace with the Macedonian, unless it were with like condition of including the Atolians. Into this league was place reserved for the Dacemonians and Eleanians; as to those that had made or favoured the side of Cleomenes against the Macedonian, to enter at their pleasure. The like regard was had of Attalus, Plautus, and Scordileus; the first of which reigned at Pergamus in Asia the less, a Prince hereafter much to be spoken of; the other two held some part of Illyria, about which the Romans were so far from contending with them, that gladly they sought to get their friendly acquaintance. But the names of these Associates are thrust into the Treaty, rather to give it countenance, than for any readines which they did close to enter therein. The Atolians alone, and chiefly Scopas their Prætor, with Dorymachus and others, are yet a while the only men, of whom the Roman Generals must make much; as the late French King, Henry the fourth, when he had only the title of Navarre, was said to court the Majors of Rochel. Philip was not idle, when he heard whereunto whereunto the Ætolian tended. He repaired his Army, made a countenance of war upon the Illyrians, and other his borderers, that were wont in times of danger to infect the Kingdom of Macedon; waited the Country about Oricum and Apollonia, and overrunning the Pelagonians, Dardanians, and others, whom he held suspected, came down into Thessaly, whence he made shew as if he would invade Ætolia. By the same of this Expedition, he thought to stir up all the Greeks adjoining, against the Ætolians; whom they generally detested as a nest of Robbers, troublesome to all the Country. To which purpose, and to hinder the Ætolians from breaking into Greece, he left Perseus, his Son and Heir, with four thousand men, upon their borders: with the rest of his Army, before greater business should overtake and entangle him, he made a long journey into Thrace, against a people called the Mædes, that were wont to fall upon Macedon, whenever the King was absent. The Ætolians hearing of his departure, armed as many as they could against the Acarnanians; in hope to subdue those their daily enemies, and win their little Country, ere he should be able to return. Hereto it much availed, that the Romans had already taken Kenjade and Naxos, Acarnanian Towns, conveniently situated to let in an Army; and consigned them unto the Ætolians, according to the tenour of the contract lately made with them. But the stout resolution of the Acarnanians to die (as we say) every Mothers Son of them, in defence of their Country; together with the great haste of the Macedonian (who laid aside all other business) to succour these his friends, caused the Ætolians to forsake their enterprise. When this Expedition was given over, the Romans and Ætolians fell upon Ancyra, which they took: the Romans assailed by Sea, the Ætolians by Land. The Ætolians had the Town, and the Romans the spoil.

For these good services M. Valerius was chosen Consul at Rome; and P. Sulpicius sent in his stead, to keep the war on foot in Greece. But besides the Roman help, Attalus out of Asia came over to assist the Ætolians. He was chiefly moved by his own jealousy of Philip's greatness; though somewhat also tickled with the vanity of being chosen by the Ætolians their principal Magistrate; which honour, though no better than titular, he took in very loving part. Against the forces which Attalus and the Romans had sent, being joyned with the main power of Ætolia, Philip tried the fortune of two battels; and was victorious in each of them.

Hereupon, these his troublesome neighbours desired peace of him; and used their best means to get it. And when the day appointed for the conclusion therefore, was come; their Embassadors, in stead of making submission, proposed unto him such intolerable conditions, as ill befitted vanquished men to offer; and might therefore well justify, that their minds were altered. It was not any love of peace, but fear of being besieged in their own Towns, that had made them desirous of composition. This fear being taken away, by the encouragements of Attalus and the Romans; they were as fierce as ever; and thrust a Garrison of their own, and some Roman friends into Elis; which threatened Acchaia, whereto Philip then lay. The Romans, making a cut over the straight from Naupactus, waited the Country in a terrible bravery; wherein Philip required him, coming upon them in great haste from the Nemean Games (which he was then celebrating) and sending them faster away, but nothing richer than they came.

In the heat of this contention, Præsus King of Bithynia, fearing the growth of Attalus, no less than Attalus held suspected the power of Philip, sent a Navy into Greece, to assist the Macedonian party. The like did the Carthaginians; and upon greater reason; as being more interested in the success of his affairs. Philip was too weak by Sea; and though he could man some two hundred ships, yet the vessels were such, as could not hold out against the Romans Quinquaginta. Wherefore, it behoved him to use the help of his good friends the Carthaginians. But their aid came somewhat too late; which might better at first have kept those Enemies from fastening upon any part of Greece, than afterward it could serve to drive them out, when they had pierced into the bowels of that Country. Elis Philip could attempt any thing by Sea; it was needful that he should correct the Ætolians; bad neighbours to the Acchaians his principal Confederates. But in assailing their Town, he was encountered by the Ætolian and Roman Garrison, which drove him back with some loss. In such cases, especially where God intendeth a great conversion of Empire, Fame is very powerful in working. The King had received no great detriment in his retreat from Elis; rather he had given testimony of his personal valour, in fighting well on foot, when his horse was slain under him: He had also soon after taken a great multitude of the Eleans, to the number of four thousand, with some twenty thousand head of Cattel, which they had brought together in a place of safety as they thought, when their Country was invaded. But it had hapned, that in his pursuit of the Romans forragers about Sicyon, his horse running hastily under a low tree, had torn off one of the horns, which (after the fashion of those times) the King wore in his Crest. This was gathered up by an Ætolian, who carried it home, and shewed it as a token of Philip's death. The horn was well known, and the tale believed. All Macedon therefore was in an uproar; and not only the borderers, ready to fall upon the Country, but some Captains of Philip easily corrupted; who thinking to make themselves a fortune in that change of things, ran into such treason, as they might better hope to make good, than to excuse. Hereupon the King returned home, leaving not three thousand men to assist his friends the Acchaians. He also took order, to have beacons erected, that might give him notice of the enemies doings, upon whom he meant shortly to return. The affairs of Macedon, his presence quickly established. But in Greece all went ill-favourably; especially in the title of Eubæa, where one Plator betrayed to Attalus and the Romans, the Town of Oricum, ere Philip could arrive to help it: where also the strong City of Chalcis was likely to have been lost, if he had not come the sooner. He made such hasty marches, that he had almost taken Attalus in the City of Opus; this City, lying over against Eubæa, Attalus had won more through the cowardize of the people, than any great force that he had used: now because the Roman Souldiers had defrauded him in the sack of Oreum, and taken all to themselves; it was agreed, that Attalus should make his best profit of the Opuntians, without admitting the Romans to be his sharers. But whilst he was busied, in drawing as much money as he could out of the Citizens: the sudden tidings of Philip's arrival, made him leave all behind him, and run away to the Sea-side, where he got aboard his ships, finding the Romans gone before, upon the like fear. Either the indignity of this misadventure, or tidings of Præsus to Bithynia his invasion upon the Kingdom of Pergamus; made Attalus return home, without staying to take leave of his friends. So Philip recovered Opus, won Torone, Tritonæ, Drynus, and many small Towns in those parts; performing likewise some actions, of more bravery than importance, against the Ætolians. In the mean season, Machinidas, the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, had been busied in Peloponnesus; but hearing of Philip's arrival, was returned home.

The Lacedæmonians, hearing certain report of Cleomenes his death in Egypt, went about to chuse two new Kings, and to conform themselves to their old manner of government. But their estate was so far out of tune, that their hope of redressing things within the City, proved no less unfortunate, than had been their attempts of recovering a large dominion abroad. Lycargus a Tyrant rose up among them: upon whom succeeded this Machinidas, and shortly after came Nabis, that was worse than both of them. They held on the Ætolian and Roman side, for fear of the Acchaians, that were the chief Confederates of Philip, and hated extremely the name both of Tyrant and Lacedæmonian. But of these we shall speak more hereafter.

Philip entering into Acchaia, and seeing his presence had brought the contentment of assurance to that Country; spake brave words to the Assembly of their States, saying, That he had to do with an Enemy that was very nimble, and made War by running away. He told how he had followed them to Chalcis, to Oreum, to Opus, and now into Acchaia; but could no where find them, such haste they made, for fear of being overtaken. But flight, he said, was not always prosperous: he should one day light upon them; as ere this he sundry times had done, and still to their loss. The Acchaians were glad to hear these words; and much the more glad, in regard of his good deeds accompanying them. For he restored unto their Nation some Towns that were in his hand, belonging to them of old. Likewise to the Megalopolitans their confederates, he rendered Alipheræ. The Dymæans, that had been taken by the Romans, and sold for slaves, he fought out, ransomed, and put in quiet possession of their own City. Further, passing over the Corinthian Gulf, he fell upon the Ætolians; whom he drove into the mountains and woods, or other their strongest holds, and wasted their Country. This done, he took leave of the Acchaians, and returned home by Sea, visited the people that were his subjects, or dependants; and animated them so well, that they rested fearless of any threatening danger. Then had he leisure to make war upon the Dardanians, ill neighbours to Macedon: with whom nevertheless he was not so far occupied, but that he could go in hand with preparing a Fleet of an hundred Gallies, whereby to make himself Master of the Sea; the Romans (since the departure of Attalus) having not dared to meet or pursue him, when he lately ran along the coast coast of Greece, fast by them where they lay.

This good success added much reputation to the Macedonian, and emboldened him to make strong war upon the Ætoliens, at their own doors. As for the Romans either some displeasure, conceived against their Confederates, or some fear of danger at home, when Adrius was ready to fall upon Italy; caused them to give over the care of things in Greece, and leave their friends there to their own fortunes. The Ætoliens therefore being driven to great extremity; were fain to sue for peace unto Philip, and accept it, upon what ever conditions it best pleased him. The agreement was no sooner made, than P. Sempronius with ten thousand foot, a thousand horse, and thirty five galleys, came over in great haste (though somewhat too late) to trouble it. Hearing how things went in Ætolia, he turned aside to Dyrrhacchium and Apollonia, making a great noise, as if with these his own forces he would work wonders. But it was not long ere Philip came to visit him, and found him tame enough. The King presented him battle, but he refused it: and suffering the Macedonians to waste the Country round about, before his eyes, kept himself close within the walls of Apollonia, making some overtures of peace: which caused Philip to return home quietly. The Romans had not forgot cause to be displeased with the Ætoliens, as had Philip to take in evil part the demeanor of the Carthaginians. For notwithstanding the royal offer that he made them, to serve their turn in Italy, and assist them, in getting their hearts desire, before he would expect any requital: they had not sent any fleet, as in reason they ought, and as (considering his want of sufficient ability by Sea) it is likely they were bound either to secure the transportation of his Army, or to free his coast from the Roman and Ætolian Piracies. Only once they came to his help, which was at his last journey into Acchia. But they were gone again before his arrival: having done nothing, and pretending fear of being taken by the Romans, even at such time as Philip with his own Navy, durst boldly pass by Sea, and found none that durst oppose him. This wretched dealing of the Carthaginians, may therefore seem to have been one of Hanno's tricks, whereof Hannibal so bitterly complained. For it could not but grieve this malicious man exceedingly to hear that so great a King made offer to serve in person under Hannibal, and required the assistance of the same Hannibal, as of a man likely to make Monarchs, and alter the affairs of the world at pleasure. Therefore he had reason, such as envy could suggest, to persuade the Carthaginians unto a safe and thrifty course; which was, not to admit into the fellowship of their Italian wars so mighty a Prince; whom change of affection might make dangerous to their Empire; or his much affection unto Hannibal, more dangerous to their liberty. Rather they should do well to save charges, and feed the Macedonian with hopes; by making many promises of sending a fleet and some other succours. This would cost nothing, yet would it serve to terrify the Romans, and compell them to send part of their forces from home, that might find this Enemy work abroad. So should the Roman Armies be lessened in Italy; and Philip, when once he was engaged in the war, be urged unto the prosecution, by his own necessity: putting the Carthaginians to little or no charges: yea, scarce to the labour of giving him thanks. Now if it might come to pass, as Hannibal every day did promise, that Rome, and all Italy should within a while be at the devotion of Carthage: better it were, that the City should be free, so as the troublesome Greeks might address their complaints unto the Carthaginians, as competent Judges between them and the Macedonian, than that Hannibal, with the power of Asiack, should wait upon Philip, as his Executioner, to fulfill his will and pleasure, in doing such injuries, as would both make the name of a Carthaginian hateful in Greece, and oblige Philip to be no less impudent, in fulfilling all requests of Hannibal. Whether the counsel of Hanno and his fellows were such as this, or whether the Carthaginians, of their own disposition, without his advice, were too sparing, and careless, the matter (as far as concerned Philip) came to one reckoning. For they did him no manner of good, but rather dodged with him, even in their little courtship which they most pretended. And this perhaps was part of the reason, why he began the building of an hundred Gallies, as if he would let them and others know, where to his proper strength would have reached, had he not vainly given credit to faithless promises. When therefore the Ætoliens had submitted themselves already: and when the Romans desired his friendship, as might be thought, for very fear of him, with reputation enough, and not as a forsaken Client of the Carthaginians, but a Prince able to have succoured them in their necessity, he might give over the war, and, without reprehension, leave them to themselves. For he had willfully entred into trouble for their

fakes but they despised him, as if the quarrel were merely his own, and he unable to manage it.

The vanity of which their conceits would appear unto them, when they should see, that with his proper strength he had finished the War, and concluded it highly to his honour. So the year following it was agreed, by the mediation of the Epirots, Acarnanians, and others, That the Romans should retain three or four Towns of Illyria, which they had recovered by this War, being part of their old Illyrian Conquest: Places now way belonging to the Macedonians; and therefore perhaps inserted into the Covenants, that somewhat might seem to have been gotten. On the other side, the Atintans were appointed to return under the obedience of Philip: who, if they were (as Ortelius probably conjectures) the people of the Country about Apollonia, then did the Romans abandon part of their gettings; whereby it appears, that they did not give peace, as they would seem to have done, but accepted it, upon conditions somewhat to their loss.

The Confederates and Dependants of the Macedonian, comprehended in this Peace, were Phryas King of Bitynia, the Acchaens, Bethians, Thessalians, Acarnanians and Epirots. On the Roman side were named, first, the people of Ilium, as an honourable remembrance of the Romans descent from Troy; then, Attalus King of Pergamus; Plueratus an Illyrian Prince; and Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedemon; together with the Eleans, Messenians and Athenians. The Ætoliens were omitted, belike, as having agreed for themselves before. But the Eleans and Messenians, followers of the Ætoliens, (and by them, as is most likely, comprised in their league with Philip) were also inserted by the Romans; that were never slow in offering their friendship to small and feeble Nations. As for the Athenians; they stood much upon their old honour; and loved to bear a part, though they did nothing, in all great actions. Yet the setting down of their names in this Treaty, served the Romans to good purpose: forasmuch as they were a busy people, and ministred occasion to renew the War, when means did better serve to follow it.

§. XIII.

How the Romans began to recover their strength by degrees. The noble affliction of the Romans, in relieving the publick necessities of their Common-weal.

It was a great fault in the Carthaginians, that embracing so many enterprises at once, they followed all by the halves; and wasted more men and money to no purpose, than would have served (if good order had been taken) to finish the whole War, in far shorter space; and make themselves Lords of all that the Romans held. This error had become the less harmful, if their care of Italy had been fought as it ought. But they suffered Hannibal to weary himself with expectation of their promised supplies; which being still preferred from year to year, caused as great opportunities to be lost, as a Conquerour could have desired. The death of Posthumius, and destruction of this whole Army in Gaul; the begun rebellion of the Sardinians; the death of Hiero their friend in Syracuse; with great alterations much to their prejudice, in the whole Isle of Sicily; as also that War, of which we last spoke threatened from Macedon, happening all at one time; and that so nearly after their terrible overthrow at Cannæ, among so many revolts of their Italian Confederates; would utterly have sunk the Roman State; had the Carthaginians, if not the first year, yet at least the second, sent over to Hannibal the forces that was decreed. It is not to be doubted, that even this diversity of great hopes, appearing from all parts, admitted matter unto Hanno, or such as Hanno was, whereupon to work. For though it were in the power of Carthage, to perform all that was decreed for Italy; yet could not that prohibition hold, when so many new occurrences brought each along with them their new care; and required their several Armies. This had not been a very bad excuse, if any one of the many occasions offered had been thoroughly prosecuted: though it stood with best reason, that the foundation of all other hopes and comforts, which was the prosperity of Hannibal in his Italian war, should have been strengthened; whatsoever had become of the rest. But the slender Troops, wherewith the Carthaginians fed the War in Spain; the lingering aid which they sent to uphold the Sardinian rebellion, when it was already well-near beaten down; their trifling with Philip; and (amongst all these their attempts) their halcy catching at Sicily: little deserved to be thought good reasons of neglect.

ting the main point, whereto all the rest had reference. Rather every one of these Actions, considered a part by it self, was no otherwise to be allowed, as discreetly undertaken, or substantially followed; than by making supposition, That the care of Italy made the Carthaginians more negligent in all things else. Yet if these allegations would not serve to content Hannibal, then must he patiently endure to know, that his own Citizens were jealous of his Greatness, and durst not trust him with so much power, as should enable him to wrong the state at home.

Whatsoever he heard or thought, Hannibal was glad to apply himself to Necessity to feed his Italian friends with hopes; and to trifle away the time about Nola, Naples, Cuma, and other places: being loth to spend his Army in an hard siege, that was to be referred for a work of more importance. Many offers he made upon Nola, but always with bad success. Once Marcellus fought a battle with him there, yet under the very walls of the Town; having the assistance of the Citizens, that were grown better affected to the Roman side, since the Heads that inclined them to rebellion, were cut off. About a thousand men Hannibal in that fight lost: which was no great marvel; his forces being then divided, and employed in sundry parts of Italy at once. Naples was even in those days, a strong City; and required a years work to have taken it by force. Wherefore the earnest desire of Hannibal to get it, was always frustrate. Upon the Town of Cumæ they of Capua had their plot, and were in hope to take it by cunning. They lent to the chief Magistrates of the Cumans, desiring them (as being also Capuans) to be present at a solemn sacrifice of the Nation, where they would consult about their general good: promising to bring thither a sufficient guard, to assure the whole Assembly from any danger that might come by the Romans. This motion the Cumans made flew to entertain; but privily sent word of all to T. Sempronius Gracchus, the Roman Consul.

Gracchus was a very good man of war, and happily chosen Consul in so dangerous a time. His Colleague should have been Posthumus Albinus, that was lately slain by the Gauls: after whose death Marcellus was chosen, as being judged the fittest man to encounter with Hannibal. But the Roman Augures either found some religious impediment that nullified the election of Marcellus; or at least they failed so to have done, because this was the first time, that ever two Plæbian Consuls were chosen together.

Marcellus therefore gave over the place; and Q. Fabius Maximus, the late famous Dictator, was substituted in his room. But Fabius was detained in the City, about matters of religion or superstition: wherewith Rome was commonly, especially in times of danger, very much troubled. So Gracchus alone, with a Consular Army, waited upon Hannibal among the Campani: not able to meet the enemy in field; yet intente to all occasions, that should be presented. The Volunters, or Slaves, that lately had been armed, were no small part of his followers: These, and the rest of his men, he continually trained; and had not a greater care to make his Army skilful in the exercises of war, than to keep it from quarrels that might arise by upbraiding one another with their base conditions.

Whilst the Consul was thus busied at Liternum, the Senators of Cumæ sent him word of all that had passed between them and the Capuans. It was a good occasion to flesh his men, and make them confident against the Enemy; of whom hitherto they had bad experience. Gracchus therefore put himself into Cumæ: whence he issued at such time, as the Magistrates of that City were expected by the Capuans. The Sacrifice was to be performed by night, at a place called Hæma: three miles from Cumæ. There lay Marius Alfinus the chief Magistrate of Græna, with fourteen thousand men; but wholly intent either to the Sacrifice, or to any danger that might interrupt it; but rather devising how to surprize others, than fearing himself to be assailed. The Consul therefore, suffering none to go forth of Cumæ, that might bear word of him to the enemies, issued out of the Town when it grew dark; his men being well refreshed with meat and sleep, the day before, that they might hold out the better in this nights service. So he came upon the Capuans unawares, and slew more than two thousand of them, together with their Commander, losing not above a hundred of his own men. Their Camp he took; but tarried not long to rife it, for fear of Hannibal, who lay not far off. By this his providence, he escaped a greater loss, than he had brought upon the Enemies: For when Hannibal was informed how things went at Hæma, forthwith he marched thither, hoping to find those young souldiers, and slaves, busied in making spoil, and loading themselves with the booty. But they were all gotten safe within Cumæ; which partly for anger, partly for desire of gaining it, and partly at the urgent entreaty of the Capuans, Hannibal assailed the

the next day. Much labour, and with ill success, the Carthaginians and their fellows spent about this town. They raised a wooden Tower against it; which they brought close unto the walls; thinking thereby to force an Entry. But the Defendants, on the inside of the wall, raised against this an high Tower; whence they made resistance, and found means at length to consume with fire the work of their Enemies. While the Carthaginians were busied in quenching the fire, the Romans, sallying out of the Town at two gates, charged them valiantly, and drove them to their Trenches, with the slaughter of about fourteen hundred. The Consul wisely founded the Retreat, ere his men were too far engaged, and Hannibal in a readines to requite their service. Neither would he in the pride of his good success, adventure forth against the Enemy; who presented him battle the day following, near unto the walls. Hannibal therefore seeing no likelihood to prevail in that which he had taken in hand, brake up the siege, and returned to his old camp at Tifata. About these times, and shortly after, when Fabius the other Consul had taken the field; some small Towns were recovered by the Romans, and the people severely punished for their revolt.

The Carthaginian Army was too small, to fill with garrisons all places that had yielded; and withall to abide (as it must do) strong in the field. Wherefore Hannibal, attending the supply from home, that should enable him to strike at Rome it self, was driven in the mean time to alter his course of war: and instead of making (as formerly he had done) a general invasion upon the whole Countrey, to pass from place to place; and wait upon occasions, that grew daily more commodious to the enemy, than to him. The Countrey of the Hirpines and Sannites was grievously wasted by Marcellus, in the absence of Hannibal; as also was Campania, by Fabius the Consul; when Hannibal having followed Marcellus to Nola, and received there the loss before mentioned, was gone to winter in Apulia. These people shewed not the like spirit in defending their lands, and fighting for the Carthaginian Empire, as in former times they had done, when they contended with the Romans, in their own behalf, to get the Sovereignty. They held it reason, that they should be protected by such as thought to have dominion over them: whereby at once they overburdened their new Lords; and gave unto their old, the more easie means to take revenge of their defection.

The people of Rome were very intente; as necessity constrained them, to the work that they had in hand. They continued Fabius in his Consulship; and joined with him Marcus Claudius Marcellus; whom they had appointed unto that honour the year before. Of these two, Fabius was called the Shield; and Marcellus, the Roman Sword. In Fabius it was highly, and upon just reason; commended, That being himself Consul, and holding the Election, he did not stand upon nice points of formality; or regard what men might think of his ambition, but caused himself to be chosen with Marcellus; knowing in what need the City stood of able Commanders. The great name of these Consuls, and the great preparations which the Romans made, served to put the Capuans in fear, that Capua it self should be besieged. To prevent this, Hannibal, at their earnest entreaty, came from Arpi (where he lay, hearkening after news from Tarentum) and having with his presence comforted these his friends, fell on the sudden upon Puteoli, a Sea-town of Campania; about which he spent three days in vain, hoping to have won it. The garrison in Puteoli was six thousand strong: and did their duty so well, that the Carthaginian, finding no hope of good success, could only fiew his anger upon the fields there, and about Naples; which having done, and once more (with as ill success as before) assailed Nola, he bent his course to Tarentum: wherein he had very great intelligence. Whilst he was in his progress thither, Hanno made a journey against Beneventum: and T. Gracchus, the last years Consul, hasting from Nuceris, met him there; and fought with him a battle. Hanno had with him about seventeen thousand foot, Bruttians and Lucans for the most part: besides twelve hundred horses; very few of which were Italians, all the rest Numidians and Moors. He held the Romans work four hours, ere it could be perceived to which side the victory would incline. But Gracchus his souldiers, which were all (in a manner) the late-armed slaves, had received from their General a peremptory denunciation, That this day or never they must purchase their liberty, bringing every man for price thereof, an enemies head. The sweet reward of liberty was so greatly desired, that none of them feared any danger in earning it: howbeit that vain labour imposed by their General, of cutting off the slain enemies heads, troubled them exceedingly; and hindred the service by employment of so many hands in a work so little concerning the victory. Gracchus therefore finding his own error, wisely corrected it: proclaiming aloud, That they should cast away the heads, and spare the trouble of cutting off any more; for that all should have liberty immediately after the battle, if they won the day. This encouragement made them run head-long upon the Enemy; whom their desperate fury had soon overthrown, if the Roman-horse could have made their part good against the Nimidian. But though Hanno did what he could, and pressed so hard upon the Romans battle, that four thousand of the slaves, (so fear either of them, or of the punishment which Gracchus had threatened before the battle unto those that should not valiantly behave themselves) retired unto a ground of strength; yet was he glad at length to save himself by flight, when the Galls of his Army was broken; being unable to remedy the loss. Leaving the field, he was accompanied by no more than two thousand, most of which were horse; all the rest were either slain or taken. The Roman General gave unto all his Souldiers that reward of liberty, which he had promised: but unto those four thousand, which had recoyled unto the Hill, he added this light punishment. That as long as they served in the wars, they should neither eat nor drink otherwise than standing, unless sickness forced them to break his order. So the victorious Army returned to Beneventum: where the newly enfranchised Souldiers were feasted in publick by the Townsmen; some sitting, some standing, and all of them having their heads covered (as was the custom of slaves manifested) with caps of white wooll. The picture of this Feast (as a thing worthy of remembrance) was afterwards hung up in a Table by Gracchus, in the Temple of Liberty; which his Father had built and dedicated. This was indeed the first battle, worthy of great note, which the Carthaginians had lost since the coming of Hannibal into Italy: the victories of Marcellus at Nola, and of this Gracchus before at Hanno, being things of small importance.

Thus the Romans, through industry, by little and little, repaired the great Breach in their Estate, which Hannibal had made at Cannæ. But all this while, and long after this, their Treasury was so poor, that no industry nor art could serve to help it. The fruits of their grounds did only (and perhaps hardly) serve to feed their Towns and Armies, without any surplusage, that might be exchanged for other needful commodities. Few they were in Italy that continued to pay them tribute: which all they could worke do than before; as living upon the same trade, and subject to the same inconveniences, which enfeebled Rome it self. Sicil and Sardinia, that were wont to yield great profit, hardly now maintaining the Roman Armies, that lay in those Provinces, to hold them safe, and in good order. As for the Citizens of Rome, every one of them suffered his part of the detriment: which the Common-wealth sustained, and could now do least for his Country, when most need was: as also, the number of them was much decreased; so as if money should be raised upon them by the Poll, yet must it be far less than in former times. The Senate therefore diligently considering the greatness of the war within the bowels of Italy, that could not be hence expelled, without the exceeding charge of many good Armies; the peril, wherein Sicil and Sardinia stood; both of the Carthaginians, and of many among the Naturals, declining from the friendship or subjection of Rome; the threats of the Adandonians, ready to land in the Eastern parts of Italy, if they were not at the cost to find him work at home; the greater threats of Astruc, to follow his Brother over the Alps, as soon as he could rid himself of the Scipio's in Spain; and the poverty of the Common-wealth, which had not money for any one of these mortal dangers; were driven almost even to extremum want of counsel. But being urged by the violence of swift necessity, signified in the letters of the two Scipio's from Spain; they resolved upon the only course, without the which the City could not have subsisted.

They called the people to assembly; wherein Quintus Fulvius the Prætor laid open the publick wants; and plainly said, That in this exigent, there must be no taking of money for victuals, weapons, apparel, or the like things needful to the Souldiers; but that such as had stuff, or were Artificers, must trust the Common-wealth with the Loan of their commodities and labors, until the war were ended. Hereunto he so effectually exhorted all men, especially the Publicans or Customers, and those which in former times had lived upon their dealing in the common Revenues, that the charge was undertaken by private men; and the Army in Spain, as well supplied, as if the Treasury had been full. Shortly after this, Marcus Attilius Regulus, and Publius Furius Philus, the Roman Censors; taking in hand the redress of disorders within the City, were chiefly intente to the correction of those, that had mis-behaved themselves in this present war. They began with L. Cecilius Metellus;

Metellus; who after the battle at Cannæ, had held discourse with some of his Companions, about flying beyond the Seas; as if Rome, and all Italy, had been no better than lost. After him they took in hand those, that having brought to Rome the message of their fellows made prisoners at Cannæ, returned not back to Hannibal, as they were bound by oath; but thought themselves thereof sufficiently discharged, in that they had stepped once back into his Camp, with pretence of taking better notice of the Captives names. All these were now pronounced infamous by the Censors: as also were a great many more; even whosoever had not served in the wars, after the term which the Laws appointed: Neither was the note of the Censors at this time (as otherwise it had used to be) hurtful only in reputation; but greater weight was added thereunto, by this Decree of the Senate, following; That all such as were noted with infamy by these Censors, should be transported into Sicil, there to serve until the end of the War, under the same hard conditions, that were imposed upon the Remainder of the Army beaten at Cannæ. The office of the Censors was, to take the List and account of the Citizens; to chuse or displace the Senators; and to set notes of disgrace (without further punishment) upon those whose unhoneest or unseemly behaviour fell not within the compass of the Law. They took also an account of the Roman Gentlemen: amongst whom they distributed the publick Horles of service, unto such as they thought meet; or took them away for their mis-behaviour. Generally, they had the oversight of mens lives and manners: and their censure was much revered and feared; though it extended no further, than to putting men out of rank; or making them change their Tribe; or (which was the most that they could do) causing them to pay some Duties to the Treasury, from which others were exempted. But, besides the care of this general Tax, and matters of Morality, they had the charge of all publick Works; as mending of High-ways, Bridges, and Water-courses; the reparations of Temples, Porches, and such other buildings. If any man incroached upon the Streets, High-ways, or other places that ought to be common; the Censors compelled him to make amends. They had also the letting out of Lands, Customs, and other publick Revenues to farm: so that most of the Citizens of Rome were beholding unto this office; as maintaining themselves by some of the Trades thereto belonging. And this was no small help to conserve the dignity of the Senate: the commonalty being obnoxious unto the Censors; which were alwayes of that Order, and careful to uphold the reputation thereof. But the Common-wealth being now impoverished by War, and having small store of Lands to lett, or of Customs that were worth the farming; Regulus and Philus troubled not themselves much with perusing the Temples, or other decayed places, that needed reparations: or if they took a view of what was requisite to be done in this kind; yet forbore they to set any thing in hand, because they had not wherewith to pay. Herein again appeared a notable generosity of the Romans. They that had been accustomed in more happy times, to undertake such pieces of work, offered now themselves as willingly as the Censors, as if there had been no such want: promising liberally their cost and travel; without expectation of any payment, before the end of the War. In like sort, the Masters of those slaves, that lately had been enfranchised by Gracchus, were very well contented to forbear the price of them, until the City were in better case to pay. In this general inclination of the Multitude, to relieve, as far forth as every one was able, the common necessity; all the goods of Orphans, and of Widows living under Patronage, were brought into the Treasury; and there the Questor kept a Book of all that was laid out for the sustentance of these Widows and Orphans: whilst the whole stock was used by the City. This good example of those which remained in the Town, prevailed with the Souldiers abroad: so that (the poorer sort excepted) they refused to take pay; and called those Mercenaries, that did accept it, when their Country was in so great want.

The twelve hundred Talents wrongfully extorted from the Carthaginians; nor any injuries following, done by the Romans in the height of their pride, yielded half so much commodity, as might be laid in balance against these miseries, whereto their Estate was now reduced. Nevertheless if we consider things aright, the calamities of this War did rather inable Rome to deal with those Enemies, whom she forthwith undertook, than abate or slacken the growth of that large Dominion, whereto she attained, ere the youngest of those men was dead, whose names we have already mentioned. For by this hammering, the Roman metal grew more hard and solid: and by paring the branches of private fortunes, the Root and Heart of the Common-wealth was corroborated. So grew the City of Athenz, when

when Xerxes had burnt the Town to ashes, and taken from every particular Citizen, all hope of other felicity, than that which rested in the common happiness of the universality. Certain it is, (as Sir Francis Bacon hath judiciously observed) That a State, whose dimension or stem is small, may aptly serve to be foundation of a great Monarchy, which chiefly comes to pass, where all regard of domestic prosperity is laid aside; and every mans care addressed to the benefit of his Country. Hereof I might say that our Age hath been a great example, in the united Provinces in the Netherlands; whose present riches and strength grew chiefly from that ill assurance, which each of their Towns, or almost of their Families, perceived it self to hold, whilst the generality was oppressed by the Duke of Alva; were it so, that the people had thereby grown as warlike, as, by extreme industry, and straining themselves to fill their publick Treasury, they are all grown wealthy, strong at Sea, and able to wage great Armies for their services by Land. Wherefore if we value at such a rate as we ought, the patient resolution, conformity to good Order, obedience to Magistrates, with many other Vertues, and above all other, the great love of the Commonwealth, which was found in Rome in these dangerous times: we may truly say, That the City was never in greater likelihood to prosper. Neither can it be deemed otherwise, than that if the same affections of the people had lasted, when their Empire, being grown more large and beautiful, should in all reason have been more dear unto them; if the riches and delicacies of Affio had not infected them with sensuality, and carried their appetites mainly to those pleasures, wherein they thought their well-being to consist; if all the Citizens and Subjects of Rome could have believed their own interest to be as great, in those wars which these latter Emperours made for their defence, as in these which were managed by the Consuls: the Empire, founded upon so great virtue, could not have been thrown down by the hands of rude Barbarians, were they never so many. But unto all Dominions God hath set their periods: Who, though he hath given unto Man the knowledge of those ways, by which Kingdoms rise and fall; yet hath left him subject unto the affections, which draw on these fatal changes, in their times appointed.

§. XIV.

The Romans win some Towns back from Hannibal. Hannibal wins Tarentum. The siege of Capua. Two Victories of Hannibal. The journey of Hannibal to the gates of Rome. Capua taken by the Romans.

AS the people of Rome strained themselves to the utmost, for maintaining the War: so their Generals abroad omitted no part of industry, in seeking to recover what had been lost. The Town of Cassine, Fabius besieged. It was well defended by the Carthaginian Garrison; and likely to have been relieved by those of Capua, if Marcellus from Nola, had not come to the assistance of his Colleague. Nevertheless, the place held out so obstinately, that Fabius was purposed to give it over: saying, that the enterprise was not great; yet as difficult, as a thing of more importance. But Marcellus was of a contrary opinion. He said, that many such things, as were not at first to have been undertaken by great Commanders, ought yet, when once they were taken in hand, to be prosecuted unto the best effect. So the siege held on: and the Town was pressed so hard, that the Campani dwelling therein, grew fearful, and craved parley; offering to give it up, so as all might have leave to depart in safety, whither they pleased. Whilst they were thus treating of conditions: or whilst they were illustrating forth, according to the composition already made; (for it is diversly reported) Marcellus seizing upon a Gate, entred with his Army, and put all to sword that came in their way. Fifty of those that were first gotten out, ran to Fabius the Consul, who saved them, and sent them to Capua in safety; all the rest were either slain, or made prisoners. If Fabius deserved Commendations, by holding his word good unto these fifty, I know not how the slaughter of the rest, or imprisonment afterward of such as escaped the heat of execution, could be excused by Marcellus. It may be that he helped himself after the Roman fashion, with some equivocation, but he shall pay for it hereafter. In like sort was Mount Marsam in Gasein taken by the Marshall Morshu, when I was a young man in France. For whilst he entertained parley about composition; the besieged ran all from their several guards, upon hasty desire of being acquainted with the conditions proposed. The Marshall therefore discovering a part of the Walls unguarded, entred by Scalado, and put all save the Governour unto the sword. Herein

the Governour of Mount Marsam committed two gross errors; the one, in that he gave no order for the Captains and Companies, to hold themselves in their places; the other, in that he was content to parley without Pledges for assurance given and received. Some such oversight the Governour of Cassine seemeth to have committed; yet neither the advantage taken by Marcellus, or by Monius, was very honourable. When this Work was ended, many small Towns of the Samnites, and some of the Lucans and Apulians, were recovered: wherein were taken or slain, about five and twenty thousand of the Enemies; and the Country grievously wasted by Fabius, Marcellus lying sick at Nola.

Hannibal in the mean while was about Tarentum, waiting to hear from those, that had promised to give up the Town. But M. Valerius the Roman Propretor had thrust for many men into it, that the Traitors durst not stir. Wherefore the Carthaginian was fain to depart, having wearied himself in vain with expectation. Yet he wasted not the Country, but contented himself with hope, that they would please him better in time following. So he departed thence toward Salapia, which he chose for his wintering-place; and began to victual it when Summer was but half past. It is said, that he was in love with a young Wench in that Town, in which regard if he began his Winter more timely than otherwise he required, he did not like the Romans; whom necessity enforced, to make their Summer last as long as they were able to travel up and down the Country.

About this time began great troubles in Scit, whither Marcellus the Consul was sent, to take such order for the Province, as need should require. Of the doings there, which wore out more time than the Consulship, we will speak hereafter.

The new Consuls chosen at Rome, were Q. Fabius the Son of the present Consul, and T. Sempronius Gracchus the second time. The Romans found it needful for the publick service, to employ oftentimes their best able men: and therefore made it lawful, during the war, to recontinue their Officers, and chuse such as had lately held their places before; without regarding any distance of time, which was otherwise required. The old Fabius became Lieutenant unto his Son; which was perhaps the respect, that most commended his Son unto the place. It is noted, That when the old man came into the Camp, and his Son rode forth to meet him: eleven of the twelve Lictors, which carried an Axe with a bundle of Rods before the Consul, suffered him, in regard of due reverence, to pass by them on horse-back, which was against the custom. But the Son perceiving this, commanded the last of his Lictors to note it: who thereupon bade the old Fabius alight, and come to the Consul on his feet. The Father cheerfully did so; saying, It was my mind, Son, to make tryal, whether thou didst understand thy self to be Consul. Cassius Albinus a wealthy Citizen of Arpi, who after the battel at Canne, had helped the Carthaginian into that Town, seeing now the fortune of the Romans to amend, came privily to this Consul Fabius, and offered to render it back unto him, if he might be therefore well rewarded. The Consul purposed to follow old examples; and to make this Albinus a pattern to all Traitors; using him as Camillus and Fabricius had done those, that offered their faithful service against the Falisci, and King Pyrhus. But Q. Fabius the Father, was of another opinion: and said, it was a matter of dangerous consequence, That it should be thought more safe to revolt from the Romans, than to turn unto them. Wherefore it was concluded, that he should be sent to the Town of Cales, and there kept as prisoner; until they could better resolve, what to do with him, or what use to make of him. Hannibal understanding that Albinus was gone, and among the Romans, took it not sorrowfully; but thought this a good occasion to seize upon all the mans riches, which were great. Yet that he might seem rather severe, than covetous, he sent for the wife and children of Albinus into his Camp: where having examined them by torment, partly concerning the departure and intentions of this fugitive, partly, and more strictly, about his riches, what they were, and where they lay, he condemned them as partakers of the treason, to be burnt alive; and took all their goods unto himself. Fabius the Consul shortly after came to Arpi: which he won by Scalado, in a stormy and rainy night. Five thousand of Hannibal's Souldiers lay in the Towns, and of the Arpines themselves, there were about three thousand. These were thrust foremost by the Carthaginian Garrison; when it was understood, that the Romans had gotten over the Wall, and broken open a Gate. For the Souldiers held the Townsmen suspected; and therefore thought it no wisdom to trust them at their backs. But after some little resistance, the Arpines gave over fight, and entertained parley with the Romans: protesting, they had been betrayed by their Princes; and were become subject to the Carthaginians, against their wills. In process of this discourse, the Apine Prætor went unto the Roman Consul: and receiving his faith for security of the Town, presently made head against the Garrison. This notwithstanding, like it is that Hannibal's men continued to make good resistance. For when almost a thousand of them that were Spaniards, offered to leave their companions, and serve on the Romans side, it was yet covenanted, that the Carthaginians should be suffered to pass forth quietly, and return to Hannibal. This was performed: and so Arpi became Roman again, with little other loss, than of him that had betrayed it. About the same time Cliternum was taken by Sempronius Tuditanus, one of the Prætors: and unto Cneus Fulvius, another of the Prætors, an hundred and twelve Gentlemen of Capua offered their service; upon no other condition, than to have their goods restored unto them, when their City should be recovered by the Romans. This was a thing of small importance: but considering the general hatred of the Campanians towards Rome, it served to discover the inclination of the Italians in those times; and how their affections recoyled from Hannibal, when there was no appearance of those mighty succours, that had been promised from Carthage. The Consentines also, and the Thurines, people of the Bruttians, which had yielded themselves to Hannibal, returned again to their old allegiance. Others would have followed their example, but that one L. Pomponius, who of a Publican had made himself a Captain, and gotten reputation by some petty exploits in foraging the Country, was slain by Hannibal's with a great multitude of those that followed him. Hannibal in the mean while had all his care bent upon Tarentum; which if he could take, it seemed that it would stand himing good stead, for drawing over that help out of Macedon, which his Carthaginians failed to send. Long he waited ere he could bring his desire to pass: and being loth to hazard his forces, where he hoped to prevail by intelligence; he contented himself with taking in some poor Towns of the Salutines. At length, his Agents within Tarentum, found means to accomplish their purpose, and his wish. One Phileas, that was of their conspiracy, who lay at Rome as Embassador, practising with the Hostages of the Tarentines, and such as had the keeping of them, conveyed them by night out of the City. But he and his company the next day were so closely pursued, that all of them were taken, and brought back to Rome, where they suffered death as Traitors. By reason of this cruelty, or severity, the people of Tarentum grew to hate the Romans more generally and earnestly than before. As for the Conspirators, they followed their business the more diligently, as knowing what reward they were to expect, if their intention should happen to be discovered. Wherefore they sent again to Hannibal; and acquainting him with the manner of their plot, made the same composition with him for the Tarentines, which they of Capua had made before. Nico, and Philomenes, two of the chief among them, used much to go forth of the Town on hunting by night; as if they durst not take their pleasure by day, for fear of the Carthaginians. Seldom or never they missed of their game: for the Carthaginians prepared it ready for their hands, that they might not seem to have been abroad upon other occasion: From the Camp of Hannibal it was about three dayes journey to Tarentum, if he should have marched thither with his whole Army. This caused his long abode in one place the less to be suspected; as also, to make his enemies the more secure, he caused it to be given out, that he was sick. But when the Romans within Tarentum, were grown careless of such his neighbourhood, and the Conspirators had set their business in order; he took with him ten thousand the most expedite of his horse and foot; and long before break of day, made all speed thitherward. Fourscore light horse of the Numidians ran a great way before him, beating all the ways, and killing any that they met, for fear lest he, and his troop following him, should be discovered. It had been often the manner of some few Numidian horse, to do the like in former times. Wherefore the Roman Governour, when he heard tell in the evening, that some Numidians were abroad in the fields, took it for a sign, that Hannibal was not as yet lodged; and gave order, that some companies should be sent out the next morning, to strip them of their booty, and send them gone. But when it grew dark night; Hannibal, guided by Philomenes, came close to the Town: where, according to the tokens agreed upon, making a light to shew his arrival; Nico, that was within the Town, answered him with another light, in sign that he was ready. Presently Nico began to set upon one of the Gates, and to kill the watch-men. Philomenes went toward another gate: and whistling (as was his manner) called up the Porter; bidding him make haste, for that he had killed a great Bore, so heavy, that scarce two men could stand under under it. So the Porter opened the wicket: and forthwith entred two young men, laden with the Bore; which Hannibal had prepared large enough, to be worthy the looking on. While the Porter stood wondering at the largeness of the beast, Philomenes ran him through with his Bore-spear: and letting in some thirty armed men, fell upon all the watch; whom when he had slain, he entred the great gate. So the Army of Hannibal entering Tarentum at two Gates, went directly toward the Market place, where both parts met. Thence they were distributed by their General, and sent into all quarters of the City, with Tarentines to be their guides. They were commanded to kill all the Romans, and not to hurt the Citizens. For better performance hereof, Hannibal willed the Conspirators, that when any of their friends appeared in sight, they should bid him be quiet, and of good cheer. All the Town was in an uproar: but few could tell what the matter meant. A Roman trumpet was unskillfully sounded by a Greek in the Theater: which helped the suspicion, both of the Tarentines, that the Romans were about to spoil the Town; and of the Romans, that the Citizens were in commotion. The Governour fled into the Port: and taking boat, got into the Citadel, that stood in the mouth of the Haven; whence he might easily perceive the next morning, how all had passed. Hannibal assembling the Tarentines, gave them to understand, what good affection he bore them; inveighed bitterly against the Romans, as tyrannous oppressors; and spake what else he thought fit for the present. This done, and having gotten such spoil as was to be had of the Souldiers goods in the Town, he addressed himself against the Citadel; hoping that if the Garrison would fall out, he might give them such a blow, as should make them unable to defend the Piece. According to his expectation it partly fell out. For when he began to make his approaches, the Romans in a bravery falling forth, gave charge upon his men: who fell back of purpose according to direction, till they had drawn on as many as they could, and so far from their strength, as they durst adventure. Then gave Hannibal a sign to his Carthaginians, who lay prepared ready for the purpose: and fiercely setting upon the Enemy, drove him back with great slaughter, as fast as he could run; so that afterwards he durst not issue forth. The Citadel stood upon a Demi-Island, that was plain ground; and fortified only with a Ditch and Wall against the Town, whereunto it was joyoned by a cawley. This cawley Hanni- bal intended to fortifie in like sort against the Citadel; to the end that the Tarentines might be able, without his help, to keep themselves from all danger thence. His work in few dayes went so well forward, without impediment from the besieged, that he conceived hope of winning the piece it self, by taking a little more pains. Wherefore he made ready all sorts of engines, to force the place. But whilst he was busied in his works, there came by Sea a strong supply from Metapontum: which took away all hope of prevailing; and made him return to his former counsel. Now forasmuch as the Tarentine fleet lay within the haven, and could not pass forth, whilst the Romans held the Citadel: it seemed likely that the Town would suffer want, being debarred of accustomed trade and provisions by Sea: whilst the Roman garrison by help of their shipping, might easily be relieved, and enabled to hold out. Against this inconvenience, it was rather wished by the Tarentines, than any way hoped, that their fleet could get out of the haven; to guard the mouth of it, and cut off supply from the Enemy. Hannibal told them; that this might well be done: for that their Town standing in plain ground, and their streets being fair and broad, it would be no hard matter to draw the Gallies over land, and launch them into the Sea without. This he undertook, and effected: whereby the Roman garrison was reduced into great necessity; though with much patience it held out, and found Hannibal oftentimes otherwise busied, than his affairs required.

Thus with mutual loss on both sides, the time passed: and the Roman forces, growing daily stronger, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, with Appius Claudius, lately chosen Consuls, prepared to besiege the great City of Capua. Three and twenty Legions the Romans had now armed. This was a great and hasty growth from that want of men, and of all necessities, wherinto the loss at Cannæ had reduced them. But to fill up these Legions, they were fain to take up young Boyes that were under seventeen years of age: and to send Commissioners above fifty miles round, for the seeking out of such Lads as might appear serviceable, and pressing them to the Wars; making yet a Law, that their years of service, wherinto they were bound by order of the City, should be reckoned, for their benefit, from this their beginning so young, as if they had been of lawful age. Before the Roman Army drew near, the Campanians felt great want of victual, as if they had already been besieged. This happened partly by sloth of the Nation, partly by the great waste and spoil, which the Romans had in foregoing years made upon their grounds. They sent therefore Embassadors to Hannibal; desiring him to succour them ere they were closed up, as they feared to be shortly. He gave them comfortable words, and sent Hanno with an Army to supply their wants. Hanno appointed them a day; against which they should be ready with all manner of carriages, to store themselves with victuals, that he would provide. Neither did he promise more than he performed. For he caused great quantity of grain, that had been laid up in Cities round about, to be brought into his Camp, three miles from Beneventum. Thither at the time appointed, came no more than forty Carts or Wagons, with a few pack-horses, as if this had been enough to victual Capua. Such was the reticulousness of the Campanians. Hanno was exceeding angry hereat: and told them they were worse than very beasts; since hunger could not teach them to have greater care. Wherefore he gave them a longer day; against which he made provision to store them thoroughly. Of all these doings word was sent to the Roman Consuls, from the Citizens of Beneventum. Therefore Q. Fulvius the Consul, taking with him such strength as he thought needful for the service, came into Beneventum by night; where with diligence he made inquiry into the behaviour of the Enemy. He learned, that Hanno with part of his Army was gone abroad to make provisions; that some two thousand Wagons, with a great rabble of Carters and other Varlets, lay among the Carthaginians in their camp; so that little good order was kept: all thought being set upon a great harvest. Hereupon the Consul bade his men prepare themselves to assail the enemies Camp: and leaving all his impediments within Beneventum, he marched thitherward so early in the morning, that he was there with the first break of day. By coming so unexpected, he had well near forced the Camp on the sudden. But it was very strong, and very well defended: so that the longer the fight continued, the less desire had Fulvius to lose more of his men in the attempt; seeing many of them cast away, and yet little hope of doing good. Therefore he said, that it were better to go more leisurely and substantially to work; to send for his fellow-Consul, with the rest of their Army; and to lye between Hanno and home; that neither the Campanians should depart thence, nor the Carthaginians be able to relieve them. Being thus discouraging, and about to found the retreat; he saw that some of his men had gotten over the enemies Rampart. There was great booty; or (which was all one to the Souldiers) an opinion of much that might be gotten in that Camp. Wherefore some Ensign-bearers drew their Ensigns over the Rampart, willing their men to fetch them out, unless they would endure the shame and dishonour following such a loss. Fear of such ignominy (than which nothing could be greater) made the Souldiers adventure so desperately, that Fulvius, perceiving the heat of his men, changed his purpose, and encouraged those that were somewhat backward, to follow the example of them that had already gotten over the Trenches. Thus the Camp was won: in which were slain above six thousand; and taken above seven thousand, besides all the store of victuals, and carriages, with abundance of booty, that Hanno had lately gotten from the Roman Confederates. This misadventure, and the nearer approach of both the Consuls, made them of Capua send a piteous Embassage to Hannibal: putting him in mind of all the love that he was wont to protest unto their City; and how he had made shew to affect it no less than Carthage. But now, they said it would be lost, as Arpi was lately, if he gave not strong and speedy succour: Hannibal answered with comfortable words: and sent away two thousand horse, to keep their grounds from spoil, whilst he himself was detained about Tarentum, partly by hope of winning the Citadel, partly by the disposition, which he saw in many Towns adjoining, to yield unto him. Among the Hostages of the Tarentines, that lately had fled out of Rome, and being overtaken, suffered death for their attempt; were some of the Metapontines, and other Cities of the Greeks, inhabiting that Eastern part of Italy, which was called of old, Magna Græcia. These people took to heart the death of their Hostages, and thought the punishment greater than the offence. Wherefore the Metapontines, as soon as the Roman garrison was taken from them to defend the Citadel of Tarentum, made no more ado, but opened their gates to Hannibal. The Thurians would have done the like, upon the like reason, had not some companies lay in their Town; which they feared that they should not be able to master. Nevertheless, they helped themselves by cunning: inviting to their gates Hanno and Mago, that were near at hand: against whom whilst they proffered their service to Attilius the Roman Captain, they drew him forth to fight, and recoiling from him, closed up their gates. A little for-formality they used in pretending fear, lest the enemy should break in together with the Romans, in saving Attilius himself, and sending him away by Sea; as also in confusing a small while (because perhaps many of their chief men were unacquainted with the practice) whether they should yield to the Carthaginian or no. But this disputation lasted not long: for they that had removed the chief impediment, easily prevailed in the rest; and delivered up the Town to Hanno and Mago. This good success, and hope of the like, detained Hannibal in those quarters, whilst the Consuls fortifying Beneventum to secure their backs, addressed themselves to the siege of Capua.

Many disasters befell the Romans, in the beginning of this great enterprise. T. Sempronius Gracchus, a very good man of War, that had of late been twice Consul, was slain, either by treachery of some Lucans, that drew him into ambush, or by some Carthaginian stragglers, among whom he fell unawares. His body, or his head, was very honourably interred, either by Hannibal himself, or (for the reports agree not) by the Romans; to whom Hannibal lent it. He was appointed to lie in Beneventum, there to secure the back of the Army that should besedge Capua. But his death hapned in an ill time, to the great hinderance of that business. The Volones or Slaves lately manumitted, forsook their Ensigns, and went every one whither he thought good, as if they had been discharged by the decease of their Leaders; so that it asked some labour to seek them out, and bring them back into their Camp. Nevertheless, the Consuls went forward with their work, and drawing near to Capua, did all acts of hostility, which they could. Mago the Carthaginian, and the Citizens of Capua gave them an hard welcome, wherein above fifteen hundred Romans were lost. Neither was it long ere Hannibal came thither, who fought with the Consuls, and had the better; inasmuch that it caused them to dislodge. They removed by night, and went several waies: Fulvius towards Canna, Claudius into Lucania. Hannibal followed after Claudius, who having led him a great walk, fetched a compass about, and returned to Capua. It so fell out, that one Marcus Centenius Pennula, a stout man, and one that with good commendations had discharged the place of a Centurion, lay with an Army not far from thence, where Hannibal rested, when he was weary of hunting after Claudius. This Pennula had made great vaunts to the Roman Senate, of wonders which he would work, if he might be trusted with the leading of five thousand men. The Fathers were unwilling in such a time, to reject the virtue of any good Souldier, how mean soever his condition were. Wherefore they gave him the charge of eight thousand: and he himself being a proper man, and talking bravely, gathered up so many volunteers, as almost doubled his number. But meeting thus with Hannibal, he gave proof of the difference between a stout Centurion, and one able to command in chief. He and his fellows were all (in a manner) slain, scarce a thousand of them escaping. Soon after this, Hannibal had word, that Cneus Fulvius a Roman Prætor with eighteen thousand men was in Apulia, very careless and a man insufficient for the charge which he held. Thither therefore he halted to visit him: hoping to deal the better with the main strength of Rome, which pointed at Capua, when he should have cut off those forces that lay in the Provinces about, under men of small ability. Coming upon Fulvius, he found him and his men so jolly, that needs they would have fought the first night. Wherefore it was not to be doubted, what would happen the day following. So he bestowed Mago with three thousand of his lightest armed, in places thereabout most fit for ambush. Then offered battle to Fulvius, he soon had him in the trap: whence he made him glad to escape alive; leaving all save two thousand of his followers, dead behind him.

These two great blows, received the one presently after the other, much aliothered the Romans. Nevertheless, all care was taken, to gather up the small reliques of the broken Armies: and that the Consuls should go substantially forwards with the siege of Capua: which was of great consequence, both in matter of reputation, and in many other respects. The two Consuls sat down before the Town, and C. Claudius Nero, one of the Prætors, came with his Army from Stessula, to their assistance. They made Proclamation, That whosoever would liege out of Capua before a certain day prefixed, should have his pardon, and be suffered to enjoy all that unto him belonged: which day being past, there should be no grace expected. This offer was contumeliously rejected; the Capuans relying on their own strength, and the succours attended from Hannibal. Before the City was closed up, they sent messengers to the Carthaginian, which found him at Brundisium. He had made a long journey in hope of gaining the Tarentine Citadel: of which expectation failing, he turned to Brundisium, upon advertisement that he should be be let in. There the Capuans met him, told him of their danger with earnest words; and were with words as bravely re-comforted. He bade them consider, how, a few days since he had chased the Consuls out of their fields; and told them, that he would presently come thither again, and send the Romans going as fast as before. With this good answer the Messengers returned, and hardly could get back into the City; which the Romans had almost intrenched round. As for Hannibal himself, he was of opinion, that Capua, being very well manned, and heartily devoted unto his friendship, would hold out a long time, and thereby give him leisure to do what he thought requisite among the Tarentines, and in those Eastern parts of Italy; whilst the Roman Army spent it self in a tedious siege. Thus he ingred, and thereby gave the Consuls time both to fortifie themselves at Capua, and to dispatch the election of new Magistrates in Rome; whilst he himself pursued hopes that never found success.

Claudian and Fulvius, when their term of office was expired, were appointed to continue the siege at Capua; retaining the same Armies, as Proconsuls. The Towns-men often sallied out, rather in a bravery, than likelihood to work any matter of effect; the Enemy lying close within his Trenches, as intending without other violence, to subdue them by famine. Yet against the Campan horse (for their foot was easily beaten) the Romans used to thrust out some troops, that should hold them skirnish. In these exercises the Campan usually had the better, to the great grief of their proud Enemy; who scorned to take foil at the hands of such Rebels. It was therefore, devised that some active and courageous young men should learn to ride behind the Roman men at arms; leaping up, and again dismounting lightly, as occasion served. These were furnished like the Peltæ, having each of them three or four small darts: which alighting in time of conflict, they discharged thick upon the Enemies horse; whom vanquishing in this kind of service, they much disheartened in the main. The time thus passing, and famine daily increasing within the City, Hannibal came at length, not expected by the Romans; and taking a Fort of theirs, called Galatia, fell upon their Camp. At the same time the Capuans illused with their whole power, in as terrible manner as they could devise: setting all their multitude of unserviceable people by the walls, which with a loud noise of Pans and Basons, troubled those that were occupied in fight. Appius Claudius opposing himself to the Campan, easily defended his Trenches against them; and so well repressed them, that he drove them at length back into their City. Nevertheless, in pursuing them to their gates, he received a wound that accompanied him in short space after to his grave. Q. Fulvius was held harder to this task by Hannibal, and the Carthaginian Army. The Roman Camp was even at point to have been lost; and Hannibal his Elephants, of which he brought three and thirty, were either gotten within the rampart, or else (for the report varies) being some of them slain upon it, fell into the ditch, and filled it up in such sort, that their bodies served as a bridge to the Assailants. It is said, that Hannibal in this tumult caused some fugitives that could speak Latin well, to proclaim aloud as it were in the Consuls name, That every one of the Soldiers should shift for himself, and fly betimes unto the next hills, for as much as the Camp was already lost. But all would not serve. The fraud was detected; and the Army having sitten there so long, had at good leisure strongly intrenched itself, so as little hope there was to raise the siege by force.

This did extremely perplex the Carthaginian. The purchase of Capua had (as was thought) withheld him from taking Rome it self: and now his desire of winning the Tarentine Citadel, had well-near lost Capua; in respect of which, neither the Citadel, nor the City of Tarentum were to have been much regarded. Falling therefore into desperate anger with himself and his hard fortune, that of so many great victories he had made no greater use: on the sudden he entertained an haughty resolution, even to set upon Rome; and carry to the walls of that proud City, the danger of War that threatened Capua. This, he thought, would be a mean, to draw the Roman Generals, or one of them at least, unto the defence of their own home: If they rose from the siege with their whole Army, then had he his desire: If they divided their forces, then was it likely, that either he or the Campan, should well enough deal with them apart. Neither did he despair; that the terror of his coming might so astonish the multitude within Rome, as he might enter some part or other of the City. His only fear was, lest the Campan, being ignorant of his purpose, should think he had forsaken them; and thereupon forthwith yield themselves to the Enemy. To prevent this danger, he sent letters to Capua by a subtle Numidian; who running as a fugitive into the Roman Camp, conveyed himself thence over the innermost Trenches into into the City. The Journey to Rome was to be performed with great celerity: no small hope of good success resting in the suddenness of his arrival there. Wherefore he caused his men to have in a readines ten dayes victuals; and prepared as many boats, as might in one night transport his Army over the River Vulturnus. This could not be done so closely, but that the Roman Generals, by some fugitives, had notice of his purpose. With this danger therefore they acquainted the Senate; which was therewith affected, according to the diversity of mens opinions, in a case of such importance. Some gave counsel to let alone Capua, yea, and all places else, rather than to put the Town of Rome into peril of being taken by the enemy. Others were so far from allowing of this, as they wondered how any man could think, that Hannibal, being unable to relieve Capua, should judge himself strong enough to win Rome; and therefore stoutly said, That those Legions, which were kept at home for defence of the City, would serve the turn well enough, to keep him out and send him thence, if he were so unwise as to come thither. But it was finally concluded, that Letters should be sent to Fulvius and Claudian, acquainting them perfectly with the forces, that at the present were in Rome: who, since they knew best what the strength was which Hannibal could bring along with him, were best able to judge, what was needful to oppose him. So it was referred unto the discretion of these Generals at Capua, to do as they thought behoveful: and if it might conveniently be, neither to raise their siege, nor yet to put the City of Rome into much adventure. According to this Decree of the Senate, Q. Fulvius took fifteen thousand foot, and a thousand horse, the choice of his whole Army; with which he hasted toward Rome; leaving App. Claudius, who could not travel by reason of his wound, to continue the siege at Capua.

Hannibal having passed over Vulturnus, burnt up all his boats, and left nothing that might transport the Enemy, in case he should offer to pursue or coast him. Then hasted he away toward Rome, staying no longer in any one place, than he needs must. Yet found he the Bridges over Liris broken down by the people of Frigitelle: which, as it stopped him a little on his way; so it made him the more grievously to spoil their Lands, while the Bridges were in mending. The nearer that he drew to Rome, the greater waste he made: his Numidians running before him; driving the Country, and killing or taking multitudes of all sorts and ages, that fled out of all parts round about. The Messengers of these news came apace, one after another into the City; some few bringing true advertisements; but the most of them reporting the conceits of their own fear. All the Streets and Temples in Rome were pestered with women, crying, and praying, and rubbing the Altars with their hair, because they could do none other good. The Senators were all in the great Market, or place of Assembly; ready to give their advice, if it were asked, or to take directions given by the Magistrates. All places of most importance were stuffed with souldiers: it being uncertain, upon which part Hannibal would fall. In the midst of this trepidation, there came news that Quintus Fulvius, with part of the Army from Capua, was halting to the defence of the City. The Office of a Proconsul did expire, at his return home, and entering into the Gates of Rome. Wherefore, that Fulvius might lose nothing by coming into the City, in time of such need, an Act was passed, That he should have equal power with the Consuls during his abode there. He and Hannibal arrived at Rome, one soon after another: Fulvius having been long held occupied in passing over Vulturnus; and Hannibal receiving impediment in his journey, as much as the Country was able to give. The Consuls, and Fulvius incamped without the Gates of Rome, attending the Carthaginian. Thither they called the Senate: and as the danger grew nearer and greater; so took they more careful & especial order against all occurrences. Hannibal came to the River Anio, or Anien, three miles from the Town; whence he advanced with two thousand horse, and rode along a great way under the Walls, viewing the light thereof, and considering how he might best approach it. But he either went, or (as the Roman Story saith) was driven away, without doing or receiving any hurt. Many tumults rose in this while among the people; but were suppressed by the care and diligence of the Senators. Above the rest, one accident was both troublesome, and near without peril. Of Numidians that had thence fled aside, and fallen (upon some displeasures) from Hannibal to the Romans, there were some twelve hundred then in Rome; which were appointed by the Consuls, to pass thorow the Town, from the Mount Aventine, to the Gate Collatina, where it was thought that their service might be useful, among broken wayes, and Garden-walls lying in the suburbs. The faces of these men, and their furniture, wherein they differed not from the followers of Hannibal; bred such such mistaking, as caused a great uproar among the people: all crying out that Aventine was taken, and the Enemy gotten within the walls. The noise was such, that men could not be informed of the truth: and the streets were so full of cattle, and husbandmen, which were fled thither out of the Villages adjoining, that the passage was stopp'd up: and the poor Numidians pitifully beaten from the house tops, with stones and other weapons that came next to hand, by the desperate multitude, that would have run out at the Gates, had it not been certain who lay under the Walls. To remedy the like inconveniences, it was ordained, That all which had been dictators, Consuls, or Consors, should have authority as Magistrates, still the Enemy departed. The day following Hannibal pass'd over Anien, and presented battle to the Romans, who did not wisely if they undertook it. It is said, that a terrible shower of rain, caus'd both Romans and Carthaginians to return into their several Camps, and that this happened two days together, the weather breaking up and clearing as soon as they were departed asunder: certain it is, that Hannibal, who had brought along with him no more than ten days provision, could not endure to stay there, until his victuals were all spent. In which regard the Romans, if they suffer'd him to waste his time and provisions, knowing that he could not abide there long, did as became well advis'd men: if they offer'd to fight with him, and either had the better, or were parted (as is said) by some accident of weather, the commendations must be given to their fortune. The terror of Hannibal's coming to the City, how great soever it was at the first, yet after some leisure, and better notice taken of their forces, which appeared less than the first apprehension had form'd them, was much and soon abated. Hereupon it helped well, that at the same time the Supply appointed for Spain, after the death of the two Scipios, were sent out of the Town, and went forth at the Gate, whilst one Carthaginian lay before another. In all Pinck terrors, as they are called, whereof there is either no cause known, or no cause answerable to the greatness of the sudden confederation; it is a good remedy to do somewhat quite contrary to that which the danger would require, were it such as men have fustion'd it in their amazed conceits. Thus did Alexander cause his souldiers to disarm themselves, when they were all on a sudden in a great fear of they wist not what. And thus did Clearchus pacifie a foolish uproar in his Army, by proclaiming a reward unto him that could tell who had sent the As into the Camp. But in this present example of the Romans, appears withall a great magnanimity; whereby they sustained their reputation, and augmented it no less, than by this bold attempt of Hannibal it might seem to have been diminished. Neither could they more finely have check'd the glorious conceits of their enemy, and taken away the disgrace of that fear, which clouded their valour at his first coming; than by making such demonstrations, when once they had recovered spirit, how little they esteem'd him. To this purpose therefore that very piece of ground, on which the Carthaginian lay encamp'd, was sold in Rome: and sold it was nothing under the value, but at as good a rate, as if it had been in time of peace. This dignity coming to his ear, incen'd Hannibal so much, that he made port-sale of the Silver-smiths shops, which were near about the Market or Common place in Rome; as if his own title to the houses within the Town were no whit worse, than any Roman Citizens could be unto that piece of ground, whereon he rais'd his Tent. But this counter-practice was nothing worth. The Romans did seek to manifest that assurance which they justly had conceiv'd; Hannibal, to make shew of continuing in an hope, which was already past. His victuals were almost spent: and of those ends, that he had propos'd unto himself, this Journey had brought forth none other, than the fame of his much daring. Wherefore he brake up his Camp: and doing what spoil he could to the Roman Territory, without sparing religious places, wherein wealth was to be gotten, he pass'd like a tempest over the Country, and ran toward the Eastern Sea so fast, that he had almost taken the City of Rhegium before his arrival was feared or suspected. As for Capua, he gave it lost: and is likely to have curs'd the whole faction of Hanno, which thus disabled him to relieve that fair City; since he had no other way to vent his grief.

2. Fabius returning back to Capua, made Proclamation anew, that who-so would yield before a certain day, might safely do it. This, and the very return of Fulvius, without any more appearance of Hannibal, gave the Capuans to understand, that they were abandoned, and their case desperate. To trust the Roman pardon proclaim'd, every mans conscience of his own evil deserts, told him, that it was a vanity: and some faint hope was given, by Hanno and Bostar, Captains of the Carthaginian Garrison within the Town, that Hannibal should come again, if means could only be found, how to convey such Letters unto him as they would write. The carriage of the Letters was undertaken by some Numidians; who running as fugitives, out of the Town into the Roman Camp, waited fit opportunity to make an escape thence with their packets. But it happen'd ere they could convey themselves away, that one of them was detected by a harlot following him out of the Town; and the Letters of Bostar and Hanno were taken and opened, containing a vehement entreaty unto Hannibal, that he would not thus forsake the Capuans and them. For (said they) we came not hither to make War against Rhegium and Tarentum, but against the Romans: whose Legions, wheresoever they lye, there also should the Carthaginian Army be ready to attend them; and by taking such a course, have we gotten those victories at Trebia, Thrasymene, and Cannae. In fine, they besought him, that he would not dishonour himself, and betray them to their enemies, by turning another way; as if it were his only care, that the City should not be taken in his full view; promising to make a desperate fall, if he would once more adventure to set up on the Roman Camp. Such were the hopes of Bostar and his fellow.

But Hannibal had already done his best; and now began to faint under the burden of that War, wherein as afterward he protested he was vanquish'd by Hanno and his Persians, in the Carthaginian Senate, rather than by any force of Rome. It may well be, as a thing incident in like cases, that some of those which were besieged in Capua, had been sent over by the Hannonians, to observe the doings of Hannibal, and to check his proceedings. If this were so, justly might they curse their own malice, which had cast them into this remediless necessity. Howsoever it were, the Letters directed unto Hannibal, fell (as is shew'd) unto the Roman Proconsuls hands; who cutting off the hands of all such counterfeited fugitives, as carried such messages, whipt them back into the Town. This miserable spectacle brake the hearts of the Capuans, so that the multitude crying out upon the Senate, with menacing terms, caus'd them to assemble and consult, about the yielding up of Capua unto the Romans. The bravest of the Senators and such as a few years since, had been most forward in joining with Hannibal, understood well enough whereunto the matter tended. Wherefore one of them invited the rest home to supper; telling them, that when they had made good cheer, he would drink to them such an health, as should set them free from that cruel revenge, which the Enemies sought upon their bodies. About seven and twenty of the Senators there were, that liking well of his motion, ended their lives together by drinking poison. All the rest hoping for more mercy than they had desired, yielded simply to discretion. So one of the Town-gates was set open; whereas a Roman Legion, with some other Companies, entering, disarm'd the Citizens; apprehended the Carthaginian Garrison; and command'd all the Senators of Capua to go forth into the Roman Camp. At their coming thither, the Proconsuls laid Irons upon them all, and commanding them to tell what store of gold and silver they had at home, sent them into safe custody; some to Cales, others to Theanum. Touching the general multitude, they were reserved unto the discretion of the Senate, yet so hardly used by Fulvius in the mean while, that they had little cause of hope or comfort in this adversity. Ap. Claudius was brought even to the point of death, by the wound which he had lately received; yet was he not inexorable to the Capuans; as having loved them well in former times, and having giving his Daughter in marriage to that Pacuvius, of whom he spake before. But this facility of his Colleague, made Fulvius the more hasty in taking vengeance; for fear, left upon the like respects, the Roman Senate might prove more gentle, than he thought behoveful to the common safety; and honour of their state. Wherefore he took the pains to ride by night unto Theanum, and from thence to Cales; where he caus'd all the Capuan prisoners to suffer death; binding them to stakes; and scourging them first a good while with rods; after which he struck off their heads.

This terrible example of vengeance, which the Carthaginians could not hinder, made all Towns of Italy the less apt to follow the vain hope of the Capuans; and bred a general inclination, to return upon good conditions to the Roman side. The Atellans, Calatines and Sabatinens, people of the Capuans, that in the former change had follow'd the fortune of Capua, made also now the like submission, for very fear and want of ability to resist. They were therefore used with the like rigour, by Fulvius; who dealt so extremely with them all, that he brought them into desperation. Wherefore some of their young Gentlemen burning with fire of revenge got into Rome; where they found means by night-time, to set on fire many houses, that a great part of the City was like to have been consumed. The beginning of the fire

such mistaking, as caused a great uproar among the people: all crying out that Aventine was taken, and the Enemy gotten within the walls. The noise was such, that men could not be informed of the truth: and the streets were so full of cattle, and husbandmen, which were fled thither out of the Villages adjoining, that the passage was stopp'd up: and the poor Numidians pitifully beaten from the house tops, with stones and other weapons that came next to hand, by the desperate multitude, that would have run out at the Gates, had it not been certain who lay under the Walls. To remedy the like inconveniences, it was ordained, That all which had been dictators, Consuls, or Consors, should have authority as Magistrates, till the Enemy departed. Thus did Alexander cause his souldiers to disarm themselves, when they were all on a sudden in a great fear of they wist not what. But it happen'd ere they could convey themselves away, that one of them was detected by an harlot following him out of the Town; and the Letters of Boffar and Hanno were taken and opened, containing a vehement entreaty unto Hannibal, that he would not thus forsake the Capuans and them. For (said they) we came not hither to make War against Rhegium and Tarentum, but against the Romans: whose Legions, where-soever they lye, there also should the Carthaginian Army be ready to attend them; and by taking such a course, have we gotten those victories at Trebia, Thrasymene, and Cannae. In fine, they besought him, that he would not dishonour himself, and betray them to their enemies, by turning another way; as if it were his only care, that the City should not be taken in his full view; promising to make a desperate sally, if he would once more adventure to set upon the Roman Camp. Such were the hopes of Boffar and his fellow.

But Hannibal had already done his best; and now began to faint under the burden of that War, wherein as afterward he protested he was vanquished by Hanno and his Persians, in the Carthaginian Senate, rather than by any force of Rome. It may well be, as a thing incident in like cases, that some of those which were besieged in Capua, had been sent over by the Hannonians, to observe the doings of Hannibal, and to check his proceedings. If this were so, justly might they curse their own malice, which had cast them into this remediless necessity. How-soever it were, the Letters directed unto Hannibal, fell (as is shew'd) unto the Roman Proconsuls hands; who cutting off the hands of all such counterfeit fugitives, as carried such messages, whipt them back into the Town. This miserable spectacle brake the hearts of the Capuans, so that the multitude crying out upon the Senate, with menacing terms, caus'd them to assemble and consult, about the yielding up of Capua unto the Romans. The bravelt of the Senators and such as a few years since, had been most forward in joining with Hannibal, understood well enough whereunto the matter tended. Wherefore one of them invited the rest home to supper; telling them, that when they had made good cheer, he would drink to them such an health, as should set them free from that cruel revenge, which the Enemies fought upon their bodies. About seven and twenty of the Senators there were, that liking well of his motion, ended their lives together by drinking poyson. All the rest hoping for more mercy than they had deserv'd, yielded simply to discretion. So one of the Town-gates was set open; whereat a Roman Legion, with some other Companies entering, disarm'd the Citizens; apprehend'd the Carthaginian Garrison; and command'd all the Senators of Capua to go forth into the Roman Camp. At their coming thither, the Proconsuls laid Irons upon them all, and commanding them to tell what store of gold and silver they had at home, sent them into safe custody; some to Cales, others to Theanum. Touching the general multitude, they were reserved unto the discretion of the Senate; yet so hardly used by Fulvius in the mean while, that they had little cause of hope or comfort in this adversity. Ap. Claudius was brought even to the point of death, by the wound which he had lately received; yet was he not inexorable to the Capuans; as having loved them well in former times, and having giving his Daughter in marriage to that Pacuvius, of whom he spake before. But this facility of his Colleague, made Fulvius the more hasty in taking vengeance; for fear, lest upon the like respects, the Roman Senate might prove more gentle, than he thought behoveful to the common safety; and honour of their State. Wherefore he took the pains to ride by night unto Theanum, and from thence to Cales; where he caus'd all the Capuan prisoners to suffer death; binding them to stakes, and scourging them first a good while with rods; after which he struck off their heads.

This terrible example of vengeance, which the Carthaginians could not hinder, made all Towns of Italy the less apt to follow the vain hope of the Capuans; and bred a general inclination, to return upon good conditions to the Roman side. The Astellans, Calatines and Sabalines, people of the Capuans, that in the former change had followed the fortune of Capua, made also now the like submission, for very fear and want of ability to resist. They were therefore us'd with the like rigour, by Fulvius; who dealt so extremely with them all, that he brought them into desperation. Wherefore some of their young Gentlemen burning with fire of revenge got into Rome; where they found means by night-time, to set on fire many houses, that a great part of the City was like to have been consumed. The beginning of the fire in divers places at once, argued that it was no casualty. Wherefore liberty was proclaimed unto any slave, and other sufficient reward to any free-man, that should discover who those incendiaries were. Thus all came out; and the Campans being detected by a slave of their own (to whom, above his liberty promised, was given about the sum of an hundred marks) had the punishment answerable to their deserts. Fulvius hereby being more and more incensed against this wretched people, held them in a manner as prisoners within their Walls: and this extreme severity caused them at length to become suppliants unto the Roman Senate; that some period might be set unto their miseries. That whereupon the Senators resolved in the end, was worse than all that which they had suffered before. Only two poor women in Capua (of which one had been an harlot) were found not guilty of the late rebellion. The rest were, some of them, with their wives and children sold for slaves, and their goods confiscated; others laid in prison, and reserved to further deliberation: but the generality of them, commanded to depart out of Campania by a certain day, and confined unto several places, as best liked the angry victors. As for the Town of Capua, it was suffered to stand, in regard of the beauty and commodious light: but no corporation or form of polity was allowed to be therein; only a Roman Provost was every year sent to govern over those that should inhabit it, and to do justice. This was the greatest act, and most important, hitherto done by the people of Rome, after many great losses in the present War. After this, the glory of Hannibal began to shine with a more dim light than before: his oyl being far spent and that which should have revived his flame, being unfortunately shed; as shall be told in place convenient.

§. XV.

How the Carthaginians, making a party in Sardinia and Sicil, held War against the Romans in those Islands, and were overcome.

WHilst things passed thus in Italy, the commotions raised in sardinia and Sicil by the Carthaginians and their friends, were brought to a quiet and happy end by the industrious valour of the Romans. The sardinian rebellion was great and sudden: above thirty thousand being up in arms, ere the Roman forces could arrive there to suppress it. One Harfcoras with his Son Hyofius, mighty men in that Island, were the Ring-leaders; being incited by Hanno a Carthaginian: that promised the assistance of his Country. Neither were the Carthaginians in this enterprise too careless, as in the rest of their main undertakings, about the same time. Yet it had been better if their care had been directed unto the prosecution of that main business in Italy; whereon this and all other hopes depended. For it would have sufficed, if they could have hindered the Romans from sending an Army into Sardinia. Harfcoras with his followers might well enough have served to drive out Quintus Mutius the Prætor; who lay sick in the Provinces; and not more weak in his own body, than in his train. But whilst they sought revenge of that particular injury, whereof the sense was most grievous; they neglected the opportunity of requiting those that had done them wrong, and of the securing themselves from all injuries in the future. Their fortune also in this enterprise was such, as may seem to have encouraged them from being at the like charge, in cases of more importance. For, whereas they sent over Asdrubal, surnamed the Bald, with a competent Fleet and Army, assisted in this expedition by Hanno the Author of the rebellion, and by Mago a Gentleman of the Barchine house, and near-kinsman to Hannibal: it so fell out, that the whole Fleet, by extremity of foul weather, was cast upon the Baleares; to be beaten, and in such evil plight, that the Sardinians had even spent their hearts, and were in a manner quite vanquished, ere these their friends could arrive to succour them.

Titus Manlius was sent from Rome with two and twenty thousand foot, and twelve hundred horse, to settle the estate of that Island, which he had taken in, and annexed unto the Roman Dominion, long before this, in his Consulship. It was a laudable custom of the Romans, to preserve and uphold in their several Provinces, the greatness and reputation of those men, and their families, by whom each Province had been first subdued unto their Empire. If any injury were done unto the Provincials, if any grace were to be obtained from the Senate, or whatsoever accident required the assistance of a Patron; the first Conqueror, and his race after him, were the most ready and best approved means, to procure the benefit of the people subdued. Hereby the Romans held very sure intelligence in every Province, and had always in readines fit men to reclaim their subjects, if they fell into any such disorder, as would otherwise have required required a greater charge and trouble. The coming of Manlius retained in obedience all that were not already broken too far out. Yet was Harfcoras so strong in field, that Manlius was compelled to arm his Mariners: without whom he could not have made up that number of two and twenty thousand, whereof we have spoken before: he landed at Calaris, or Caralis, where mooring his ships, he passed up into the Country, and fought out the enemy. Hyofius, the Son of Harfcoras, had then the command of the Sardinian Army left unto him by his Father, who was gone abroad into the Country, to draw in more friends to their side. This young Gentleman would needs adventure to get honour, by giving battle to the Romans at his own discretion. So he rashly adventured to fight with an old Souldier; by whom he received a terrible overthrow; and lost in one day above thirty thousand of his followers. Hyofius himself, with the rest of his broken troops, got into Cornus, the chief Town of the Island; whither Manlius pursued them. Very soon after this defeat came Asdrubal with his Carthaginians; too late to win all Sardinia in such haste as he might have done, if the tempest had not hindered his voyage; yet soon enough, and strong enough to save the Town of Cornus, and put a new spirit into the Rebels. Manlius hereupon withdrew himself back to Calaris; where he had not stayed long, ere the Sardinians (such of them as adhered to the Roman party) craved his assistance; their Country being wasted by the Carthaginians, and the rebels, with whom they had refused to joyn. This drew Manlius forth of Calaris; where, if he had stayed a little longer, Asdrubal would have sought him out with some blemish to his reputation. But the fame of Asdrubal and his company, appears to have been greater than was their strength. For after somewhat made of them in few skirmishes, Manlius adventured all to the hazard of a battle; wherein he slew twelve thousand of the enemies; and took of the sardinians and Carthaginians three thousand. Four hours the battle lasted; and victory at length fell to the Romans, by the flight of the Islanders, whose courages had been broken in their unprosperous fight, not many dayes before. The death of young Hyofius, and of his Father Harfcoras, that slew himself for grief, together with the captivity of Asdrubal himself with Mago and Hanno the Carthaginians, made the victory the more famous. The vanquished Army fled into Cornus, whither Manlius followed them, and in short space won the Town. All other Cities of the Isle that had rebelled, following the example of Cornus, and yielded unto the Roman; who, imposing upon them such increase of tribute, or other punishment, as best suited with the nature of their several offences, or their ability to pay, returned back to Calaris with a great booty, and from thence to Rome leaving Sardinia in quiet.

The war in Sicil was of greater length; and every way more burdensome to Rome: as also the victory brought more honour and profit, for that the Romans became thereby, not only lovers of their own, as in Sardinia, but Lords of the whole Country, by annexing the City and dominion of Syracuse, to that which they enjoyed before. Soon after the battle at Cannæ, the old King of Syracuse died; who had continued long a steadfast friend unto the Romans, and greatly relieved them in this present war. He left his Kingdom to Hieronymus his grand-child; that was about fifteen years of age; Gelo his Son, that should have been his heir, being dead before. To this young King his successor, Hiero appointed fifteen tutors; of which the principal were Andronodorus, Zoilus, and Themistius; who had married his daughters, or the daughters of Gelo. The rest were such, as he judged most likely to preserve the Kingdom, by the same Art, whereby himself had gotten, and so long kept it. But within a little while, Andronodorus waxing weary of so many coadjutors, began to commend the sufficiency of the young Prince, as extraordinary in one of his years; and said, that he was able to rule the Kingdom without help of any Protector. Thus by giving over his own charge, he caused others to do the like; hoping thereby to get the King wholly into his hands; which came to pass in a sort, as he desired. For Hieronymus, laying aside all care of government, gave himself wholly over to his pleasures; or, if he had any regard of his Royal dignity, it was only in matter of exterior show; as wearing a Diadem, with ornaments of purple, and being attended by an armed guard. Hereby he offended the eyes of his people, that had never seen the like in Hiero, or in Gelo his Son. But much more he offended them, when by his insolent behaviour, suitable to his outward pomp, he gave proof, that in course of life, he would revive the memory of Tyrants dead long since, from whom he took the pattern of his habit. He grew proud, lustful, cruel, and dangerous to all that were about him; so that such of his late tutors as could escape him by flight, were glad to live in banishment: the rest, being most of them put to death by the Tyrant; many of them dying by their own hands, to avoid the danger of his displeasure, that seemed worse than death itself. Only Andronodorus, Zoilus, and one Thraso, continued in grace with him, and were his Counsellours, but not of his Cabinet. These, howsoever they agreed in other points, were at some dissention about the main point of adhering, either to the Romans, or to the Carthaginians. The two former of them were wholly for the Kings pleasure, which was set on change: but Thraso, having more regard of his honour and profit, was very earnest to continue the amity with Rome. Whilst as yet it remained somewhat doubtful which way the King would incline, a conspiracy against his person was detected by a Groom of his; to whom one Theodorus had broken the matter. Theodorus hereupon was apprehended, and tormented; thereby to wring out of him the whole practice, and the names of the undertakers. Long it was ere he would speak any thing: but yielding (as it seemed) in the end, unto the extremity of the torture, he confessed, that he had been set on by Thraso; whom he appeached of the treason, together with many more, that were near in love or peace unto Hieronymus. All these therefore were put to death, being innocent of the crime wherewith they were charged. But they that were indeed the Conspirators, walked boldly in the streets, and never shrunk for the matter: assuring themselves, that the resolution of Theodorus would yield to no extremity. Thus they all escaped, and soon after found means to execute their purpose. The King himself, when Thraso was taken out of the way, quickly resolved upon siding with the Carthaginians, whereto he was very inclinable before. Young men, when first they grow Masters of themselves, love to seem wiser than their Fathers, by taking different courses. And the Liberty of Hiero to the Romans, in their great necessity, had of late been such, as might have been termed excessive, were it not in regard of his providence; wherein he took order for his own estate, that depended upon theirs. But the young Nephew taking little heed of dangers far off, regarded only the things present; the weakness of Rome, the prevalent fortunes of Carthage, and the much money that his Grand-father had laid out in vain, to shoulder up a falling house. Wherefore he dealt with Hannibal, who readily entered into good correspondence with him, that was maintained by Hippocrates and Epicides, Carthaginians born, but Grand-children of a banished Syracusan. These grew into such favour with Hieronymus, that they drew him whither they listed. So that when App. Claudius the Roman Prætor, hearing what was towards, made a motion of renewing the Confederacy, between the people of Rome, and the King of Syracuse; his messengers were dismissed with an open scoff. For Hieronymus would needs have them tell him the order of the fight at Canna, that he might thereby learn how to accommodate himself, saying, that he would hardly believe the Carthaginians; so wonderful was the victory, as they reported it. Having thus dismissed the Romans, he sent Embassadors to Carthage, where he concluded a league: with condition, at first, that a great part of the Island should be annexed to his Dominion; but afterward, that he should reign over all Sicily; and the Carthaginians rest satisfied with what they could get in Italy. At these doings Appius Claudius did not greatly stir; partly for the indignities that were offered; partly for that it behoved not the Romans to entertain more quarrels than were enforced upon them by necessity; and partly (as may seem) for that the reputation, both of himself, and of his City, had received such blemish, by that which happened unto him in his journey, as much discountenanced him when he came into Sicily, and forbade him to look big. The money that Hiero had bestowed formerly upon the Romans, wherewith to relieve them in their necessity, this Appius was to carry back unto him; it being refused by the Roman Senate, with greater bravery than their present fortune would allow. But instead of returning the money with thanks, as he had been directed, and as it had been noised abroad that he should do; the war against Philip King of Macedon (whereof we have spoken before) compelled the Romans to lay aside vain-glory, and send word after him, that he should consign that money over to Marcus Valerius, of whose voyage into Greece, the City had not otherwise wherewith to bear the charge. This was done accordingly, and hereby Claudius (which name in the whole continuance of that Family is taxed with pride) his errand was changed, from a glorious ostentation of the Roman magnanimity, into such a pitiful tune of thanks-giving, as mult needs have bred sorrow and commiseration in so true a friend as Hiero; or, if it were delivered after his death, matter of pastime and scorn, in Hieronymus the new King.

But whilst Hieronymus was more desirous of war, than well resolved how to begin it;

it; his own death changed the form of things, and bred a great innovation in the State of Syracuse; which thereby might have prospered more than ever, had it been wisely governed. Hippocrates and Epicides, of whom we spake before, were sent about the Country with two thousand men, to solicit the Towns, and persuade them to shake off their obedience to the Romans. The King himself with an Army of fifteen thousand horse and foot, went to Leontium a City of his own Dominion: hoping that the fame of his preparation, would make the whole Island fall to him in all haste; and accept him for Sovereign. There the Conspirators took him on the sudden, as he was passing thorow a narrow street: and rushing between him and his guard, struck him dead. Forthwith liberty was proclaimed; and the sound of that word so joyfully answered by the Leontines, that the guard of Hieronymus had little courage to revenge their Masters death. Yet, for fear of the worst, a great largess was promised unto the Souldiers, with rewards unto their Captains; which wrought so effectually, that when many wicked acts of the murdered King were reckoned up, the Army as in detestation of his bad life, suffered his carcass to lie unburied. This news ran quickly to Syracuse; whither some of the Conspirators, taking also of the Kings horses, posted away, to signify all that had passed, to stir up the people to liberty, and to prevent Andronodorus, if he or his followers would make offer to usurp a tyranny. The Syracusians hereupon presently took arms, and made themselves Masters of their own City. Andronodorus on the other side fortified the Palace, and the Island; being yet uncertain what to do: between desire of making himself a sovereign Lord, and fear of suffering punishment as a Tyrant, if his enterprise miscarried. His wife Demarata, that was the daughter of Hiero, cherished him in his hopes; putting him in mind of that well-known Proverb, which Dionysius had used; That a Tyrant should keep his place, till he were haled out of it by the heels, and not ride away from it on horse-back. But fear, and better counsel, prevailed so far, that Andronodorus, having slept upon the matter, dissembled his affections, and deferred his hope unto better opportunity. The next day he came forth, and made a speech unto the people; telling them that he was glad to see, how prudently they behaved themselves in so great a change; that he had stood in fear, lest they would not have contained themselves within the bounds of discretion; but rather have sought to murder all without difference, that any way belonged to the Tyrant; and that, since he beheld their orderly proceeding, and their care, not to ravish their liberty perforce, but to wed it unto them for ever; he was willingly come to them forth of his strength, and surrendered up the charge committed unto him, by one that had been an evil Master both to him and them. Hereupon great joy was made, and Prætors chosen (as in former times) to govern the City, of which Andronodorus was one, and the chief. But such was his desire of Sovereignty, and so vehement were the indignations of his wife, that shortly he began to practise with Hippocrates, Epicides, and other Captains of the Mercenaries; hoping to make himself strong by their help, that were least pleased with the change. Hippocrates and Epicides had been with the Syracusan Prætors, and told them, that being sent from Hannibal to Hieronymus, they, according to instructions of their Captain, had done him, whilst he lived, what service they could; and that now they were desirous to return home. They requested therefore that they might be friendly dismissed, and with a conveyance, that might keep them from falling into the hands of the Romans, and set them safe at Locri. This was easily granted; both for that the Syracusan Magistrates were well contented to earn thanks of Hannibal; with such a little courtesie; and for that they thought it expedient, to rid their Town quickly of this troublesome couple, which were good Souldiers, and gracious with the Army, but otherwise lewd men. It was not the desire of these two Sicilians, to be gone so hastily as they made shew; they were more mindful of the business for which Hannibal had sent them. Wherefore they insinuated themselves into the bosoms of such as were most likely to fill the Army with tumult, especially of the Roman fugitives, and those that had cause to mistrust what should become of themselves, when the Romans and Syracusians were come to agreement. Such instruments as these, Andronodorus had great need of: as also of many other, to help him in his dangerous attempt. He found Themistius, that had married Harmonia, the Sister of Hieronymus, ready to take his part; as being carried with the like passions of his own, and of his wife. But seeking to increase the number of his adherents, he revealed the matter to one, that revealed all to the rest of the Prætors. Hereupon it followed, that he, & Themistius, entering into the Senate, were slain out of hand: and afterward accused to the people, of all the evil which they had done, whilest Hieronymus lived, as by his authority; and now since attempted, in seeking to usurp the tyranny themselves. It was also declared, that the daughters of Hiero and Gelo were accessory to this dangerous treason: and that the unquiet spirits of these women would never cease to work, until they had recovered those royal ornaments and Sovereign power, whereof their family was now dispossessed. These daughters therefore of Hiero and Gelo were also condemned to dye, and executioners presently sent by the enraged people, to take away their lives. Demarata and Harmonia had perhaps deserved this heavy sentence: but Heraclea, the daughter of Hiero, and wife of Solippus, being altogether innocent, was murdered, together with her two young daughters, in the hasty execution of this rash judgment. Her husband Solippus was a lover of the Common-wealth; and in that respect hated by Hieronymus, that being sent Embassador to King Polony, &c. he durst not return home, but stayed in Egypt as a banished man. This consideration when it was too late, together with some pitiful accidents accompanying the slaughter, so affected the multitude, that (pardonning themselves) all cried out upon the Authors of so foul a butchery. Being thus incensed against the Senate, and knowing not otherwise how to satisfy their anger, they called for an election of new Prætors, in the room of Andronodorus and Themistius, that were lately slain: meaning to substitute such in their places, as the Senators should have little cause to like. At the election were present a great rout, not only of the poorer Citizens, but of souldiers that pressed into the throng. One of these named Epicides Prætor; another named Hippocrates: and the less that the old Prætors and Senators approved this nomination, the more eager was the multitude; and by a general cry forced them to be accepted. These being made Prætors did what they could to hinder the agreement that was in hand, between the Syracusians and the Romans. But having striven in vain, and seeing that the people stood in fear of Ap. Claudius, and of Marcellus that was lately come into Sicily; they gave way unto the time, and suffered the old league of Hiero to be reconfirmed, which afterward they purposed to dissolve by practice. The Leontines had some need of a garriſon; and to them was sent Hippocrates the Prætor, attended by such fugitives, and mercenary souldiers, as were most burdensome to Syracuse. Thither when he came, he began to do many acts of hostility against the Romans: first in secret, afterward more openly and boldly. Marcellus, rightly understanding the purpose of these two brethren, sent word unto the Syracusians, that they had already broken the league; and that the peace would never be kept sincerely, until this turbulent pair of brethren were expelled the Island. Epicides, fearing to sustain the blame of his brothers proceedings, and more desirous to set forward the war, than to excuse any breach of peace; went himself unto the Leontines, whom he perswaded to rebel against the Syracusians. For he said, that since they had all of late served one Master, there was little reason why the Leontines should not be enfranchised by his death, as well as the Syracusians; yea or much rather, all things considered; since in their streets the Tyrant was slain, and liberty first proclaimed. Wherefore, since they of Syracuse were not contented to enjoy the Freedom purchased among the Leontines; but thought it good reason, that they should bear Dominion over those that had broken the Chain, wherewith both the one and the other were bound: his advice was, that such their arrogance should be checked betimes, ere it could get any colour of right by prescription. Hereunto occasion was given by one article of the League, made of late by the Romans and Syracusians. For it was agreed, That all which had been subject to Hiero and Hieronymus, should henceforth be Passals unto the State of Syracuse. Against this article, if the Leontines would take exception, and thereby challenge their own due; Epicides told them, that in this novelty of change, they had fit opportunity to recover the freedom, which their fathers had lost not many ages before. Neither was it unreasonable, which this crafty Carthaginian propounded; if the Leontines had been subdued by the same hand, which took liberty from the Syracusians. But seeing they had long since yielded unto Syracuse, and been subject unto that City, by what form soever it was grounded; this claim of liberty was rather reasonable, than just. Nevertheless, the motion of Epicides was highly approved: inſomuch that when messengers came soon after from Syracuse, to rebuke the Leontines, for that which they had done against the Romans; and to denounce unto Hippocrates and Epicides, that they should get them gone, either to Loeri, or whither else they listed, so that they stayed not in Sicily: word was returned, That they of Leontium had not requested the Syracusians, to make any bargains for them with the

Romans,

Romans, nor thought themselves bound to observe the covenants, which others without warrant had made in their names. This peremptory answer was forthwith reported unto Marcellus by the Syracusians; who offered him their assistance in doing justice upon the Leontines their Rebels; with condition, That when the Town was taken, it might be theirs again. Marcellus required no better satisfaction: but forth-with took the business in hand, which he dispatched in one day. At the first assault Leontium was taken, all save the Castle; whereto Hippocrates and Epicides fled: and stealing thence away by night, coveighed themselves into the Town of Herbesus. The first thing that Marcellus did, when he had won the Town, was the same, which other Roman Captains used after victory, to seek out the fugitive Roman slaves and renegado's, whom he caused all to die: the rest both of the Townsmen and Souldiers, he took to mercy, forbearing also to strip or spoil them. But the fame of his doings was bruited after a contrary fort. It was said, that he had slain Man, Woman and Child, and put the Town to sack. These news met the Syracusan Army upon the way, as it was going to joyn with Marcellus, who had ended his business before. About eight thousand Mercenaries there were, that had been sent forth of Syracuse, under Sofis and Dinomines, two of the Prætors, to serve against the Leontines and other rebels. These Captains were honest men, and well affected to their Country: but the Souldiers that followed them, had those diseases, with which all mercenaries are commonly infected. They took the matter deeply to heart, that their fellow souldiers (as now they termed those against whom they went) had been so cruelly butchered: and hereupon they fell to mutiny; though what to demand, or with whom to be angry, they could not tell. The Prætors therefore thought it best, to turn their unquiet thoughts another way, and set them a work in some place else: for as much as at Leontium there was no need of their service. So towards Herbesus they marched; where lay Hippocrates and Epicides, the architects of all this mischief, devising what further harm they might do; but now so weakly accompanied, that they seemed unable to escape the punishments belonging to their offences past. Hereof the two brethren were no less well aware; and therefore adventured upon a remedy little less desperate than their present case. They issued forth of Herbesus unarmed, with Olive branches in their hands, in manner of Suppliants; and so presented themselves to the Army. Six hundred men of Crete were in the vanguard; that had been well used by Hieronymus: and some of them greatly bound unto Hannibal, who had taken them prisoners in the Italian war, and lovingly dismissed them. These Cretians therefore welcomed the two brethren, and bade them be of good cheer, saying, That no man should do them harm, as long as they could use their weapons. Herewithall the Army was at a stand; and the rumour of this accident ran swiftly from man to man, with general approbation. The Prætors thought to help the matter by severity, which would not serve. For when they commanded these two traitors to be laid in irons, the exclamation was so violent against them, that fain they were to let all alone, and return, uncertain what course to take, unto Megara, where they were lodged the night before. Thither when they came, Hippocrates devised a trick, whereby to help himself, and better the uncertain case wherein he stood. He caused Letters of his own penning, to be intercepted by some of his most trusty Cretians, directed (as they made shew) from the Syracusan Prætors to Marcellus. The contents hereof were, That Marcellus had well done, in committing all to the sword among the Leontines: but that it further behoved him, to make the like dispatch of all the mercenaries belonging to Syracuse; which were offensive, all of them in general, to the liberty of the City, and the peace with Rome. When this counterfeit Epistle was openly rehearsed, the uproar was such, that Sofis and his fellow Prætor, were glad to forsake the Camp, and fly for their lives. All the Syracusians remaining behind, had been cut in pieces by the enraged Souldiers, if the two Artificers of the sedition had not saved their lives; rather to keep them as pledges, and by them, to win their friends within the Town, than for any good will. They perswaded also mischievous knave, that had served amongst the Leontines, to justify the bruit of Marcellus cruelty, and to carry home the news to Syracuse, as an eye-witness. This incensed not only the multitude, but some of the Senate; and filled the whole Town with causeless indignation. In good time (aid some) was the avarice and cruelty of the Romans detected: who had they in like sort gotten into Syracuse, would have dealt much worse, where their greedy appetites might have been tempted with a far greater booty. Whilst they were thus discoursing, and devising how to keep out the wicked Romans, Hippocrates with his Army came to the gates, gates, exhorting the Citizens to let him in, unless for want of help, they would be betrayed to their enemies. The Prætors, with the best and wisest of the Senate, would fain have kept him out: but the violence of the Souldiers to force a gate, was no whit greater, than the head-strong fury of those within the Town, that laboured to break it open. So he entered, and immediately fell upon the Prætors, whom (being forsaken by all men) he put to the sword, and made slaughter of them and their followers till night. The next day he went openly to work; and after the common example of Tyrants, gave liberty unto all slaves and prisoners; and being fortified with adherents of the worst and basest sort, made himself and his brother Prætors, in Title, but in effect, Lords of Syracuse.

When Marcellus was advertised of this great alteration, he thought it no time for him to sit still, and attend the further issue. He sent Embassadors to Syracuse, that were not admitted into the Haven, but chased out as enemies. Then drew he near with his Army; and lodging within a mile and a half of the Town, sent before him, some to require a parley. These were entertained without the walls by the two new Prætors: to whom they declared, That the Romans were come thither, not with purpose to do hurt, but in favour of the Syracusians, which were oppressed by Tyrants; and to punish those that had murdered and banished so many of the principal Citizens. Wherefore they required that those worthy men, their Confederates, which were chased out of the Town, might be suffered to return and enjoy their own; as also that the Authors of the great slaughter lately committed, might be delivered up. Hereto Epicides briefly answered, that if their errand had been to him, he could have told what to say to them: but since it was directed unto others, they should do well to return: when those to whom they were sent, had the government in their hands. As for the War which they threatened, he told them, they should find by experience, That to besiege Syracuse was another manner of work, than to take Leontium. Thus he sent them gone; and returned back into the City. Immediately began the siege, which endured longer than the Romans had expected, the quick and easy winning of Leontium, did put Marcellus in hope, that so long a circuit of walls as compassed Syracuse, being manned with no better kind of Souldiers, than those with whom he had lately dealt, would in some part or other, be taken at the first assault.

Wherefore he omitted no violence or terror in the very beginning; but did his best both by Land and Sea. Nevertheless all his labour was disappointed, and his hope of prevailing by open force, taken from him by the ill success of two or three of the first assaults. Yet was it not the virtue of the Defendants, or any strength of the City, that bred such despair of hasty victory. But there lived at that time in Syracuse Archimedes, the noble Mathematician: who at the request of Hiero the late King, that was his kinsman, had framed such engines of war, as being in this extremity put in use, did more mischief to the Romans than could have been wrought by the Canon, or any instruments of Gun-powder; had they in that age been known. This Archimedes discoursing once with Hiero, maintained that it were possible to remove the whole earth out of the place wherein it is, if there were some other earth, or place of sure footing, whereon a man might stand. For proof of this bold assertion, he performed some strange works, which made the King entreat him to convert his study unto things of use: that might preserve the City from danger of enemies. To such Mechanical works, Archimedes, and the Philosophers of those times, had little affection. They held it an injury done unto the liberal sciences, to submit learned Propositions unto the workmanship, and gain, of base handy-crafts men. And of this opinion Plato was an Author: who greatly blamed some Geometricians, that seemed unto him to prophane their sciences, by making it vulgar. Neither must we rashly talk a man so wise as Plato, with the fastidious singularity in his reprehension. For it hath been the unhappy fate of great inventions to be vilified, as idle fancies, or dreams, before they were published: and being once made known, to be undervalued; as falling within compass of the meanest wit; and things that every one could well have performed. Hereof (to omit that memorable example of Columbus his discovery, with the much different sorts of neglect, which he underwent before and after it) in a familiar and most homely example we may see most apparent proof. He that looks upon our English Brewers, and their servants, that are daily exercised in the Trade; will think it ridiculous to hear one say, that the making of Malt was an invention, proceeding from some of an extraordinary knowledge in natural Philosophy. Yet is not the skill of the inventors any whit the less, for that the labour of workmanship grows to be the trade of ignorant men. The like may be said of many handy-crafts: and particularly in the Printing of Books; which being devised and bettered by great scholars and wise men, grew afterward corrupted by those, to whom the practice fell; that is, by such as could slubber things easily over, and feed their workmen at the cheapest rate. In this respect therefore, the Alchymists, and all others that have, or would seem to have any secret skill, whereof the publication might do good unto mankind, are not without excuse of their close concealing. For it is a kind of injustice, that the long travels of an understanding brain, beside the loss of time, and other expence, should be cast away upon men of no worth; yield less benefit unto the Author of a great work, than to meer strangers; and perhaps his enemies. And surely, if the passion of Envy had in it any thing allowable and natural, as having Anger, Fear, and other like Affections: it is in some such case as this; and serveth against those, which would usurp the knowledge, wherewith God hath denied to induce them. Nevertheless, if we have regard unto common charity, and the great affection that every one ought to bear unto the generality of mankind, after the example of him that suffereth his Sun to shine upon the just, and unjust: it will appear more commendable in wise men, to enlarge themselves, and to publish unto the world, those good things that lay buried in their own bosoms. This ought specially to be done, when a profitable knowledge hath not annexed to it some dangerous cunning, that may be perverted by evil men to a mischievous use. For if the secret of any rare Antidote, contained in it the skill of giving some deadly and irrecoverable poison: much better it were, that such a Jewel remain close in the hands of a wife and honest man, than being made common, bind all men to use the remedy, by teaching the worst men how to do mischief. But the works which Archimedes published, were such attended unto very commendable ends. They were Engines, serving unto the defence of Syracuse; not fit for the Syracusians to carry abroad, to the hurt and oppression of others. Neither did he altogether publish the knowledge, how to use them, but reserved so much to his own direction; that after his death more of the same kind were not made, nor those of his own making were employed by the Romans. It sufficed unto this worthy man, that he had approved unto the vulgar, the dignity of his Sciences; and done especial benefit to his Country. For to enrich a Mechanical trade, or teach the Art of murdering men, it was besides his purpose. Marcellus had caused certain of his Quinquagena Gallies to be fastened together, and Towers erected on them to beat the defendants from the wall. Against these Archimedes had sundry devices; of which any one sort might have repelled the assailants: but all of them together shewed the multiplicity of his great wit. He shot heavy stones, and long pieces of timber, like unto the yards of ships; which brake some of the Gallies by their force and weight. These afflicted such as lay far off. They that were come nearer the walls, lay open to a continual volley of shot, which they could not endure. Some with an Iron grapple were taken by the prow, and hoisted up, shaking out all the men, and afterwards falling down into the water. Some by strange Engines were lifted up into the Air, where turning round a while, they were broken against the walls or cast upon the rocks: and all of them were so beaten, that they durst never come to any second assault. In the like sort was the Land Army handled. Stones and timber, falling upon it like hail, did not only overwhelm the men, but brake down the Roman Engines of battery; and forced Marcellus to give over the assault. For the remedy hereof it was conceived, that if the Romans could early before day get near unto the walls, they should be (as it were) under the point-blank, and receive no hurt by these terrible Instruments; which were wound up hard to shoot a great compass. But this vain hope cost many of the assailants lives: For the shot came down right upon them; and beating them from all parts of the wall, made a great slaughter of them, all the way as they fled (for they were unable to tarry by it) even till they were gotten very far off. This did so terrify the Romans, that if they perceived any piece of timber, or a ropes end, upon the wall, they ran away, crying out, That Archimedes his Engines were ready to discharge. Neither knew Marcellus how to overcome these difficulties, or to take away from his men, that fear, against the cause whereof he knew no remedy. If the Engines had stood upon the walls, subject to firing, or any such annoyance from without; he might have helped it by some device, to make them unserviceable. But all, or the most of them were out of sight, being erected in the streets behind the walls; where Archimedes gave directions how to use them. Wherefore the Roman had no other way left, than to cut off from the Town all provision of victuals, both by Land and by Sea.

This

This was a very desperate piece of work. For the enemies having so goodly an Haven; the Sea in a manner free; and the Carthaginians that were strong by Sea, willing to supply them: were not likely to soon to be consumed with famine, as the besiegers to be wearied out, by lying in Leaguer before so strong a City, having no probability to carry it. Yet, for want of better counsel to follow, this was thought the best, and most honourable course.

In the mean while, Himilco, Admiral of a Carthaginian Fleet, that had waited long about Sicily, being by Hippocrates advertised of these passages, went home to Carthage, and there so dealt with the Senate, that five and twenty thousand Foot, three thousand Horses and twelve Elephants, were committed unto his charge, wherewith to make war upon the Romans in Sicily by Land. He took many Towns; and many that had anciently belonged unto the Carthaginians did yield unto him. To remedy this mischief and to stay the inclination of men, which following the current of Fortune, began to turn unto the Carthaginians; Marcellus with a great part of his Army, rose from Syracuse, and went from place to place about the Island. He took Felorus and Herbesus, which yielded unto him. He took also Agar by force and sackt it: either to terrifie others that were obstinate, especially the Syracusians, or else because Rome was at this time poor, and his Army must have somewhat to keep it in heart. His especial desire was to have saved Agrigentum: whether he came too late; for Himilco had gotten it before. Therefore he returned back toward Syracuse; carefully, and in as good order as he could, for fear of the Carthaginian that was too strong for him. The circumspection that he used, in regard of Himilco, stood him in good stead against a danger that he had not mistrusted. For Hippocrates, leaving the charge of Syracuse unto his brother, had lately issued out of the City, with ten thousand foot, and five hundred horse, intending to joyn his forces with Himilco. Marcellus fell upon him, ere either was aware of the other: and the Romans, being in good order, got an easie victory against the dispersed and half unarmed Syracusians. The reputation hereof helped a little to keep the Sicilians from rebellion. Yet it was not long, ere Himilco, joyning with Hippocrates, ran over all the Island at his pleasure, and presented battail to Marcellus, even at his Trenches; but the Roman wisely refused it. Bomilcar also a Carthaginian, entered with a great fleet into the Haven of Sy- racuse, and victualled the City. After this, the disposition of the Islanders changed for again, that although another Legion was come from Rome, which escaped from Himilco, and safely arrived at Marcellus his Camp: yet many places revolted unto the Carthaginians, and slew or betrayed the Roman Garri- sons.

In the midst of these troubles, Winter enforced both parts to take breath a while: and Marcellus, leaving some of his Army before Syracuse, that he might not seem to have given over the siege, went unto Leontium, where he lay intentive to all occasions. In the beginning of the Spring he stood in doubt, whether it were better to continue the laborious work of besieging Syracuse, or to turn all his forces to Agrigentum, against Himilco and Hippocrates. But it would greatly have impaired his reputation, if he had gone from Syracuse: as unable to prevail; and he himself was of an eager disposition, ever unwilling to give ground, or to quit, as not feasible, an enterprise that he had once taken in hand. He came therefore to Syracuse; where though he found all the difficulties remaining as before; and no likelihood to take the City by force or famine; yet was he not without hope, that continuance of time would bring forth somewhat, which might fulfill his desire. Especially he assayed to prevail by treason; against which no place can hold out. And to this end he dealt with the Syracusan Gentlemen that were in his Camp; exhorting them to practice with their friends that remained in the City. This was not easie for them to do; because the Town would hearken to no parlee. At length a slave unto one of these banished men, making shew to run away from his Master, got into Syracuse; where he talked in private with some few, as he had been instructed. Thus began Marcellus to have intelligence within the City: whence the Conspirators used to send him advertisement of their proceedings, by a fisher-boat that passed forth in the night: but when they were grown to the number of fourscore, and thought themselves able to effect somewhat of importance, all was discovered; and they like Traitors put to death. In the mean while, one Damaspis a Lacedemonian, that had been sent out of the Town as an Ambassador to Philip King of Macedon, was fallen into the hands of Marcellus. Epicles was very desirous to ransom him: and many meetings were appointed for that purpose, not far from the walls. There, one of the Romans looking upon the wall, and wanting the more compendious Art of Geometry, fell to numbering numbring the Stones: and making an estimate of the height, judged it less than it had been formerly deemed. Herewith he acquainted Marcellus: who causing better notice to be taken of the place; and finding that ladders of no extraordinary length would reach it, made all things ready, and waited a convenient time. It was the weakest part of the Town, and therefore the most strongly guarded: neither was there hope to prevail by force against Archimedes, if they failed to take it by surprize. But a fugitive out of the Town brought word, that a great feast was to be held unto Diana, which was to last three dayes: and that, because other good cheer was not so plentiful within the City, as in former times, Epicles, to gratifie the people, had made the more large distribution of wine. A better opportunity could not be wished. Wherefore Marcellus in the dead of the Festival night, came unto the walls, which he took by Scalado. Syracuse was divided into four parts (or five, if Epipole were reckoned as one) each of which were fortified as distinct Cities. When therefore Marcellus had gotten some pieces, he had the commodity of a better and safe longing, with good store of booty; and better opportunity than before, to deal with the rest. For there were now a great many, as well of those in Acradinia and the Island, inner parts of the Town, as of those that were already in the hands of Marcellus, that began to hearken unto composition, as being much terrified by the loss of those parts, which the Romans had taken and sackt. As for the weapons of Archimedes, little harm, or none they did, unto those that were sheltered under strong houles: although it may seem, that the inner walls were not altogether unfurnished of his help; since they held out a good while, and were not taken by force. The Roman fugitives and Renegades, were more careful than ever to defend the rest of the City: being sure to be rewarded with cruel death, if Marcellus could prevail. Hippocrates and Himilco, were daily expected; and Bomilcar was sent away to Carthage, to bring help from thence. It was not long ere Hippocrates and Himilco came: who fell upon the old Camp of the Romans, whilst Epicles sallied out of Acradinia upon Marcellus. But the Romans made such defence in each part, that the Assaults were repelled. Nevertheless they continued to beset Marcellus: whom they held in a manner as straightly besieged, as he himself did besedge the Town. But the pestilence at length consumed, together with the two Captains, a great part of the Army, and cau-

led the rest to dislodge. The Romans were (though somewhat less) afflicted with the same pestilence, in so much that Bomilcar did put the City of Carthage in hope, that he might be taken where he lay, if any great forces were sent thither. This Bomilcar wanted no desire to do his Country service: but his courage was not answerable to his good will. He arrived at Pachinus with a strong fleet: where he stayed; being loth to double the Cape; for that the winds did better serve the enemy than him. Thither sailed Epicles out of Syracuse: to acquaint him with the necessities of the City; and to draw him on. With much intreaty, at length he came forward: but meeting with the Roman fleet, that was ready for him, he stood off into the deep; and sailed away to Tarentum, bidding Sicily farewell. Then durst not Epicles return into Syracuse, but went to Agrigentum: where he expected the issue; with a very faint hope of hearing any good news.

The Sicilian Souldiers that remained alive of Hippocrates his Army, lay as near as they could safely, unto Marcellus, and some of them, in a strong Town three miles off. These had done what good they could to Syracuse, by doing what hurt they could unto the Romans. But when they were informed, that the State of Sicily was given as desperate by the Carthaginians: they sent Embassadors to treat of peace; and made offer to compound, both for themselves, and for the Town. Herunto Marcellus willingly gave ear: for he had stayed there long enough; and had cause to fear, that after a little while, the Carthaginians might come thither strong again. He therefore agreed both with the Citizens, and with the Souldiers that lay abroad; that they should be Masters of their own, enjoying their liberty and proper laws; yet suffering the Romans to possess whatsoever had belonged unto the Kings. Hereupon they, to whom Epicles had left his charge, were put to death, new Prators chosen; and the gates even ready to be opened unto Marcellus: when suddenly the Roman fugitives disturbed all. These perceiving their own condition to be desperate, perfwading the other Mercenary Souldiers, that the Citizens had bargained only for themselves, and betrayed the Army to the Romans. Wherefore they presently took Arms, and fell upon the new chosen Prators; whom they slew, and made election of six Captains that should command over all. But shortly it was found out, that there was no danger at all to the Souldiers; excepting only the fugitives. The Treaty was therefore again set on foot, and wanted little of conclusion: which yet was delayed; either by some fear of the Citizens, that had seen (as they thought) proof of the Roman avarice in the sack of Epipola Tyche, and Neapolis; the parts already taken; or by some desire of Marcellus to get the Town by force, that he might use the liberty of a Conqueror, and make it wholly subject to Rome. Mercius a Spaniard was one of the six Captains that had been chosen in the last commotion: a man of such faith, as usually is found in Mercenaries; holding his own particular benefit above all other respects. With this Captain, Marcellus dealt secretly: having a fit instrument, of the same Nation, one Belligens, that went in company with the Roman Embassadors, daily passing to and fro. This crafty Agent persuaded Mercius, That the Romans had already gotten all Spain: and that if ever he purposed to make his own fortune good, either at home in Spain, or any where else; it was now the only time to do it; by conforming himself to the will of the Roman General. By such hopes the Spanish Captain was easily won, and sent forth his own brother among the Syracusan Embassadors to ratify the covenant with Marcellus.

This under-hand dealing of Marcellus against the Syracusians, cannot well be commended as honest: neither was it afterwards thoroughly approved at his coming to Rome. For the benefits of Hiero to the Romans had been such, as deserved not to be requited with the ruine of his Country: much less, that the miseries of his people, oppressed (though partly through their own folly) by an Army of Mercenaries, should minister unto the people of Rome, advantage against them. The poor Citizens could not make good their parts against the hired Souldiers; and therefore were fain to yield unto the time, and obey those Ministers of Hannibal, that ruled the Army. But as long as they were free after the death Hieronymus; and now of late, when they had gathered courage by the flight of Epicles: it had been their chief care to maintain amity with the people of Rome. They had lately slain many the principal of Epicles his followers; and many of themselves had also been slain, both lately and in former times, because of this their desire unto the peace. What though it were true, that the Rascality, and some ill advised persons; joyed with the fouldiers in hatred of the Romans, by occasion of the slaughter which they heard to be done at Leontium, and afterward beheld in those parts of their own City which was taken? Ought therefore the Roman General, in a treaty of peace held with the Syracusians, to make a bargain under-hand against them, with a Captain of the Mercenaries? These things were objected against Marcellus, at his return home: but the Senators thought it a great deal better, to comfort the Syracusians with gentle words, and promise of good usage in time to come; than to restore the booty, and give over the Dominion of a City, so great, wealthy, strong, and many ways important. Nevertheless if we consider the many inconveniences and great mischiefs whereunto Syracuse was obnoxious; both by evil neighbours, and by that very form of policy, after which it was governed we may truly affirm, that it received no small benefit, by becoming subject unto Rome. For thereby it was not only assured against all foreign enemies, domesticall conspiracies, and such Tyrants as of old had reigned therein; but freed from the necessity of banishing, or murdering, the most worthy Citizens; as also from all factions, intestine seditions, and a thousand the like miseries, that were wont to grow out of the jealousy, wherein they held their liberty in vain. Neither enjoyed that City, from her first foundation, any such long time of happiness, as that wherein it flourished, when it rested secure under the protection of Rome; and was no more molested, by the disease of ambition; wherewith by Marcellus his victory it was thoroughly cured. But such benefit, arising from wrongs done, serves not to make injustice the more excusable: unless we should approve the answer of that thief, who being found to have stolen a silver cup from sick man, said, He never leaves drinking.

By the reason of Marcus, the Roman Army was let into possession of all Syracuse: wherein, the booty that it found, was said to have been no less, than could be hoped for, if they had taken Carthage it self; that maintained war by Land and Sea against them. All the goodly works and Imageries, wherewith Syracuse was marvellously adorned, were carried away to Rome; and nothing left untouched; save only the houses of those banished men, that had escaped from Hippocrates and Epicles, into the Roman Camp. Among other pitiful accidents; the death of Archimedes was greatly lamented, even by Marcellus himself. He was so buſie about his Geometry, in drawing figures, that he hearkened not to the noise, and uproar in the City, nor greatly attended the rude Souldier that was about to kill him. Marcellus took heavily the death of him; and caused his body to be honourably buried. Upon his Tomb (as he had ordained in his lifetime) was placed a Cylinder and a Sphere, with an inscription of the proportion between them; which he first found out. An invention of so little use, as this may seem, pleased that great Artist better, than the devising of all those Engines, that made him so famous. Such difference is in the judgement of learned men, and of the vulgar sort. For many an one would think the money lost, that had been spent upon a Son, whose studies in the University had brought forth such fruit, as the proportion between a Sphere and a Cylinder.

After the taking of Syracuse, all the Towns in Sicily yielded unto the Romans, except Agigentum and a few places thereabout. At Agigentum lay Epicles with one Hanno a Carthaginian, and Mutines an African, that was lately sent from Hannibal. This Mutines by many good pieces of service, had added some credit to the beaten Carthaginian side; and withall made his own name great. By his persuasions, Hanno and Epicles adventured to meet Marcellus without the Town, and not behave themselves as men expecting to be besieged. Neither was he more valiant in counsel, than in execution. Once and again he set upon the Romans, where they lay encamped, and drove them fearfully into their Trenches. This bred envy in Epicles and Hanno; especially in Hanno, that having been lately sent from Carthage, with commission and authority from the State, thought himself wronged greatly by Hannibal; in that he had sent unto him this Mutines, to be his companion, and to take upon him, like as good a man as himself. The indignity seemed the greater, when Mutines being to step aside into Heraclia, for the pacifying some troubles there among the Namidians; advised (as directing Hanno and Epicles) not to meddle with the enemy, until his return. So much therefore the rather would Hanno fight; and offered battle unto Marcellus, before he sought it. It is like, that a great part of the Roman Army was left behind in Syracuse, as need required; which made the Carthaginians the better able to deal with those that came against them. But whatsoever disproportion was between the two Armies; far greater were the odds between the Captains. For howsoever the people of Carthage would give authority by favour; yet could they not give worth and ability, in matter of war. The Namidians, having before conceived some displeasure against their Captains; and being therefore some of them gone away to Heraclia, were much more offended, when they saw that the vain-glorious envy of Hanno carried him unto the fight, upon a foolish desire to get victory, without the help of Mutines their Country-man. Wherefore they sent unto the Roman General, and bade him be confident; for that it was not their purpose to shew themselves his enemies that day, but only look on, and see the proud Carthaginians well beaten by whom they had been misused. They made good their promise, and had their desire. For Marcellus, finding likelihood of truth in their message, did so lustily set upon the enemies, that he brake them at the first charge; and with the slaughter of many thousands, drove them back into Agigentum.

If Hanno could have been contented, to follow the directions of one, that was a better man of War than himself, and not to have hazarded a battle without need; the Romans would shortly have been reduced into terms of great difficulty in their Sicilian War. For Marcellus was shortly after to leave the Province; and soon upon his departure, there landed in the Island a supply of eight thousand foot, and three thousand Numidian horse, that were sent from Carthage. The fame of this new Army drew many of the Sicilians into rebellion. The Roman Army consisting (for the most part) of the Legions of Canne, took it very haughtily, that no good service done, could bring them into the favour of the Senate; but that, as banished men, they were sent far from home, and not suffered to return back to Rome with their General. Mutines had pacified his Country-men the Numidians, and like an honest man, did what he could for those whom he served, without contending against the foolish pride of Hanno; finding that there was a great alteration; and a greater might have been, if the Army lately overthrown had been entire. Al. Cornelius the Roman Prator, used all diligence, both to pacifie his own men, and to hinder the Carthaginians. He recovered those Island towns that had rebelled: and though he could not hinder Mutines from over-running all the Country; yet he hindered the Country from revolting unto Mutines. Above three-score Towns, great and small, the Carthaginians held in Sicily: of which Agigentum was the principal, and far bigger than any of the rest. Thence issued Mutines as often as he pleased, in despite of the Romans: not only to the succour of his own adherents, but to the great waste of those that followed the contrary part. But Hanno, instead of being pleased with all these good services, was filled more and more with envy, against the man that performed them. He had (belike) received instruction from old Hanno at Carthage, not to suffer Hannibal, or any Hannibalian, to have a share in the honour of these Sicilian Wars: which were therefore perhaps the more diligently supplied; whilst Italy was neglected, that should have been regarded more than all the rest. Wherefore to shew his authority, and that it was not in the power of Hannibal, to appoint unto him an Assistant, or Director: He took away from Mutines his charge, and gave it to his own Son; thinking thereby to discountenance the man, and make him little esteemed, as one out of Office, among the Numidians. But it fell out quite contrary: and this spiteful dealing occasioned the loss of whatsoever the Carthaginians held in Sicily. For the Numidians were so incensed by the indignity offered unto their Country-man, being such a brave Commander, that they offered him their service to requite the wrong; and were thenceforth absolutely at his own disposition. M. Valerius Levinus, the Roman Consul, was newly come into the Province, when this fell out: and with him did Mutines enter into intelligence. For he could no longer brook these indignities; but being neither a Carthaginian, nor favoured by those that bore all the sway in Carthage: He thought it the wisest way, to play the best of his own game, and forsake that City, which was likely to perish by the evil counsel that governed it. He did not therefore, as his Country-men had lately done, content himself to see his Adversaries reap the bitter fruits of his own malicious over-weening: and to suffer that harm, in doing whereof he would not bear a part; but conspired against them to deliver up Aggrigentum, and to help to expel them utterly out of Sicily. The Consul was glad of his friendship; and carefully followed his advertisements. Neither was there much cunning needful, to the performance of that which Mutines had undertaken: For he with his Numidians did forcibly seize upon a gate; whereat they let in some Roman Companies, that lay near in a readiness for the purpose. Hanno, when first he heard the noise, thought it had been no worse matter, than some such tumult of the Numidians, as he had been well acquainted with of late. But when, making haste to pacify the trouble, he saw and heard, the Romans intermixed, among those discontented followers of Mutines, forthwith he becook himself to flight: and saving himself, with Epicides, in a small Bark, set sail for Africk; leaving all his

Army and Adherents in Sicily, to the mercy of the Romans; that henceforward continued Matters of the whole Island.

Levinus the Consul having taken Aggrigentum, did sharp execution of justice upon all the Citizens. The principal of them he scourged with rods, and afterwards beheaded, as was the manner of the Romans: all the rest of them he sold for slaves, and confiscated their goods; sending home to Rome the money that was raised of the booty. This was indeed a time, wherein Rome stood in no less necessity of gold, than of steel: which may have been the reason, why Levinus dealt so cruelly with the Aggrigentines. Nevertheless, the fame of such severity bred a terror among all the Dependents of the Carthaginians, so that in great haste they sought to make their peace. About forty Towns yielded themselves quickly unto the Romans; twenty were delivered up by Treason; and six only stayed to be won by force. These things done, Levinus returned home to Rome; carrying with him about four thousand men from Agathina; that were a company of out-laws, bankrouts, and banished men accustomed to live by spoil of others in these troublesome times. He bestowed them about Rhegium in Italy, where they might exercise their own occupation against the Britanni; a thievish kind of people, that were enemies unto those of Rhegium, and to the Romans. As for Mutines, he was well rewarded, and made Citizen of Rome: where he lived in good account; accompanying the two Scipio's in their journey against Antiochus, and therein doing (as it is said) very especial service. So by this enterprise of Sicily, the Carthaginians wasted much of their forces, that with greater profit might have been employed in Italy: leaving yet unto the Romans, in the end of this war, the entire possession of this Island; which they wanted when it began.

How the War passed between the Romans and Hannibal in Italy, from the taking of Capua to the great victory of Metaurus.

Shortly after the winning of Capua, Marcus came to Rome: where for his good services done in the Island of Sicily, he had granted unto him the honour of the lesser Triumph, which was called Ovation. The greater Triumph was denied him: because he had not finished the war, but was fain to leave his Army behind him in the Province. He stayed not long in Rome, before he was again chosen Consul together with M. Valerius Levinus, who succeeded ceeded him in the Government of Sicily, and was, at the time of his election, making war against King Philip in Greece. Great Complaint was made against the Consul Marcellus, by the Syracusians, for that which he had done unto them: they alleging their great friendship to the people of Rome, in the time of their late King Hiero; and affirming, that their City did never willingly break the alliance; excepting when it was oppressed by such Tyrants, as were not greater enemies to Rome, than to all good men that lived in Syracuse. The Consul, on the other side, reckoned the labours & dangers whereunto they had put him: willing them to bemoan themselves to the Carthaginians that had holpen them in their necessity; and not unto the Romans, whom they had kept out. Thus each part having some good matter to allege, the Senate made such an end of the controversy, as best agreed with the benefit of their own Common-wealth: blaming the too much rigour of Marcellus; yet not restoring the booty that he had taken, nor making the Syracusians free from their subjection, but comforting them with gentle words, and hopeful promises, as hath been shewed before. The two new Consuls Marcellus and Levinus, were appointed to make war, as their lots should fall out; the one in Italy, the other in Sicily. The Isle of Sicily fell unto Marcellus, which Province he willingly changed with his Colleague; to the end that the Syracusians (whose cause had not as yet been heard in the Senate) might not seem hindered by fear, from uttering their grievances freely. Afterwards, when his business with them was dispatch, he gently undertook the patronage of them: which remained long in his Family, to the great benefit of their Country in times following. So Valerius, the other Consul, was sent into Sicily, whose doings there have been already rehearsed: but Marcellus was employed against Hannibal.

Before the Consuls departed out of Rome, they were much troubled with pressing of Soldiers to the war, and most of all, with getting Mariners for their Navy. They were all of the poorer sort, that used to be employed in Sea-services, especially in rowing. These could not live without present wages: neither was there money enough in the Treasury to give them pay. Wherefore it was ordained, that they should be set out at the expence of private men; who in this necessity of the State, were driven to sustain all publick charges. Hereat the people murmured, and were ready to fall into sedition; had not the Consuls deferred the matter unto further consideration. The Senate could ill tell, what to determine or do, in a case of such extremity. For manifest it was, that the multitude had already endured so much, as well it could undergo; and somewhat more, than could with honesty have been imposed upon it. Nevertheless it was impossible to maintain the war against the Carthaginians; or to keep the Macedonian out of Italy without a strong fleet. Wherefore, some were of opinion; That since the common Treasure was so empty, the people must be forced, by right or wrong, to take the burden upon them. At last the Consuls began to say, That no persuasions would be so effectual with the people, as good examples: and that if the Senators would follow the Consuls, like it was that the people also would follow the Senate. Wherefore they propounded, and it was immediately concluded, that every one of them should bring forth, and put into the Treasury, all the money that he had; and that no Senator should keep any vessel of gold, or plate whatsoever, excepting one Salt-seller, and a Bowl wherewith to make their offerings unto the gods; as also a Ring for himself, with such other tokens of ingenuity for his wife and children, as every one did use, and those of as small value as might be. This advice of the Consuls was not more thankfully accepted by the Senate, than the ready performance thereof by the Senate was highly applauded, and hastily followed by the Gentlemen of Rome. Neither did the Commonalty refuse to do that, which their betters had openly done before them. For since the publick necessity could no otherwise be holpen; every one was contented, that his private estate should run the same fortune with the Common-wealth, which if it suffered wrack, in vain could any particular man hope to enjoy the benefit of his proper subsistence. This magnanimity deserved well that greatness of Empire, whereof it was the foundation.

Convenient order being thus taken for an Army and Fleet; Marcellus went forth of the City against Hannibal: and Levinus toward Sicily. The Army of Hannibal was greatly diminished, by long and hard service: neither did his Carthaginians seem to remember him, and think upon sending the promised supply, or any such proportion as he needed. His credit also among his Italian friends, which gave them cause to look unto themselves; as if in his help there were little trust to be reposed, when they should stand in need. This he well perceived; yet could not tell how to remedy. Either he must thrust Garrisons into all the Towns that he suspected, and thereby to diminish his Army, that he should not be able to keep the field; or else he must leave them to their own fidelity, which now began to waver. At length his jealousy grew so outrageous, that he sacked and wasted those places that he was unable to defend: thinking that the best way to enrich himself; and make unprofitable to his enemies, the purchase from which he could not hinder them. But by this example, many were quite alienated from him: and some of those, whom before he had least cause to doubt. The Town of Salapia yielded unto Marcellus; and betrayed unto him a gallant Regiment of Numidian horse, the best of all that served under Hannibal; which was a greater loss, than the Town itself. Blasius the author of this rebellion, could not bring his desire to effect; without getting the consent of one Dassus, that was his bitter enemy. Wherefore he brake the matter to this Dassus in private, and was by him accused unto Hannibal. But when he was convicted and charged of Treason, he so stoutly denied it, and by way of recrimination, so vehemently pressed his accuser with the same fault: that Hannibal thought it a matter devised out of meer malice; knowing well what enemies they were; and seeing that neither of them could bring any proof of what he affirmed. This notwithstanding, Blasius did not cease to press his adversary anew, and urge him from time to time, with such lively reason; that he who could not be believed by Hannibal, was contented at length to win the favour of Marcellus. Presently after this, the Consul took by force, Maronia and Maler, Towns of the Samnites; wherein he slew above three thousand of Hannibal's men.

Hannibal could not look to all at once; but was fain to catch advantages, where he might get them; the Romans now being grown stronger in the field than he. The best was, that his Carthaginians, having wearied themselves with ill speed in many petty enterprises, and laid aside all this while the care of Italy, to follow business of far less importance; had now at length resolved, to send presently the great supply, that had been so long promised and expected. This, if they had done in better season; Rome it self might have been stricken down, the next year after that great blow received at Cannæ. But since that which is past cannot be amended; Hannibal must force himself to make a good countenance; and tell his followers; that this mighty succour would come time enough. For Masaniissa was at Carthage with five thousand Numidians, ready to set sail for Spain; whither, when he came, it was appointed that Asdrubal should forthwith take his journey into Italy, of which there had been so much talk. These news did not more comfort Hannibal and his followers, than terrify the Romans. Wherefore each did their best; and the Romans, to prevent the threatening mischief, and win as much as they could upon Hannibal, before the coming of his Brother; Hannibal, on the contrary, to hold his own, and weaken the Romans as much as he was able. He had intelligence, that Cn. Fulvius, a Roman Praetor, lay near unto Herdonia, to get the Town by practice. It was not long since, near unto the same place, another Cn. Fulvius had lost his Army. Therefore Hannibal made great marches thitherwards; and came to Herdonia ere Fulvius heard news of his approach. As soon as he came, he offered battle to the Roman Praetor; who accepted it with more haste than good speed. The Roman Legions made good resistance a while, till they were compassed round with the Carthaginian horse. Then fell they to rout, and great slaughter was made of them. Fulvius himself, with twelve Tribunes or Coronels, were lost: of the common Soldiers, that were slain, the number is uncertain; some reporting seven, others thirteen thousand. The Town of Herdonia, because it was at point to have yielded unto Fulvius, Hannibal did set on fire; and putting those to death that had practised with the Enemy, carried away the multitude; whom he bestowed among the Thurians and Metapontines. The Consul Marcellus hearing of this, wrote unto the Senate: and exhorted them to be of good cheer; for that he would shortly abate the enemies pride. He followed the Carthaginian army; and overtaking him at Nunistro in the Country of the Lucani, fought with him a battle: which beginning at nine of the clock in the morning, lasted until night, and ended, by reason of the darkness, with uncertain victory. Afterward Hannibal departed thence into Apulia, whither Marcellus followed him. At Venusia they met, and had many skirmishes; but none of importance. Hannibal removed often; and sought to bring the enemy within danger of some ambush. But Marcellus, though he was very eager of battle, would yet adventure nothing, but by open day-light, and upon fair ground.

Thus passed the time away, until Q. Fabius Maximus, and Q. Fulvius, he that lately had taken Capua, were chosen Consuls. Fabius considering how much the Roman affairs were bettered by the taking of Capua, purposed purposed that year to besiege Tarentum: which if he could win; like it was, that scarce one good City would afterwards remain true to Hannibal. Wherefore he vehemently exhorted his Colleague, and Marcellus, (to whom was continued them command of those Legions that served under him the year before) to press the Carthaginian so hard, as he might have no leisure to help Tarentum. Marcellus was very glad of this charge: for he thought no Roman fitter than himself, to deal with Hannibal in open field. He followed him therefore to Cannussum, and thence from place to place: desiring ever to come to battle, but upon equal terms. The Carthaginian had not mind to hazard much in fight: but thought it enough to entertain his enemy with skirmish; as being desirous to keep his Army strong until the coming of Asdrubal. Yet could he not avoid the importunity of Marcellus, nor brook the indignity of being daily braved. He therefore bade his men to be lusty, and to beat soundly this hot-spirited Roman Captain, that would never suffer them to be at quiet; until they once had cooled well his courage, by letting him blood. Hereupon followed a battle; wherein Hannibal had the victory; took six Engis; and slew of the Romans almost three thousand, among which were some of mark. Marcellus was so impatient of his dishonour, that he rated his men, as Pelants, and base cowards: telling them, that they were the first of the Roman Legions; which had been beaten by Hannibal, by plain force and manhood, without being circumvented by any stratagem. With these and many other the like words, which they were ashamed to hear, he did so vex them; that thinking themselves better able to endure any violence of the enemy, than such displeasure of their General; they besought him to pardon them, and lead them forth once again to fight. He did so: and placing those Companies foremost, that had lost their Engis the day before, bade them be careful to win a victory; whereof the news might be at Rome, before the report of their shameful overthrow. Hannibal was angry, to see that nothing could make this Enemy quite: and therefore was ready to fight again; since all other motives, continued the same, and his men had been heartened by the late victory. But the Romans were stirred up with desire of revenge, and of repairing their honour lost, which affections gave a sharp edge unto their valour: whereas the Carthaginians were grown dull, and weary by seeing themselves disappointed of their hope; and the enemy, notwithstanding their late victory, as ready to molest them as before. In this second battle Marcellus got the victory: which he purchased at so dear a rate; that neither he, nor Hannibal, had great cause to vaunt, the next night. For if eight thousand of the Carthaginians were slain, and three thousand of the Roman side, in this next battle, the difference was no greater, than even to recompence the late received overthrow: especially since the number of the Romans that were wounded, was so great, as disabled Marcellus from pursuing Hannibal, who dislodged by night. Nevertheless it sufficed, that Fabius the Consul hereby got leisure, to follow his business at Tarentum without any disturbance. Q. Fulvius the other Consul about the same time, took in many of the Hirpines, Lucani, and Volentes, that willingly yielded themselves, and betrayed the Garrisons of Hannibal that lay in their Towns: whom Fulvius entertained in loving sort; gently rebuking them for their errors past, without punishing those that had been authors, or bulwark doers in the rebellion. That rabble of Sicilian thieves, which Levinus had lately brought from Agaturna, was then also set on work to besiege Canusina, a Town of the Brutians: and nothing was omitted, that might serve to divert Hannibal, from the succour of Tarentum.

Q. Fabius the Consul, having taken Manduria a Town of the Salentines, fate down before Tarentum: making all preparation that seemed needful to carry it either by assault or long siege. Of the Garrisons in the Town, a good part were Brutians, placed there by Hannibal, under a Captain of their own Nation. This Captain fell in love with a Tarentine wench: whose brother served under Fabius. Hereof he gave notice by letters to her brother, as thinking belike to draw him from the Roman side; by telling him how rich, and of what great account her lover was. But her brother made the Consul acquainted with these news: and said, that if the Brutian were far in love, he might perhaps be won, by intreaty of his Mistress, to do what she would have him. The Consul hearing this, and finding likelihood in the matter, willed his souldier to convey himself into the Town as a fugitive, and try what good might be done. It fell out according to his desire. The Souldier grew acquainted with this Brutian Captain: and partly by his own persuasions, partly by the flattering intreaty of his sister; was him to betray the Town to the Romans. When they had agreed upon the business, and

and resolved how to order it; the same Souldier got out of the Town by night, and acquainted the Consul with his proceedings: telling him in which part that Brutian kept watch, and what might conveniently be done. So in the night time, Fabius gave an alarm to the City; especially about those parts of the wall, which were farthest from the place where he meant to enter. The Captains in the Town, prepared to make resistance in those places, where the noise did threaten them with greatest likelihood of danger. But Fabius himself with the choice of his men, came in great silence to the quarter of the Brutians: who being wrought by their Captain, helped the Romans to get up, and break open the next gate, whereat the Army was let in. The Tarentines and Carthaginian Souldiers, made head against Fabius in the Market place: but (as hapneth in like cases, where the main confidence is already taken away) not very obstinately. Nico, Democritus and Philomenus, with those that before had let in Hannibal, used now the last of their courage in dying against the Romans. Carthalo, who commanded the Garrison within the Town, offered himself prisoner: hoping to be well used, because of his hospitality that had passed between his Father and the Consul. But he was slain by the way, ere he could come at Fabius. The Romans did put all indifferently to the sword, in such sort, that they spared few of the Brutians. This slaughter of the Brutian, was thought to have been made by appointment of the Consul, to the end that he might seem to have won the Town by force and not by treason: though he thereby failed of his purpose; and neither had the glory which he expected, nor preserved his reputation of faithful dealing, and keeping his word. The booty found in Tarentum was very great: wherefore the Roman Treasury, whither it was carried, had great need. As for the Imageries, and other curiosities that were in the City, Fabius was contented to let them alone; and being told of some Idols that seemed worthy to be carried away, being very goodly pieces, in such habit and posture as if they were fighting; he said, Let us leave unto the Tarentines their angry gods.

Hannibal being gotten clear from Marcellus, fell upon those that besieged Caulonia. They fled at his coming; but he was so near, that they were fain to betake them to a hill, which served to no other purpose, than to bear off the first burnt. There they defended themselves a little while, and then they yielded. When this business was done, he hasted away to relieve Tarentum. But when he came within five miles of the City, he had news that it was lost. This grieved him; yet he said no more than this, The Romans have also their Hannibal; we have lost Tarentum in such sort as we got it. That he might not seem to turn back amazed, or in any fear of the victorious Consul; he incamped a few days together, to fear as he was unto Tarentum; and thence departed to Metapontum; bethought himself how to take Fabius in a trap. He caused the chief of the Metapontines to write unto Fabius, and offer to betray into his hands, the Carthaginian Garrison, with condition, that he should in that respect, forgive them all offences past. These letters were sent by two young men of the same City; who did their errand so well, that the Consul wrote back by them unto the Metapontines, and appointed the day, when they should expect him. Hereof Hannibal was exceeding glad: and at good leisure made ready his ambushes for the wary Fabius. But whether some secret notices of the plot were given; or whether indeed (as it is related) some tokens in sacrificing, terrified the superstitious Romans; the journey to Metapontum was deferred. Hereupon the same two Messengers were employed again; but being apprehended, and threatened with torture, they discovered all.

This year was happy to the Romans, in all their wars: for they got every where, save only at Caulonia; where they had lost a company of such lewd fellows, that it may seem good fortune, to have been so rid of them. But their common poverty, and disability to maintain their charge, continued, and grew greater than it was before. Thirty Roman Colonies were then in Italy; of which, twelve refused to contribute any longer to the Wars. For it was considered; that the Legions of Cannæ, and those unhappy Companies that had been beaten under the one and the other Cn. Fulvius, were transported unto Sicily; where they lived, in a sordid, as banished men. This grieved their friends at home, and made them reckon up the more diligently those other miseries which they daily felt. Ten years together they had been exhausted with levies of men, and impositions of money: in every of which years they had received some notable overthrow. In this case the least that they could fear; or rather the best that they could hope was; to fall into the hands of the enemy to be made prisoners. For Hannibal did gently send home their people that was taken by him; whereas the Romans did banish from their homes, those that had escaped. It was therefore likely to come to pass within a while, that they should be all consumed: since new souldiers were daily pressed forth of their Towns; and the old ones never returned. Sweet talk was frequent among those of the Colonies: especially where they that were transported into Sicily, had most compassionate friends. Wherefore it was concluded by the people of Ardea, Sutrinum, Alba, and other good Towns, to the number of twelve, That they should boldly deny unto the Romans their farther help. This was thought the likeliest way to obtain peace: whereof their wife they saw little hope, as long as Hannibal lived. When the Consuls heard the Embassadors of these Towns make such desistations, and protest their disability of giving any further help; they were much amazed. They willed the Embassadors to return home, and bring a better answer, so far as this was none other than treason; they bade them to consider, that the people were not Capuans or Tarentines, but the offspring of the Romans; and no less partakers of the Empire, than they that inhabited the Mother City. But all would not serve, the Embassadors continuing to protest, that they had already done what they could; and that they had remaining, neither men, nor money. It was well for the Romans, that the other eighteen Colonies did not imitate these twelve; but shewed themselves willing to undergo whatsoever should be laid upon them, without shrinking under the burden. This their offer was so highly pleasing to the Consuls; that the Embassadors of those faithful Colonies, were brought unto the Senate, and produced into the Assembly of the people: where, with commemoration of all their former good services, this their present love unto the State was magnified, and thanks accordingly bestowed upon them; with promise, that it should not be forgotten. As for the Embassadors of those twelve Colonies, that refused to contribute; it was thought best, neither to detain them in the City, nor yet to dismiss them, nor take any notice of them at all; but leave them to their own consideration of their ill deserting.

It may greatly be doubted, what the example of these twelve people would have wrought in those that were so willing to help the State, if Asdrubal had been then coming into Italy. For then must the Romans have betaken themselves wholly to their own defence; whereas now, to the great comfort of their subjects, they employed their forces in the conquest of Italy, with hopeful and fortunate success. Nevertheless, they were fain to open their most privy treasury; and thence take out the gold that had been laid up to serve them in such a greatest extremity. Of the money thus extracted, one quarter was delivered to Fabius the Consul, to set him well out against the Tarentines; all the rest was sent into Spain to Scipio, for the maintenance of his Army; and to provide that Asdrubal might not pass from thence into Italy. It is likely that Fabius did not spend all his money; finding such easie success at Tarentum, as was shewed before. But to stop the journey of Asdrubal; neither the money sent into Spain, nor any victories won by Scipio could suffice. Nevertheless, it fell out happily for the people of Rome, that this year, and the next were spent, before his coming; and they better prepared, than at less warning they could have been, to entertain him. Here it were not amiss to note, that since the Romans, being in so great a necessity of money, were driven to furnish the Army in Spain, with the greatest part of all their stock that was left: it must needs be, that either the booty taken in new Carthage, was far less than fame had reported it; or else that Scipio had not as yet won it: howsoever Livie rather inclines to those, who say that he got it soon after his arrival.

M. Claudius Marcellus, and T. Quintus Crispinus, were chosen Consuls after Fabius and Fulvius. In their year it was, that Asdrubal took his journey out of Spain, though he came not into Italy until the year following: after the great battle at Cannæ, Hannibal had lost much time about Cannæ and Naples, in seeking to make himself Master of a good haven; for the landing of those succours that were promised from Carthage. The hope that he reposed in Philip, caused him to turn his principal care to the Eastern parts of Italy; where he made ready a fair entrance for the Atacodoni, if he had been ready to come; but since his hope was vanished, and the long promised succour of Asdrubal was (though far later than had been expedient) ready to arrive: he began to deal with the people of Hermia, through whose Countries his Brother was to pass, that therein he might make a party against the Romans. The loss of Capua, Tarentum, and many other Towns, might have terrified all other of the Italian Towns, from harkning to any solicitation of the Carthaginians. Yet the poverty of the Romans, and the weariness of their adherents, together with the fame of a greater Army coming than that which Hannibal brought into Italy; did imbolden many of the Hetrurians, especially the Ar-

times, to take such counsel as they thought most expedient for themselves, without regard of their fidelity to Rome. The Roman Senate, hearing the rumour of this conspiracy, sent Marcellus the new chosen Consul into Hetruria: whose coming did so terrifie them, that they rested quiet for a while. All the year following they were devising how to break out: as contrarywise the Roman Proprietors, partly by terrour of severe judgments and inquisitions; and partly by the force of two or three Legions, with which they visited all suspected places, kept them honest against their wills, and took many Hostages for better assurance. The two Consuls had an earnest desire, to make strong War upon Hannibal without more temporising: perswading themselves, that in battle they should be too strong for him. Crispinus had further his particular desire, to make his Consulship notable by the winning of some good Town: as Fulvius and Fabius had gotten honour by Capua and Tarentum. Therefore he went about the siege of Locris, one of the best Cities which the Carthaginians then held in Italy: and brought thither all sorts of Engines; sending for a Fleet out of Sicily to help him. But Hannibal was not slow to relieve the City: the fame of whose approach, made Crispinus desist from his enterprise, and retire unto his Colleague, that lay at Venusia. Thither followed Hannibal, to whom the Consuls daily offered battle. This great man of War had no need to stand upon his reputation: which was already so confirmed, that his refusing to fight, was not likely to be ascribed unto fear; but rather deemed as part of his wisdom. He entertained the Consuls with many light skirmishes, and sought to take them at some advantage; reserving his own numbers as full as he could, unto a time of greater employment. In this lingering manner of War, Marcellus took no pleasure: but sought to compel the Enemy to battle, whether he would or no. The Admiral of the Roman Fleet about Sicily, L. Cincius, was commanded again to assail the Town of Locri: which might well enough be forced, if Hannibal continued as he began, to trifle away the time at Venusia. To the same purpose a part of the Garrison that lay in Tarentum, was appointed to go by land to the assistance of Cincius. But Hannibal had an eye behind him. He laid an ambush in the way, between Tarentum and Locri, whereto the Romans fell: and having lost above three thousand of their Company, were well glad, thereof, to quit their enterprise, and save their own lives within Tarentum. As for the Consuls, it was the desire of Hannibal to waste their Army by little and little: which to do, he neglected no advantage. There lay between him and them an Hillock, overgrown with wood, that seemed fit to cover a number of men: who lying there undiscerned, might fall upon such as should straggle from the Roman camp; and cut them off. Therefore he sent thither by night some companies of Numidians: whom he willed to keep themselves close, and attend their best advantage. To this piece of ground the Consuls thought it fit to remove their camp: Marcellus thinking that he never lay near enough unto Hannibal. Thither therefore both of them rode to view the place, accompanied with the son of Marcellus, a few Colonels, and other principal men: and not many more than two hundred horse, most of them Hetrurians. The Numidian Centinel gave warning of their approach to his fellows who discovered not themselves, until they had surrounded the Consuls and their train. The Consuls, as necessity compelled them, defended themselves: hoping to be quickly relieved from their camp that was near at hand. But the Hetrurians ran away from them, at the first: and left them in that great danger, to the weak assistance of no more than forty horsemen, that were of the Colonic of Fregelle. These Fregellans abode by the Consuls, and did what they could to have brought them safe off. But when Marcellus was stricken thorow with a Lance, and fell down dead; then began every one to shift for himself, and escape as they might, Crispinus the other Consul, had his death wound, being stricken with two Darts; and young Marcellus was likewise wounded: yet these two recovered their camp: The rest of the Colonels and Officers, together with the Lictors that carried the bundle of Rods and Axes before the Consuls, were all slain or taken. To the dead body of the Consul Marcellus, Hannibal gave honourable Funeral, according to the custom of those times: and bestowing his ashes in a silver pot, covered it with a crown of gold; and so sent them to young Marcellus, to be by him interred, where he thought good.

Presently after this, Crispinus bethought himself, how that the signet Ring of Marcellus was fallen into the custody of Hannibal; who might use it to his own purposes, ere that which had happened were well known abroad. Wherefore he sent word unto all the Towns about; that his Colleague was slain, and that Hannibal had gotten his Ring: wishing them in that regard, to give no credit unto any letters therewithal signed. This providence of Crispinus was not more than requisite.

requisite. For his messenger was but a little before come to Salapia, when another Messenger arrived there sent from Hannibal, bringing letters in the name of Marcellus, and sealed with the captive Ring; whereof the contents were: That it was his purpose to come the same night unto Salapia; where he willed, that the Souldiers of the Garrison should be in a readiness, for such employment as he should think good. The device was plain, and no less plain was the revengeful mind which he bore against that City; because of his brave Numidian companies that had therein been betrayed. The Salapians hereupon bethought themselves, how to take their enemy in his own snare. They sent back the Messenger, which was a Roman fugitive, without letting him perceive any sign of distrust in them. This done, they prepared all things in a readiness, for the entertainment of such a friend. Late in the night he came thither; with a troop of Roman fugitives armed Roman-like, leading the way. These all talking Latine together, called unto the Watch, and bade open the gate; for the Consul was there. The gate was opened fair and leisurely, and the Port-cullis drawn up no higher than needs it must be, to let them enter. But when six hundred of them were gotten in, down fell the Port-cullis again: and they that thought to have taken others, were taken themselves; being laid at on all hands by the Salapians, that quickly made an end with them.

Hannibal being thus over-reached with this stratagem, halted away to Locri; whereto Cincius the Admiral of the Roman fleet about Sicily, did lay hard siege. The first appearance of the Numidians, Hannibal his Vantcurrs, made the Romans in all confusion haste, run to their ships: leaving all their engines, and whatsoever was in their Camp, to the enemies disposition.

The Roman Senate hearing of these accidents, sent unto Crispinus the surviving Consul, and requested him to name a Dictator that might take charge of the Commonwealth, and dispatch the election of new Magistrates, with other business, whereunto himself was disabled by his hurts. He did so: and soon after died. Then was it thought needful, that new Consuls should be chosen out of hand: forasmuch as two Roman Armies lay so near unto the Enemy, without any General. Especially it was desired, that Election should be made of such men as were not only valiant, but well advised: since the best, and most fortunate of their great Darers, M. Marcellus, by losing himself to strangely, had given them a fair warning, not to commit their Army unto rash heads. Among those that stood for the Consulship, C. Claudius Nero, was the most eminent. He was of great Nobility, a good Souldier, and one, whose many services in this present War, did forcibly commend unto the place. Yet he seemed a little too violent; and one, whose temper needed the alloy of a more staid wit. The Fathers therefore endeavoured to joyn unto him in the Consulship, M. Livius: one that had born the same office long before. This M. Livius had been Consul with L. Aemilius Paulus, in the year foregoing the beginning of this War. After their Consulship, wherein they did good service, they had both of them been called unto judgement by the people: and this Livius condemned; Aemilius hardly escaping. Though it hath been once already noted; yet I cannot forbear to remember it again: how it pleased God to upbraid the unthankful Romans, with the malicious judgement, given by their multitude upon honourable men. For in the battle at Cannæ, it was apparent what lamentable effects the memory of their injustice wrought: when L. Aemilius rather chose to yield to the froward ignorance of his Colleague; and afterward to die in the greatest overthrow that ever fell upon the State of Rome, than by resisting the pernicious courses of Terentius Varro, to cast himself anew upon the danger of the popular fury. As for M. Livius, he is even now ready, and will so continue, to tell the people of their faults in a divers manner. Eight years together after his condemnation, had he been absent out of the City, and lived in his Country Grange still vexing himself with the indignity of his condemnation. Marcellus and Livius, being Consuls two or three years ago, had brought him into Rome: where he lived private in discontented sort, as might appear, both by his carelessness in apparel, and by the wearing of his long hair and beard; which in that time were the badges of men afflicted. Very lately he was compelled by the Censors, to poll his hair, and come into the Senate: where he used to sit silent, and signify his assent or dislike to what was proposed, either in short formal words, or in passing from side to side, when the house was divided. At length it happened, that in some business weightily concerning one that was his kinsman; he stood up and made a set speech: whereby he drew all the Fathers to attention; and bade them enquire of him, and take better notice, what he was, and what he had been. The Senate was much altered since he had left it; many brave men were lost;

new ones were chosen such as rather served to fill up the number, than to answer to the dignity of the place; and they that were left of ancient standing, had even spent their Vertues to no great effect. Wherefore all began to say; that it was great pity, so worthy and able a man as this Livius, had been all this while forgotten; one of whom the Common-wealth stood in great need, yet had not used in this dangerous war. Now seeing that the Consuls owed, one of them to be chosen a Patrician, the other of necessity a Plébeian: and since neither Fabius, nor Valerius Levinus, being both of them Patricians, could be joyned with Claudius Nero: every one was of opinion, that there could not be chosen and coupled together, two sinner men than C. Claudius, and this Marcus Livius. But Livius would not endure to hear of this. He said it was unreasonable, that one condemned as a dishonest man, should afterwards be chosen Ruler of the City. If they had done ill to trust him with one Consulship, what meant they then to offer him another? With these and the like phrases he resisted their desires: till by persuasions and examples rehearsed, of such as had patiently digested injuries done by the people, and repayed good for evil; he was contented to accept the honour.

Here we may behold a true figure of that Emblem, with which Themistocles checked the ingratitude of the Athenians: resembling himself to a Plane-tree, the branches and boughs whereof men break in fair weather; but run under it for shelter in a storm. Such unthankfulness to well deserving men, is not rarely found in the outrageous multitude. Neither was the late example hereto much unlike, of Philip the second King of Spain his dealing with the Duke of Alva. For although he had committed the Duke to prison, upon some small offence conceived, without all regard of his former defects: yet when his intended Conquest of Portugal, required the service of a man, more than ordinarily sufficient; he stood no longer upon the scanning of late displeasures; but employed the same Duke, whom he had newly disgraced. This is wisdom often taught by necessity.

It was a dangerous year toward, when C. Claudius Nero, and M. Livius were chosen Consuls. Asdrubal was already come into France, and waited only, to have the ways of the Alps thawed by warm weather, for his passage into Italy. The Romans used at this time the service of three and twenty Legions: and wanted not employment for many more, if they had known how to levy and maintain them. Of these which they had, four served in Spain, two in Sicily, and two in Sardinia: the rest were so disposed, in several parts of Italy, where need seemed to require, that only two Legions were left to each of the Consuls. But the Consuls were men of execution; and would not be tied to the punctual observance of what the Senate thought fit. M. Livius would not stir out of Rome, against so mighty a power as followed Asdrubal, until he had first obtained, that he might carry with him as many as could well be spared from other employments; and those, or the most of them, chosen Companies. It was true, that two Legions appointed to serve under Lucius Porcius Prætor of that year, among the Clusian Gauls, might be reckoned as an additament to the forces of Livius; to whom the War against Asdrubal was allotted. So might also two other Legions, that were among the Salentin, near unto Tarentum, unto another of the Prætors, be accounted a part of Claudius his Army, that was sent against Hannibal. Nevertheless, the Consuls, by the special instance of Livius, did obtain, that all might be left to their own discretion. For news came that Asdrubal was already passing the Alps; the Liginians, who dwell in the Country about Genoa, with their neighbour people, were in readiness to joyn with him; and L. Porcius sent word, that he would adventure no further, than he safely might. When all was ordered as themselves thought best; the two Consuls went forth of the City; each his several way. The people of Rome were now quite otherwise affected, than they had been, when L. Emilius Paulus, and C. Terentius Varro, were sent against Hannibal. They did no longer take upon them, to direct their Generals, or bid them dispatch, and win the victory betimes: but rather they stood in fear, lest all diligence, wisdom and valour should prove too little. For since few years had passed, wherein some one of their Generals had not been slain; and since it was manifest, that either of these present Consuls were defeated, or put to the worst; the two Carthaginians would forthwith joyn, and make short work with the other: it seemed a greater happiness than could be expected, that each of them should return home Victors; and come off with honour, from such mighty opposition, as he was like to find. With extremum difficulty had Rome held up her head, ever since the battle of Canna: though it were so, that Hannibal alone, with little help from Carthage, had continued the War in Italy. But there was now arrived another Son of Amilcar;

Amilcar; and one, that in his present Expedition, had seemed a man of more sufficiency than Hannibal himself. For whereas in that long and dangerous march, thorow barbarous Nations, over great Rivers and Mountains, that were thought unpassable, Hannibal had lost a great part of his Army: this Asdrubal in the same places, had multiplied his numbers; and gathering the people, that he found in the way, descended from the Alps like a rowling Snow-ball, far greater than he came over the Pyrenees at his first setting out of Spain. These considerations, and the like, of which fear presented many unto them; caused the people of Rome, to wait upon their Consuls out of the Town, like a pensive train of Mourners: thinking upon Marcellus and Crispinus, upon whom in the like sort he had given attendance the last year; but saw neither of them return alive, from a less dangerous War. Particularly, old Q. Fabius gave his accustomed advice to M. Livius, that he should abstain from giving or taking battel, until he well understood the Enemies condition. But the Consul made him a froward answer, and said, that he would fight the very first day: for that he thought it long, till he should either recover his honour by victory; or by seeing the overthrow of his own unjust Citizens, satisfy himself with the joy of a great, though not an honest revenge. But his meaning was better than his words.

Of the overthrow that Asdrubal received in Spain by Scipio, a little before he took his Journey into Italy; such mention hath already been made, as agreed with the report of that noble Historian Livius. Yet I think it not amiss to add in this place, what may be gathered out of the remaining fragments of Polybius his History concerning that accident: Asdrubal had wrestled with many difficulties in Spain; by reason of those Captains that were sent from the City of Carthage, to joyn with him in the administration of that Province: they being, as it may seem, of the Hannonian faction; which is to say, thus far forth Traytors, that they preferred the advantage of their own side, before the good of their Common-wealth. In what particulars they wronged this worthy Son of Amilcar, and how they hindered his courses undertaken, it cannot be known; since of those Books, wherein Polybius hath exactly handled these matters, there are to us remaining only a few broken pieces. But by the spiteful dealing of Hanno in Sicily with Mutines, a better man of War than himself, whom Hannibal had sent into the Island: we may conceive, that against the

Brother of Hannibal it was thought needful, by these mischievous Partizans of Hanno, to use the violent opposition of more earnest malice. Nevertheless, Asdrubal was a good Patriot; and therefore endured patiently such indignities, as Mutines could not long digest. His Journey into Italy being resolved upon: he lay with part of the Army at Bedula, not far from the Mines of Silver; whence he was to furnish his Expeditions. Thither came Scipio; and drove him out of his Camp though he were strongly lodged, before the other Carthaginian Captains could or would come to his assistance. The overthrow seems not to have been so great, as it must have been supposed, if no way lay open to those that fled. Rather it appears, that Asdrubal dealt like a provident man, and seeing that his Camp was likely to be forced, sent away all his money with the Elephants before him: but stayed behind himself to sustain the Romans a while, until his carriages might be out of danger. Herein he had his desire, afterwards he gathered his broken troops together; and retired in such sort, that Scipio thought it not good to pursue him, and so passed over Tagnus. Then taking unto him the forces assigned for his expedition, he marched away toward the Pyrenees: leaving the care of Spain unto his Brother Mago, and to Asdrubal the Son of Cecili; that thought himself the fittest man for the administration thereof. Pain would Scipio have stopped him in his Journey, by sending to defend against him the ordinary way of the Mountains. But whether Asdrubal took another way, or whether he forced the guards that Scipio had sent to keep the Pyrenees (as the defence of hard passages commonly sorts to no good effect) he was not letted in his voyage by any such impediment. Coming into Gaul, and following the steps of his Brother Hannibal: he found the Nations that lay in his way, so well affected, either to him or to his money, that no passages were defended against him, nor any sort of resistance made; but he, and his Army well entertained, and their number much increased, by access of such as were desirous to take his pay. Of these he had the better choice: for that he was driven to winter in their Country; whilst that the passages of the Alps were closed up with Ice and Snow. The Mountainers likewise, that had so greatly molested Hannibal in his Journey over the Alps, were easily won to take part with Asdrubal, when he travelled thorow their Country. For these poor men, at the first coming of Hannibal, were verily persuaded, that it was his purpose to rob them of their cattle; and to make spoil of that little wealth which they had painfully scraped together out of the desolate rocks. But now in process of time, they were better informed. Therefore, understanding that there were two mighty Cities, far disjoyned asunder, which made War upon each other, by Land and Sea; and that the Alps did only lye in the way: they gladly condescended to take their part in the fortune of the invaders. The like affection upon greater cause, was afterward found in the Cisalpine Gauls. The Ligurians also joyned with Asdrubal: and so would the Heirurians have done, if he had arrived in their Country. There was no other Roman Army near, than L. Porcius with his two Legions; of whom there was no great fear. Therefore did Asdrubal: set upon Placentia, a Roman Colony: in hope to make his coming the more terrible, by the destruction of that Town. But there he lost a great deal of time, and finally was driven to quit the enterprise: by undertaking which, he gave the Roman Consuls leisure to make ready for him; and caused his Brother Hannibal (who upon the first bruit of Asdrubal he so timely, and easily passing the Alps, was about to leave his wintering Camps, and go forth to meet with him) to sit still a while, as well aware, that Placentia would not be taken in haste.

C. Claudius Nero the Roman Consul, made what speed he could to meet with Hannibal, and stop him from joyning with his Brother. He had about forty thousand foot, and five hundred horse: with which he daily offered battel to the Carthaginians; and had of him the better in many skirmishes. Hannibal was once driven to make a tedious march from the borders of the Salentines and Apulians, unto the Country of the Britanni, there to encrease his forces; which were otherwise too weak for the Journey intended. Afterward coming to Grimmentum, a Town of the Lucans; he there fought unprofitably with Nero the Consul. Nevertheless, he got off, and marched away to Venusia. But Nero followed him, and had there again the better of him. Wherefore he was driven to return to Metapontum: where joyning with Hanno, that had made ready a good Army, he assayed again, to make way by force to his Brother. So he passed onward, and came again to Venusia, having Nero still at his heels. Thence went he over the River Asidum, to Cannus, where he fate down, not far from the place, in which he had obtained his most memorable victory. There also did Nero sit down by him: and both of them rested, without making offer to fight. It seemed perhaps unto Hannibal, who knew the Country very well; that his Brother might with little impediment, overcome the way to Cannus: where, if he could once again deal with both the Consuls, and all the Roman forces together, he had reason to hope for such another victory, as once he had gotten in the same open Country. If this had so fallen out; Rome would have been undone for ever. But the Carthaginians should not have need to wish any second victory, in the naked Camps about Cannus; If such an Army, as this which Asdrubal now brings, had come to second Hannibal, when he was in full strength; and the Romans not able to keep the field. Wherefore this worthy General had good reason afterward to say that Hanno was the man, who by delaying the supply, did beat him out of Italy; which else no power of the Romans could have done.

While Nero waited upon the Carthaginians, and thought it enough to hinder them from meeting with the Army that was coming to their succour: he was advertised of Asdrubal his approach; by Letters and Messengers intercepted, as they were going to Hannibal. These gave notice, that Asdrubal had left the siege of Placentia, and drew onwards apace: being already come within two hundred miles of his Brother; notwithstanding all opposition that could be made by Livius the Consul. Of these news Claudius Nero was nothing joyful. For if Hannibal could once be joyned as head, unto that great body of an Army, which Asdrubal brought with him: it was most apparent, that howsoever the fortune of Rome should avoid, for the present, any great calamity; yet the very continuance of so strong a war at home, would enforce the Latines, and other faithful Associates, to faint under the burden; as twelve of the thirty Roman Colonies had already done. Wherefore he resolved, that it were better to make any desperate adventure, than to suffer the conjunction of two such malevolent Planets: whose pestilent influence, if not on the sudden, yet within few years, was like to work most lamentable effects. It seemed apparent, that his Colleague was unable to stay the progress of Asdrubal: neither were there any good Legions in a readiness, that could do service in such a needful case; excepting those, that were already employed under the two Consuls. Hereupon he concluded, that it was not expedient for him to tie himself to his own charge, which was the war against Hannibal: but rather that it behoved him, to help where where more necessity required; and to carry part of his forces unto his Colleague. This could not be without much danger. Yet since the meeting of the two Carthaginian Brethren, was far more dangerous to the Roman Common-wealth: it seemed the best way to put Fortune in trust, with that which was of the less importance. Six thousand foot, and a thousand horse he therefore took, that were the very choice of his Army: and making shew, as if he would only step aside, to do some small piece of service near at hand; away he posted as fast as he could, to assist his fellow-Consul. His Messengers ran before him, to give warning to all Towns by which he was to pass, that they should be ready to meet him with victuals, and all other necessities for his Army. Livius the other Consul, at that time, lay encamped near unto Sena Gallica; and Asdrubal, within half a mile of him. In six days Nero had finished his Journey thither; and when he drew near, sent Messengers before him, to give notice of his coming. Livius thought it fittest that he should stay in some place of covert until dark night, and then enter secretly into the Camp: lest the Enemy, perceiving this access of strength, should accordingly frame his counsels. This was done; and a token given, that the Colonels, Captains, and all Souldiers, as well horse as foot, that Nero had brought with him, should be lodged and entertained by men of their own sort. Their Company was somewhat increased by Voluntaries that joyned with him on the way. Nevertheless it was not needful that the Quarter which received them, should be enlarged; since they had brought with them nothing but their arms. The next day they held a Council of war: wherein some were of opinion, that it were best for these new arrived Companies to refresh themselves a few days after their weary Journey, before they should be drawn forth to battel. But against this, Nero was very earnest: and besought his Colleague, to make use of him out of hand; that he might betimes return to his own Camp, ere Hannibal should have notice of his absence. The Souldiers also of Nero were full of spirit; perceiving that the honour of the victory was like to be theirs: forasmuch as the battel would not have been undertaken, without this their coming to help. Finally, it was agreed when the Counsel brake up, that the sign of battel should be hung out; which was commonly a Purple Coat over the Generals Pavilion.

Asdrubal was no less willing than the Ro- mans to come to battle, having long desired it, and hitherto not found occasion before. But when he had put his men in order, and was riding before the head of his Army, to behold the Enemies countenance: it seemed to him, that they were more than they had been; and some of their arms and horses looked as though they had wanted dressing, after a long Journey. Hereupon he began to withdraw his Army back into the Camp: and gave order, that if no prisoners could be taken, by whom he might be certified of the truth, yet should there good observation be made, whether the Enemies Camp were enlarged, or no; or what other alteration could be noted, that might shew their forces to be encreased. The Camp, as hath been said, was not extended: but the trumpet, that sounded only once in the Quarter of L. Porcius the Prætor, did now, contrary to former custom, found twice in the Quarter of Livius the Consul. Hereat Asdrubal greatly mused: and being well acquainted with the Roman orders, held this for a sure token, that the other Consul was there arrived. How this might be, if Hannibal were alive, and in good case, he was not able to conjecture: but thought it the best way, to go leisurely to work, till he might be better informed. Upon confidence in his own forces, he had not cared hitherto, how near he lay to the Romans; nor troubled himself perhaps with over-strongly fortifying his own Camp. Yet when he now perceived, that somewhat was fallen out beside his expectation, he changed his resolution; and held it no dishonour to remove a little further off. So he dislodged secretly by night, intending to get over the River Metaurus; whereby to keep himself as long as he could, from necessity of battel. But whether it were so, that his guides did steal away from him in the dark, so that he could not find the way to the Fords; or whether his carriages were too heavy, and hindered his speed: far he had not gone, ere the Consul Nero was at his heels with all the Roman horse, and stayed him from passing any further. Soon after came L. Porcius with the light armature: whom the other Consul followed anon with all the Legions; in good order, and ready for battel. Asdrubal, seeing himself overtaken with necessity to fight, omitted no care and circumspection. His Gauls, in whom he reposed least confidence, he placed in his left wing upon a Hill, which the Enemy should not, without much difficulty, be able to climb: in the right wing he stood himself with his Affricans and Spaniards; his Ligurians he placed placed in the midst; and his Elephants he bestowed in the front of his battels. On the Roman side, Nero had the leading of the right wing; Livius of the left, and Porcius of the battell: Both Romans and Carthaginians well understood, how much depended upon the fortune of this day; and how little hope of safety there was unto the vanquished. Only the Romans herein seemed to have had the better in conceit and opinions; that they were to fight with men desirous to have fled from them. And, according to this presumption, came Livius the Consul with a proud bravery, to give charge on the African by, whom he was so sharply entertained, that the victory seemed very doubtful. The Africans and Spaniards were stout; Souli-ers, and well acquainted with the manner of the Roman fight. The Ligurians also were a hardy Nation, and not accustomt to give ground; which they needed the less, or were able now to do, being placed in the midst. Livius; therefore, and Porcius found strong opposition: and with great slaughter on both sides, prevailed little or nothing. Besides other difficulties, they were exceedingly troubled by the Elephants that brake their first ranks; and put them in such disorder, as the Roman Ensigns were driven to fall back. All this while Claudius Nero, labouring much in vain against a steep Hill, was unable to come to blows with the Gauls, that stood opposite unto him, but out of danger. This made Asdrubal the more confident; who, seeing his own left wing safe, did the more boldly and fiercely make impression on the other side, upon the left wing of the Romans. But Nero perceiving that the place wherein he stood, was such as would compel him to remain idle till the fight were ended; took a part of his forces and led them round behind the forces of Porcius and Livius; which having compassed, he fell upon Asdrubal, and charged him in the flank. Here began the victory to be manifest on the Roman side. For Nero, finding none to resist him in front, ran all along the depth of Asdrubal his battell: and falling upon the skirts thereof, disordered the Enemies, and put all to rout. Of the Spaniards therefore and Africans, that were laid at on every side, the greatest part was slain. The Ligurians and Gauls escaped as they could; and saved themselves by timely flight. Of the Elephants, four were taken alive: the rest were slain: some by the Enemies weapons, others by their own guides that rode them. For when any of them, being forewounded, began to wax unruly, and rush back upon their own battels following them, the guide had in readiness a Mallet and a Chizzeley, wherewith he gave them a stroke between the ears, in the joynt of the neck, next unto the head, wherewith he killed the beasts upon a sudden. This speedy way of preventing such harm as the Elephants, being hurt, were wont to do to the Squadrons following them, is said to have been the device of Afrumbal himself; who died in this battel.

Great commendations are given to Adribal, both by Polybius; and by Livie. He is said at all times to have shewed himself worthy of Amilcar his Father, and Launibal his Brother; to have striven with great patience against many difficulties, whereinto he fell by the means of those Captains that were sent from Carthage into Spain; to have performed in this last battle all duties of a worthy General; and finally, when he saw the loss irreparable, to have ridden manfully into the thicket of his Enemies; where, fighting bravely, he was slain. Of the number that died with him in this battle, the report of Livie and Polybius do very much disagree. For Livie saith, that the Carthaginians had no less an overthrow; than was that which they gave to the Roman at Cam-pane: that fifty six thousand of them were slain, five thousand and four hundred taken prisoners, and above four thousand Roman Citizens, whom they had captives with them, delivered and set at liberty. He saith also, that of the Romans and their Associates there were slain eight thousand: and of the booty, that it was exceeding great; not only in other kinds, but in gold and silver. Concerning the booty, Polybius hath no mention of it. Likely it is to have been as rich as Li-wier reporteth it; for Adriabal came well flored with money. But Polybius (who had no desire to make this battle of Metanrus, a parallel unto that of Campane) reports no more than about ten thousand of the Carthaginian sides; and two thousand of the Roman, to have been slain. The number of the prisoners he doth not mention: but only saith, That some of the Carthaginian Princes were taken alive; and that all the rest died in the battle. Whereby it may seem that they were all Earchines: forasmuch as they preferred the honour of themselves, and of their Country, above their lives.

The joy of this victory was no less in Rome, than had been the fear of the event. For ever since it were known in what sort Nero had left his Army, the whole City was troubled, as much as lately at Hannibal's coming thither. Men thought it strange, that the Consul should make such a great adventure.

ture; as thus to put the one half of all the Roman forces unto hazzard of the Dice. For what if Hannibal should chance to have notice of this his departure, and either pursue him, or set upon the Army that staid behind, much weakened, and without a General? Thus did they talk; yet reserving their censure unto the success; with liberty to approve or condemn, according to the issue. In the mean time the people filled the Marketplace, the Women ran to the Temples with Vows and Prayers; and the Senators were daily in council, waiting still ready at hand upon the Magistrates; as if some great matter were likely to fall out, that would ask every ones help. In brief, they were all so full of melancholy, that when the first news of victory came; there were not many that would believe it. Afterwards, when Messengers arrived from the Consuls, with Letters contained all that had passed, there was not only great and joyful concourse of all sorts of men unto the Temples, but the very face of the City was altered; and men from thenceforth began to follow their private business; making contracts one with another (which they had long forbore to do) scattering their own affairs in such wise, as if Hannibal were already driven out of Italy.

Nero returning to his Camp, threw forth openly the head of Afnibal before the Carthaginians; and producing his African prisoners bound, sent two of them loose to give Hannibal notice of what had hapned. These two prisoners might have served well enough to certifie Hannibal of the misadventure, without doing wrong to the dead body of Afnibal: especially since Hannibal, in honourable, and far different manner, had given burial to Gracchus and Marcellus; yea, to all the Roman Generals, whose carcafles fell into his hands. But it may seem, that howsoever the People of Carthage wanted much of the generous disposition, which was found among the Romans, in their love unto the Common-weal: yet in dealing with enemies, they were far more civil, and less prone to the infoleny of revenge. The best excuse of this outrage done by Nero, is that he hoped much more by the sudden terror of such a spectacle, than by the simple relation of that which passed, to make a deep impression of fear into the Carthaginians. It may also be said, That he forgot himself, being overjoyed with the greatness of his prosperity. For it was the battel of Metaurus that weighed down the ballance, and turned the Tide of the Roman fortune: which being then at the lowest Ebbe, ceased not afterwards to flow, till it could not be contained within any banks. Hannibal having lost in this unhappy fight (besides the worthy Gentleman his brother) all the hope that so long sustained him in Italy, withdrew himself into the Country of the Bruttians; and thither he caused all the Lucans, that were of his party, to remove; as likewise all that dwelt in Metapontum. For he wanted men to defend in many places, as he held at that present, because they lay too far asunder. Wherefore he drew them all into a lesser compass, in the utmost corner of Italy, it being a country of much flatness, and the people exceedingly devoted to his service. In this business Nero gave him no memorable impediment: either because Hannibal was too strong for him, having all his forces united; or because it is likely that this remove of the Lucans and Metapontines, was before the end of Summer, when their harvest was gathered in: at what time the Senate called him home to Rome. M. Livius the other Consul, tarried among the Cisalpine Gauls until the end of summer; there to set things in such order, as he thought requisite: which done, he wrote unto the Senate, that there was no more need of him and his Army in that Province, but that L. Porcius, with the two Legions that were there before, might very well discharge the place. For this cause he desired leave to return home; and that he might bring his Army with him. The Senate well understood his meaning: which was to have the honour of triumph as he well deserved. But so far as it was well known, what interest Nero had in the late victory, order was so given, that not only Livie with his Army should come home; but likewise Nero, though leaving his Army behind him, to confront Hannibal. So the honour of triumph was granted to them both: in the pomp whereof, Livie made the greater show, as riding in a Chariot, and followed by his Soldiers; because in his Province, and upon his day of command, the victory was gotten: his Army also being present at the triumph. But Nero that rode on horseback, and without such attendance, was the more extolled by the People and Soldiers; by whom, the victory was in a manner wholly ascribed unto his great worth. Neither wanted L. Veturius Philo, and Q. Cecilius Metellus, Lieutenants to the Generals, the due acknowledgement of their good service. For they were commended unto the People, as men worthy to be chosen Consuls: and Consuls they were chosen for the year following. But nothing was done by them, worthy of memory in their Consulship. Neither indeed from this year, which was the thirteenth of the present war, until the eighteenth year wherein it ended, was there any matter of importance wrought in Italy; save only the taking of Locri from the Carthaginians by surprise. For Hannibal wanted strength, wherewith to make any great offer: and the Romans had little mind to provoke him; but thought it well that he was quiet. Such opinion had they conceived of him, that though all about him went to ruine, yet in him alone, they thought there was force enough to hold himself upright. And surely, very notable are the commendations given unto him by Polybius, whom Livie therein follows. That making war upon a People, of all other the most war-like, he obtained so many victories by his own good conduct: and that leading an Army, compounded of so many sundry Nations, Africans, Spaniards, Gauls, Carthaginians, Italians and Greeks, which were neither in Language, Laws, Conditions, or any other thing, one like to another; he held them all in such good order, that they never fell to sedition among themselves, or against their General. But that which Livie adds hereto, is yet perhaps of greater admiration: That he sustained his Army, without help from other places, from this time forward, upon the hungry soil of the Bruttians: which when it was best manured in time of peace, could hardly suffice to nourish the Inhabitants. It's therefore apparent, that by his proper worth and virtue, he kept his Army in such order and obedience, rather than by any greatness of reward and booty; since after the death of Asdrubal, he made no invasion upon the wealthier parts of Italy; but held himself still among the poor Bruttians. Where we must leave him; until he be drawn into Africk by Scipio; whose doing will henceforth entertain, and lead us unto the end of this War.

§. XVII.

How P. Cornelius Scipio the Roman made entire conquest of Spain.

†. I.

How the Carthaginians were driven by Scipio from the Continent into the Isle of Gades.

Mago and Asdrubal the son of Gesco, took upon them the charge of Spain, when Asdrubal the son of Amilcar departed thence into Italy. These agreed together, that Mago should make a voyage to the Baleares; there to levy a supply of men; and Asdrubal withdraw himself into Lusitania (which is now Portugal) whither the Romans had ill means to follow; being altogether unacquainted in those parts. Mago had soon ended his business, and returned into Spain: where he met with one Hanno (the same perhaps that had lately been employed in Sicily) who brought new forces out of Africk; and came to succeed in place of Asdrubal the Barchine. It is not unlikely that Spain was now the better, and more readily furnished with men and all things needfull from Carthage: when that son of Amilcar, whose authority had been greatest, was thence departed. For hereby might the factious diligence of old Hanno approve itself, against that noble race of Warriors; when it should appear, that things did prosper much the better by being left unto the handling of other men. Whether it were upon desire to make good some such opinion raised of him at home, or whether upon confidence in the forces that he brought over; Hanno took the field, and led Mago with him; as purposing afresh to set upon the Romans. So he entered into the country of the Celsiberians, not very far from new Carthage: where, by money and over persuasions, he levied above nine thousand men.

P. Scipio in the mean while contained himself in the Eastern parts of Spain: attentive, as it may seem to the proceedings of Asdrubal, the son of Amilcar; against whom he is reported by some Writers to have sent part of his forces into Italy, to the assistance of C. Claudianus Nero, and M. Livius the Consuls. But hearing of the levy made by Hanno and Mago among the Celsiberians, he sent M. Syllanus the Propretor, with ten thousand foot, and five hundred horse. Syllanus got intelligence by some fugitive Celsiberians, who became his guides, that their Country-men incamped apart from the Carthaginians in great disorder: as men fearing no danger, because they were at home. Wherefore as closely as he was able, he drew near to these Celsiberians: and falling upon them on the sudden, gave them such an overthrow, that Hanno and Mago coming to their succour, instead of heartning and reinforcing them, became partakers of the loss. Mago saved himself with all the horse, and old Companies of foot, which were about two thousand: and in ten daies journey brought them safe to Asdrubal. The rest of the Africans were either slain or taken: among whom, Hanno had the ill luck to be taken prisoner; though he kept himself out of the fight until all was lost. As for the Celsiberians, they knew better how to make shifts, and saved most of themselves by running into the woods.

It could not otherwise be, but that Scipio was much troubled with the danger wherein Italy stood, by the coming thither of Asdrubal. Ten thousand foot, and eighteen hundred horse he did therefore send out of Spain (as it is reported by some Authors to the defence of his own Country; or was perhaps, about to send them: and thereupon remained at new Carthage, intente to the necessity and success of his Country-men at home. But when he had word of the great victory at Metarrus, which fell out long before the end of the Summer, then might he well adventure, to take in hand the entire conquest of Spain; which mult needs be much alienated from the Carthaginians, by the report of such an overthrow. The Spanish Souldiers that served under Hannibal, & those that had been sent over into Africk, were as pledges heretofore, by whom their Country was held obnoxious to the Carthaginians. But when it was noised abroad, that all which hath followed Asdrubal into Italy, were fallen into the hands of the Romans; and that Hannibal with his Army was closed up in a straight, whence he could not get out: then did it greatly behove the Spaniards to conform themselves unto the will of the Victors. That it was the success of things in Italy, which gave such confidence unto Scipio; it was the more probable, because he took not this great enterprise in hand, until the Summer was almost spent. Asdrubal therefore used the benefit of the season; and by disposing his Army into many garriſons, hindered the Enemy from doing any great exploit before winter. So the very length of way, and the time of the year, caused Scipio to return back: without any other matter performed, than that his Brother L. Scipio took by assault the Town of Oringis.

Against the next years danger, Asdrubal prepared a great Army: and spared not cost, nor travel, in strengthening himself, for the trial of his last fortune in Spain. With seventy thousand foot, four thousand horse, and two and thirty Elephants, he took the field: which number I believe, that he could hardly have raised, without boldly denying the truth of those reports that came from Italy. Scipio thought his Roman Legions too weak to encounter with such a multitude. Wherefore he judged it needfull to use the help of his Spanish friends. But the death of his Father and Uncle, that were cast away by the treason of such false Auxiliaries, made him on the other side very doubtful of relying upon those, that might perhaps betray him in his greatest need. Yet since one Coleba, that was Lord of eight and twenty Towns, had promised him the last Winter, to raise three thousand foot, and five hundred horse for his service; he resolved to make use of those, and some few others, that might help to make a shew; and yet not be able to do any great harm, if they would revolt. So with five and forty thousand foot, and three thousand horse, he sought out the Enemy; near unto whom he incamped. At his first coming, Mago and Masaniſſa fell upon him; with hope to take him unprepared, whilst he was making his lodgings. But he laid certain troops of horse in covert: which, breaking upon them unexpected, caused them to fall off. They made at first an orderly retreat: but being more hardly pressed, they shortly betook themselves to plain flight. After this encounter, which added some courage to the Romans, and abated the presumption of the Carthaginians, there were daily skirmishes between the horse and light armature, on both sides; wherein was nothing done of importance. Asdrubal drew forth his Army, and arranged it before his Trenches: the like did Scipio; each of them to shew that he durst fight, yet not proceeding any farther. Thus they continued many days: Asdrubal being still the first that issued forth in the morning; and the first that, in the evening, withdrew himself into his Trenches. The Spanish Auxiliaries were placed on both sides in the wings; the Carthaginians were in the midst, with their Elephants before them; and opposite to these on the other side were the Roman Legions. When they had in this order confronted one another, thought at far distance, many days together: it grew to be the common opinion, that they should shortly meet in the same form, and be matched on each part, with the enemies long before designed. But Scipio, when he purposed indeed to fight, altered the form of his Army; and withall, came forth earlier than he had been wont. He caused his men and horses to be well fed betimes in the morning before day: and then sent forth his horse and light armature, to train out the Carthaginians with their bellies empty; using herein the same trick, whereby he might remember that Hannibal had beaten his Father in the battel of Trebia. His Roman Legions he bestowed in the wings; his Spaniards in the battel. Asdrubal sent forth his horse in all haste, to entertain the Romans; whilst he himself arranged his men, in their wonted order at the Hill foot, upon which he

incamped. In the skirmishes of the horse it could not be discerned which part had the better: since, being over-pressed on either side, they had a safe retreat unto their foot; and one troop succouring another by course, returned to charge. This fight was protracted by Scipio to a great length: because his men, having well fed themselves, were like to hold out better than the enemy. But about noon he caused his wings to advance a good pace; leaving their battel of Spaniards far behind them, that came on leisurely, according to direction. The Spanish Mercenaries that stood in Asdrubal's wings, were no way comparable, save only in number, to the Latine and Roman Souldiers that came against them; for they were fresh Souldiers, levised in haste; and fighting only in respect of their pay. Being therefore charged in front by the Legions, and in flank, at the same time, by the Roman Velites, and by some cohorts, that were appointed to wheel about for the same purpose, they were sorely pressed, and with much difficulty made resistance. The Carthaginians would fain have succoured them; but that they durst not stir out of their places, because of the Spanish battel which was coming against them; though it were as yet far off. Thus the best part of Asdrubal's Army stood idle, until the wings were broken. For, had he adventured to meet with the Spaniards, he must have cast himself into the open space that lay before him between the Roman wings: to the depth whereof when he had arrived, he should have found himself inclosed in such sort, as was the Consul Pamilius at the battel of Cannæ. Wherefore he did only employ his Elephants; which did, according to their manner, no greater harm to his Enemies, than to his friends. When they were chafed with wounds, they could no longer be ruled as their guides: but ran, as chance led them, and troubled both parts; or those perhaps the more, that were the more unwilling to kill them. In process of the fight, the Romans who had well refreshed their bodies in the morning, endured lusty; when the others began to faint with travel and heat of the day. Wherefore perceiving their advantage, they followed it the more hotly; and gave not over, till they had forced the enemy to change his place, and run from him. Asdrubal did his best to have made an orderly retreat; and afterward again to have caused his men to turn head at the Hill foot. But the Romans would not suffer the victory to be so extorted from them: neither was it easie to put fresh courage into the vanquished, led by the oblitinate passion of fear, which hearkens to no perswasion. The Camp of Asdrubal had that day been taken, if a storm of rain, which fell violently on the sudden, and bred some superstition in the Romans, had not caused them to give over.

The same night Asdrubal gave no rest to his men; but caused them, hungry, and over-laboured as they were, to take pains in fortifying the Camp; wherein he feared to be assaulted. But little assurance could he have in the strength of his Trenches, when he had lost the hearts of his Spanish Souldiers. One Attanes, that was Lord of the Turdetani, fled from him to the Romans, with a great Band of his subjects: many followed this example; and soon after two strong Towns were yielded up to Scipio, and the Garrisons betrayed. It seems that the perverse fortune of this late battel, whereupon Asdrubal had set his rest, bred in the Spaniards a disposition, to believe the more easily those reports which they heard from Italy. For henceforward, they never did good office to the Carthaginians. Asdrubal, perceiving this, withdrew himself, and marched away faster than ordinary pace, toward the Ocean Sea. Scipio followed the next morning, and overtaking the Carthaginians with his horse, caused them so often to make stand, that they were at length attached by the Roman Legions. Here began a cruel slaughter: for there was no resistance made, but all fell to rout, save only seven thousand that with Asdrubal himself recovered a very strong piece of ground, which they fortified in haste. The place he made shift a while to defend: but wanting there necessaries to sustain himself long, he was forsaken by some of those few, that continued hitherto partakers of his fortune. Wherefore he resolved to make shift for one; and stealing from his Company by night away to the Sea side, that was not far thence, he took shipping, and set sail for Gades. When Scipio understood that Asdrubal was thus gone, he left Syllanus with ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse, to besiege their Camp, which was not taken in haste, for Mago and Mastanissa staid in it) whilst he with the rest of the Army did what was needfull in the Country abroad. It was not long ere Mago and Mastanissa followed Asdrubal to Gades: and their Army dispersed it self; some flying over to the Romans, others taking what way they like. So upon all the Continent of Spain, there were only three Towns left, Iliturgi, Castulo, and Astapa, that made continuance of war against the Romans: of which only Castulo had a Carthaginian Garrison, consisting of,

of such as had saved themselves by flight in the late overthrow. Hereby it seems that the report of those Historians was ill grounded, who said, that Cassula yielded long since unto the Romans; though Hannibal took a wife in that City. For this was one of the last three towns that held out on the Carthaginian side. Iliturgi had sometimes been inclinable to the Romans; if not altogether at their devotion. Yet after the death of the two elder Scipio's, following too earnestly the Carthaginian fortune, it not only rebelled, but with great cruelty betrayed and slew the poor men that escaped thither from the overthrows. Astapa was a Town that still adhered to the Carthaginians; and, which was worse, had thriven by the spoil of the Romans and their Confederates. Wherefore (though not until the next year) Scipio went against these, and took himself Iliturgi, and Cassula: Iliturgi by assault, and with a general slaughter of the Inhabitants; Cassula, by treason of one Cordubellus. Astapa was taken by Lucius Marcins; or rather destroyed by the Inhabitants. For a great pile of wood was raised in the Market place: whereto was thrown all the gold, and silver, with whatsoever else was precious; the women and children standing by it under a fire guard, that should kill and burn them if the Romans got into the Town. This provision being made, all the Inhabitants that could bear Arms, rushed forth desperately, and fell upon the Roman Camp; where striving beyond their power, they were every one slain. Then was the Town forthwith set on fire, by those that had taken charge to do it: and many of the Romans consumed with the flames; whilst they rushed over-hastily to catch the gold and silver, which they saw lying on the pile ready to melt.

Asdrubal being beaten into the Island of Gades, found no cause of long stay there: but returned home to Carthage, with seven Gallies: leaving Mago behind him, to wait upon occasion, if any should be offered. He visited in his way home, Syphax, King of the Masseili, a people of the Numidians; hoping to win him to the friendship of the Carthaginians. But he met with Scipio, as it were with his evil Angel, in the Kings port: who landing at the same time, carried Syphax quite another way. For Scipio having driven the Carthaginians out of Spain, did forthwith be-think himself, how to finish the war, by putting them to the like distress in Africa. Hereunto it seemed that the help of Syphax would be much available: a King that had many times fallen out with the Carthaginians, and sustained much hurt by their procurement; of which in all likelihood he might easily be moved to seek revenge. He had also been beholding to P. and Cn. Scipio, that sent him over a Captain into Africa; who instructed him so well in marshalling his forces, as he thereby often became victorious. Upon these reasons, the Numidian King sent Embassadors to Rome, and made league with the City in time of great extremity. So that hereby P. Scipio conceived hope of laying a good foundation to the War, which he intended in Africa, upon the friendship of this ill neighbour to the Carthaginians. For which cause he sent over C. Laelius his Embassador, to deal with Syphax: who declaring that the Carthaginians did very ill in Italy, and had nothing now at all to do in Spain, easily persuaded the King to take part with those that had the better, and were without question his better friends. Only Syphax requested that the Roman General should visit him in person, to conclude the League; by which he was to enter into conditions of more importance, than in any former Treaty. Here to Scipio condescended; thinking the friendship of so great a King, that was neighbour to Carthage, and not far distant from Spain, well worthy of the adventure. So with two Quinquereme Gallies he took Sea, and arrived in the Kings Port, at the same time with Asdrubal. This would have been very dangerous unto him, had he been decryed by his enemies further at Sea: but in the Haven they forbore to make offer one upon the other. Syphax might well be proud; seeing at one time, two such Captains of two most powerful Cities, came to desire his friendship. He would have brought them to treat of peace: But the Roman excused himself, by want of such Commission from the Senate. He feasted them together: and shortly dismissed Scipio, with whom he readily entered into Covenant; which in time of performance, he as readily brake.

†. II.

Funeral games held by Scipio. A Duel between two Spanish Princes. A digression concerning Duels.

Scipio returning into Spain, and resting that Winter, took vengeance the next year, upon those of Iliturgi, Cassula, and Astapa, as hath been said before. The conquest of the Country being then in a manner at an end; he performed at new Carthage, with great solemnity, some Vows that he had made, and honoured the memory of his Father and Uncle, with funeral games, especially

ly of those that fought at sharp, according to the manner of the times. Neither was it needful that he should trouble himself with preparing slaves for that spectacle, to hazard their lives, as was used in the City of Rome: for there were enow, that either offered themselves as Voluntaries, or were sent from their Princes, to give proof in single combat, of the valour that was in their several Countries. Some also there were, that being in contention, which they could not, or would not otherwise end, agreed to defer the decision of their Controversies, to tryal of the sword, in single fight. Among these, the most eminent, were Corbis and Orfus; Colemgermans: that contended for the principality of a Town called Iber. Corbis was the elder, and the elder brothers son: wherefore he claimed the Lordship, as eldest of the house, after the manner of our Irish Tamftry. But the father of Orfus had lately seized of the principality: which though himself received by the death of his elder brother, yet this his Son would not let it go back, but claimed to hold it as heir unto his father, and old enough to rule. Fain would Scipio have compounded the matter. But they answered peremptorily, that all their friends and kindred had already laboured in vain, to take up their quarrel; and that neither God nor Man, but only Mars, their god of battel, should be Umpire between them. So they had their wills: and the elder, who was also the stronger, and more skilful at his weapon, easily vanquished the fool-hardiness of the younger.

Such combats have been very ancient; and perhaps more ancient, than any other kind of fight. We read of many performed before the War of Troy; by Theseus, Hercules, Pallax, and others: as also of two more at the War of Troy, the one between Paris and Menelaus; the other between Hector and Ajax. Neither want their examples of them among the Hebrews: whereof that between David and Goliath; and others performed by some of David's Worthies, against those that challenged them, are greatly celebrated. Unto the same kind appertain the fight between twelve of the Tribes of Juda, and as many of the Benjamites. The Romans had many of them: whereof that was principal, in which they ventured their Dominion upon the heads of three brethren the Horatii, against the three brethren, Curatii, that were Albans. The combat of Manlius Torquatus; and shortly after: of Valerius Corvinus; with two Champions of the Gauls, which challenged any Roman: were of less importance, as having only reference to bravery. In England there was a great Combat fought between Edmond Ironside, and Canutus the Dane, for no less matter than the Kingdom. The use of them was very frequent in the Saxon times; almost upon every occasion, great or small. In the reign of Edward the third, who sustained the party of Montfort, against the Earl of Blois, contending for the Duchy of Brittain; there was a fight for honour of the Nations, between thirty of the Britons, and thirty English: two of which English, were Calverley, a brave Captain; and that Sir Robert Knoller is, who afterwards became a renowned Commander in the French wars, and did highly honour his blood, whereof the Lord Knoller is descended. It were infinite to reckon the examples of the like, found in English, French and Italian Histories. Most of them have been combats of bravery, and of gasté de cœur, as the French term it; for honour of several Nations; for love of Mistresses; or whatsoever else gave occasion unto men, desirous to set out themselves. But besides those of this sort, there are two other natures of combats; which are, either upon accusation for life, or upon trial of Title and Inheritance, as in Writ of right. And of this latter kind, was that, of which we speak even now, between Corbis and Oryssa. Unto these (we think) may be added, as of different condition from the rest, the combat upon Wager; such as were between David and Goliath, or that between the Horatii and Curatii, in which without regard of Title, the Dominion of Nations, one over the other, is adventured upon the head of Champions. Upon an accusation for life, there was a combat appointed between the Lord Henry of Beaulieu, Duke of Hersford, and Mowbray, Duke of Norfolk. There was a combat performed by Sir John Ashley and one Cattinger: whom Ashley charged with treason; and proved it upon him, by being victorious. The like was fought between Robert of Mountfort, and Henry of Essex. The like also, was fought between a Navarrois, and one Wells of Grimsby, whom the Navarrois accused of treason: but, being beaten in fight, confessed that he had belied him, and was therefore drawn and hanged. Whether our trial by battel do determine, that the false accuser, if he be vanquished, shall suffer the punishment which had been due to the offender, if the accusation had been proved; I cannot affirm. But we every where find, That if he which is accused of treason, or according to the customs of Normandy, of Murder, Rape, or burning of places, Offences punishable

ed by death) be overcome, He shall suffer the pains appointed for those crimes, in combats for trial of right, it is not so : neither is the Appellant or Defendant bound to fight in person , but he may try it by his Champion, as did Paranour and Low, or offered to do, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. And in this case, he that is beaten or yieldeth, loseth only his cause, not his life. Neither are the combats upon accusation, or trial of right, fought in open field , as are those of bravery, but in Camp clofe, that is, within rails. Now this trial by combat was ordinary in France, before the time of S. Lewis and Philip the fair his grand-child, as every Lord of Fee, Ecclesiastical or Temporal, had power to grant it within his own Jurisdiction. And it seemeth, that the French Kings, and other Lords, made their profit hereby. For in the * Memorials of the Chamber of Accounts, is found an Article to this effect ; That if a Combat were once accepted, and after, by consent of the Lord, were taken up, each of the parties should pay two shillings six pence ; but if it were performed, then should the party vanquished forfeit an hundred and twelve shillings. And upon this custom grew the French Proverb, which they use when as any man hath had an hard and unjust judgement ; saying, That He was strayed by the Law of Loraig, or Berne ; on le battin oays l' amende, where he that is beaten gives the recompence. Of these frequent trials by battel that great learned man Too, Bishop of Chartres did often complain, and specially against the French Church-men : as appears by * his Letters to the Bishop of Orleans, to the Arch-deacon of Paris, to Remember Archbishop of Sens, and to others ; wherein he rebukes the judgement of their Churches, that had ratified such challenges of combat. But this liberty and kind of trial, was retreatched by S. Lewis, and Philip the fair ; so that no man could decree or grant it, save the King himself. It hath since been granted, though more sparingly, by the French King, as to the Lord of Caroguer, against Jaqnes le Gris ; and to Julian, Romero the Spaniard, against Noro his countryman ; wherein Sir Henry Knevet, Father to the Lord Knevet now living, was Patron to Romero that had the victory ; and lastly to the Lord of Chesh. Now in those challenges, upon accusation of Treason, Murder, or other offence deserving death (and in those only) the rule held, That he defendeu ehoit tenu de proposer ses defences par un deventier. The defendant was bound to plead not guilty, by giving the accuser the Lye : otherwise it was concluded, That the defendant did falsely.

ment confesser le crime ; silently confess the crime. But after such time as Francis the FrenchKing upon some difturbance about breach of Faith, had sent the Lye unto the Emperor Charles the fifth, thereby to draw him to a personal combat ; every petty companion in France, in imitation of their Master, made giving of the Lye mortality it self ; holding it a matter of no small glory, to have it said, That the meaneft Gentleman in France would not put up, what the great Emperor Charles the fifth had patiently endured.

From this beginning is derived a challenge of combat, grounded upon none of those occasions that were known to the Ancients. For, the Honour of Nations, the Tryal of Right, the Wager upon Champions, or the Objection and Refutation of capital offences, are none of them, nor all of them together, the argument of half so many Duels, as are founded upon mere private Anger, yea, or upon matter seeming worthy of anger in the opinion of the Duellists. So that in these daies, wherein every man takes unto himself a Kingly liberty, to offer, accept, and appoint personal combats, the giving of the Lye, which ought to be the Negation only in accusations for life, is become the most fruitful root of deadly quarrels. This is held a word so terrible, and a wrong so unpardonable, as will admit no other recompence than the blood of him that gives it: Thus the fashion, taken up in haile by the French Gentlemen, after the pattern of their King, is grown to be a custom: whence we have derived a kind of Art and Philosophy of quarrel; with certain grounds and rules, from whence the points of honour, and the dependencies thereof, are reduced. Yea, there are (among many no less ridiculous) some so mystical curiosities herein, as that it is held a far greater dishonour, to receive from an enemy a slight touch with a Cane, than a sound blow with a Sword; the one having relation to a slave, the other to a souldier. I confess that the difference is pretty: though for my own part, if I had had any such irritated enemy in former times, I should willingly have made with him such an exchange; and have given him the point of honour to boot.

But let us examine indifferently the offence of this terrible word, the Lye, with their conditions who are commonly of all other the most tender in receiving it. I say, that the most of these, who present death on the points of their swords to all that give it them, use nothing so much in their conversation and course of life, as to speak and swear falsely. Yea, it is thereby, that they shift and shuffle in the World, and abuse it. For how few are there among them, which, having assumed and sworn to pay the moneys and other things they borrow, do not break their word and promise, as often as they engage it? Nay, how few are there among them, that are not Lyars by Record, by being sued in some Court or other of Justice, upon breach of word or bond? For he which hath promised that he will pay money by a day, or promised any thing else, wherein he faileth; hath directly lied to him to whom the promise hath been made. Nay, what is the profession of love that men make now-a-days? What is the vowing of their service, and of all they have, used in their ordinary complements, and (in effect) to every man whom they bid not good morrow, or salute, other than a courteous and Court-like kind of lying? It is (saith a wise French man, deriding therein the Apish custome of his Country) un marche & complot fait ensemble, se mocquer, mentir, & piper les uns les autres; A kind of merchandise, and complot made among slaves, to mock, lye, and deride each other: and so far now-a-days in fashion, and in use; as he that useth it not, is accounted either dull or Cynical. True it is notwithstanding (omitting the old distinction) that there is great difference between these mannerly and complemental lyes, with those which are sometime perswaded by necessity upon breach of promise; and those which men use out of cowardize and fear; the latter confessing themselves to be in greater awe of men, than of God; a vice of all other stiled the most villanous. But now for the Lye it self, as it is made the subject of all our deadly quarrels in effect, to it I say, That whosoever giveth another man the Lye, when it is manifest that he hath lyed, doth him no wrong at all; neither ought it to be more hainously taken, than to tell him, he hath broken any promise which he hath otherwise made. For he that promiseth any thing, tells him, to whom he hath promised, that he will perform it; and, in not performing it, he hath made himself a Lyar. On the other side, He that gives any man the Lye, when he himself knows that he, to whom it is given, hath not lyed; doth therein give the Lye directly to himself. And what cause have I, if I say that the Sun shines when it doth shine, and that another fellow tells me I lye, for it's midnight; to prosecute such an one to death, for making himself a foolish Russian and a lyar in his own knowledge? For he that gives the Lye in any other dispute, than in defence of his Loyalty, or Life, gives it impertinently, and Russian-like.

I will not deny but it is an extream rudeness to tax any man in publick with an untruth (if it be not pernicious, and to his prejudice against whom the untruth is uttered.) But all that is rude, ought not to be civilized with death. That were more to admire and imitate a French custome, and a wicked one, than to admire and to follow the counsel of God. But you will say, that these discourses favour of cowardize. Is true; if you call it cowardize to fear God or hell; whereas he that is truly wise, and truly valiant, knows that there is nothing else to be feared. For against an Enemies sword, we shall find ten thousand seven penny-men (waged at that price in the wars) that fear it as little, or perchance less, than any profest Sword-man in the world. Diligentissima in tela sui Fortitudo; Fortitudo in a diligens prefector of it self. It is (saith Aristotle) a mediocrity between doubting and daring. Sicut non Martyrem pœna; sic nec sortem pœna, sed causa: As it is not the punishment that makes the Martyr: so it is not fighting in a good cause. In which, whosoever hath resolutely ended his life, resolutely in respect of the cause, to wit, in defence of his Prince, Religion, or Countrey: as he may justly be numbered among the Martyrs of God; so may those that die with malicious hearts, in private combats, be called the Martyrs of the Devil. Neither do we indeed take our own revenge, or punish the injuries offered us, by the death of the injurious. For the true conquest of revenge is, to give him, of whom we would be revenged, cause to repent him: and not to lay the repentance of another mans death upon our own consciences; Animasq; in vulnere ponere; And to drown our souls in the wounds and blood of our enemies. Hereupon you will again ask me, if I condemn, in generous and noble spirits, the defence of their honours, being prest with injuries? I say that I do not, if the injuries be violent. For the Law of Nature, which is a branch of the Eternal Law; and the Laws of all Christian Kings and States; do favour him that is assailed, in the slaughter of the assailant. You will secondly ask me, Whether a Noble-man, or a Gentleman, being challenged by Cartel by one of like quality, be not bound in point of honour to satisfy the challenger in private combat? I answer, that he is not: because (omitting the greatest, which is the point of Religion) the point of the Law is directly contrary and opposite to that, which they call the point of honour; The Law which hath dominion over it, which can can judge it, which can destroy it; except you will stile those Affairs honourable, where the Hang-man gives the Garland. For, seeing the Laws of this Land have appointed the Hang-man to second the Conqueror, and the Laws of God appointed the Devil to second the Conquered, dying in malice: I say, that he is both base and a fool, that accepts of any Cartel so accompanied. To this, perchance it will be answered, That the Kings of England, and other Christian Kings, have seldom taken any such advantage over men of quality, who upon even terms have slain their private enemies. It is true, that as in times of trouble and combustion they have not often done it; so did our Noble-men and Gentlemen in former ages, in all important injuries, sue unto the King, to approve themselves by battel and publick combat. For as they dared not to brave the Law; so did they disdain to submit themselves unto the shameful revenge thereof; the same revenge (because it detesteth murder) that hath declared against a common Cut-purse or other Thieves: Nay let it be granted that a pardon be procured for such offenders: yet it is not the manslayer freed from his pardon. For these two remedies hath the party grieved notwithstanding that is, to require justice by Grand Assize, or by battel, upon his appeal, which (saith Sir Thomas Smith) is not denied; and he further saith (for I use his own words) That if the Defendant (to wit, the manslayer) be convinced either by great Assize or by Battel, upon that appeal; the manslayer shall die notwithstanding the Princes pardon. So favourable (saith the same learned Gentleman) are our Princes, and the Law of our Realm, to justice & to the punishment of blood violently shed. It may further be demanded, how our Noblemen and Gentlemen shall be repaid in honour, where an enemy, taking the start either in words or blows shall lay on them an infamy unufferable: I say, that a Marshalls Court will easily give satisfaction in both. And if we hold it no disgrace to submit our selves for the recovery of our Debts, Goods, and Lands; and for all things else by which the lives of our selves our wives, and children, are sustained, to the Judges of the Law; because it may be felony to take by violence even that which is our own: why should we not submit our selves unto the Judges of honour in cases of honour; because to recover our reputation by strong hand, may be murder? But yet again, it may be objected, that the loss of honour ought to be much more fearful unto us, than either the loss of our goods, of our lands, or of our lives; and I say so too. But what is this honour, I mean honour indeed, and that which ought to be so dear unto us: other than a kind of History, or fame following actions of virtue, actions accompanied with difficulty or danger, and undertaken for the publick good? In these he that is employed and trusted, if he fail in the performance, either through cowardize, or any other base affection; it is true that he loseth his honour. But the acting of a private combat, for a private respect, and most commonly a frivolous one, is not an action of virtue, because it is contrary to the Law of God, and of all Christian Kings: neither is it difficult, because even and equal in persons and arms: neither for a publick good, but tending to the contrary; because the loss or mutilation of an able man, is also a loss to the Common weal.

Now that a Marshall of England hath power to save every mans fame and reputation, as far as reputation may sustain injury by words, I think no man doubteth. For to repent us of any evil words that we have given, and to confess that we have done him wrong, unto whom we have given them, is a sufficient satisfaction; and as may fall out, more than sufficient. For he that gives ill words in choler, and suddenly denies them, or repents himself of them upon advisement hath the disadvantage in point of reputation. Concerning blows, which are indeed not to be given but to those that are servile, whether sufficient recompence will be made for them, it shall appear by a notable example of a most worthy Gentleman Monfieur de Plessis, that was stricken in France not long since by a Baron of the same nation. The satisfaction which was given him by a judgement of the Constable and Marshalls of France, was this. In the open Court, wherein the Constable gave judgement, M. de Plessis was set in a chair under the degrees where the Constable and Marshalls sat: the Baron, who had given him the blow, did kneel before him on both his knees, holding in his right hand a sword with the point towards him. It, and in his left hand the like cudgel or bastinado, where-with he had stricken M. de Plessis, both which weapons he delivered into Plessis hands, submitting himself to such revenge, as it should please him to take with either of those weapons; the Constable and Marshalls having formerly left it to the will of Plessis, to use his own discretion in the revenge of his own wrongs. Now whether the Baron had reason to please himself, as one beforehand in point of honour, (who struck M. de Plessis

like a Russian coming behind him, and his having the advantage of company, and his horres ready, shifted himself away on the sudden; but being afterwards taken, was taught to repent himself in this shameful manner: or whether Monſieur de Fleſſis (of whose valour no man doubted) had not far juster cause to rest satisfied, since he might at his pleasure have beaten or wounded his enemy, but forgave him: let any wise man judge. To this if it be said, That the Baron was constrained to make his submission that his repentance was enforced, and not voluntary; and therefore no disgrace unto him: I answer, that one may say as well, that it is no disgrace to a Thief, when he is brought to the Gallows, to repent him of the Robberies by him committed; because his repentance also is constrained. And it is true, that enforced repentance is no grace in respect of a force, but in respect of the fact: which (but for our sins to God) makes all repentance shameful: because all forced repentance is inflicted upon us for somewhat unworthy of a Gentleman, and of an honest man. Nay, voluntary repentance it self, as it hath relation to men, ariseth either out of the fear of the ill that may befall us, or out of the acknowledgement of our own weakness. Certainly as wise men, and valiant men do rather deride petty injuries or sudden injuries, that are not offered from malice fore-thought, than revenge them: so men, apt to quarrel, do commonly suspect their own valour; and rather desire, that thereby the world should believe them to be of great daring, than know any such resolution in themselves. For he that knows himself indeed to be an honest man, scorns to hunt after opinion.

Now the same power which the Constable and Marshals of France have, hath also a Marshal of England, or his Deputies: by whose judgement in all disputes of honour, every mans reputation may be preserved; we may therefore as well submit our selves to the Judge of honour in all disputes of honor, as we do submit our selves in all controversies of livelihood and life, to the Judges of the Law. And, out of doubt, the institution of this Court of Chevalrie in England, in France, and elsewhere: was no less charitable than politic. For the blood of man, violently spilt, doth not bring forth hony bees as that of Bulls doth, which sting but the fingers, or the face: but it produceth that monstrous beast, Revenge, which hath tions to death, and eaten up, of several nations, so many noble personages; as there is nothing more lamentable, nor more threatening the wrath of God upon supream Governours, than the permission.

His Majesty therefore (which Henry the IV. of France also endeavoured) hath done a most Kingly and Christian-like deed in Scotland, which the most renowned of all his Prædecessors could never do: in beating down and extinguishing that hereditary prosecution of malice, called the deadly feud, a conquest, which shall give him the honour of Prudence and Kingly power for evermore. And we have cause to hope, that his royal care shall be no less happy in preventing the like mischief, which threatens England, by the audacious, common, and brave, yet outrageous vanity of Duellists.

Unto this that I have spoken of lying, and of man-slaughter, it must be added, That each of these are of great Latitude, and worthy of reproof and vengeance proportionably, more or less, in their several degrees. There is much difference between Lies of necessity upon breach of promise, or complemental lies; and such pernicious lies, as proceed from fear and cowardize, or are uttered by false witnesses: the former sort being excusable by weakness or levity; the latter being altogether detestable. No less, if not more, difference there is, between killing of a man in open field, with even weapons; and that killing, which the Scriptures call killing by guile, dolo, or per insidias though our Laws do not much distinguish them in punishment. For in the latter, God, forsaking his own privileged, commandeth that the guisful murderer be drawn by force, from the protection of his Altar. Neither ^{Exod. xi.} is every guilefull murder performed by the sword, nor by overt violence: but there is a guisfull murder also, by poisoning; and by the pen, or by practice. For such distinction is found, between coming presumptuously upon a man, to slay him with guile; and ^{Exod. xi.} by ^{Prov. vi.} waiting in wait for blood, privily, for the innocent, without a cause, upon hope of spoil, after such manner as the net is spread before the eyes of the Birds. Francis the first, Queen Mary of England, and the Kings Majesty now reigning, have given notable testimony of their justice, upon three Noble men, who committed guisful murder. Of the first kind, King Francis upon the Lord of Talarat: who being (saith the French Historian) de haute & ancienne lignee, & support de plusieurs grandes alliances; who being of high and ancient lineage, and supported by divers great alliances, of which the Cardinal of Bellay (in especial favour with the King) was one; was notwithstanding delivered over into the hands of the Hangman. ^{Q.} Mary, upon a Noble

Noble man of her own Religion, and in many other respects very dear unto her, His Majesty, upon a Baron of Scotland; whose house was no less ancient and faithful, than himself valiant, and greatly friended both at home and abroad. Of killing guisfully by poison, and of punishment following such wicked Artisans, every age hath had too many examples. Of killing guisfully by d'une imaginaire faveur, qui pour fin de jeu le submerge; A fair lesson to all Judges, to dwell always in themselves, and not to suffer their consciences to float upon the waves of imaginary favour, which in the end overthroweth them. And as for the Admiral, though it might have been answered unto his friends, if any bewail his calamity as undeserved, That he was tryed, according to his own desire, by the Laws of his Country, and by the Judges of Parliament; yet the Kings justice, surmounting all other his passions, gave back unto him his Honour, his Offices, his Liberty, and his Estate.

^{178. c. 18.} the pen (that I may not speak of any ^{Exod. xi.} English Judge) the Author of the French Recherches gives unto us two notable instances: the one of des Elbars, who (saith Pasquier) fit mourir Montaignu grand Maistre de France, pour contenter l'opinion celui dont il estoit l'idolatre; & Dieu permit que depuis il fut pendu & étranglé; Who caused Montaignu great Master of France to die to content his mind (to wit, the Duke of Burgoyne) whom at that time Elbars worshipped as his Idol; but God permitted, that he himself was soon after hanged and strangled. The other was of the Great Francis the first, upon his Chancellor Poyet; who to satisfy the Kings passion, practised the destruction of the Admiral Colboſa a man most nobly defended, and of great service. For as in other men, so in Kings the passion of love grows old, and wears out by time. So the Kings affection being changed towards the Admiral, he charged him with some offences, which he had formerly committed: The Admiral presuming upon the great good service which he had done the King in Picmont, and in the defence of Marſeilles against the Emperour, gave the King other language than became him; and desired nothing so much, as a publick trial. Hereupon the King (it being easie to provoke an ill disposition) gave commission to the Chancellor, as President, and other Judges, upon an information of the Kings Advocate, to question the Admirals life; The Chancellor, an ambitious man, and of a large confidence, (which is not rare in men towards the law) hoping highly to content the King; wrought with some of the Judges with so great cunning; with others with so sharp threats; and with the rest, with so fair promises; as albeit nothing could be proved against the Admiral, worthy of the Kings displeasure, yet the Chancellor subscribed, and got others to subscribe, to the forfeiture of his Estate, Offices, and Liberty, though not able to prevail against his life. But what was the Chancellors reward (the King hating falsehood in so great a Magistrate) other than his own degradation, arraignment and condemnation? Belle les on certes (saith Pasquier) a tout jüge pur de mourir tousjours en soy, & ne laisser jücher sa conscience debans les vagues

†. III.

The last Acts of Scipio in Spain. His return to Rome, where he is chosen Consul.

THE last business that troubled Scipio in Spain, grew by the rebellion of the people, and mutiny of his Souldiers. He fell dangerously sick, in such sort that the rumour of his death ran current throughout Spain. This encouraged Mandonius and Indibilis, petty Kings, that had forsaken the Carthaginians, and followed Scipio a while before, to take arms against the Romans: They were vainly perswaded, that after the Carthaginians were driven out; they themselves should become the mightiest in all Spain. But seeing now, that things were no way answerable to the greatness of their hopes; they thought it best, to take the present advantage, and hammer out their own fortunes. So they rashly fell upon the Suessetani and Sedetani, confederates of the Romans; and wasted their Country. Part of the Roman Army lying at Suero, instead of making head against these Rebels, grew to be affected with the like distemper. They had not reped such profit of the Roman conquests, as might satisfy their desire; so as they thought easie to be gotten if they might be their own Carvers. Wherefore, when the death of Scipio was reported, they thought that the time served very well, to enrich themselves with the spoil of the Country. Many outrages they committed: and, which was greatest of all, driving away their Colonels, that should have bridled their fury; they chose out of their own number two base fellows, Albinus Calenus, and Atrius Umber, to their Commanders. These took upon them all the Ensigns of Pro-consuls, or Pro-pretors; as if this their election had been like to that, wherein Lucius Marcius was chosen by the Souldiers after the death of the two Scipios: But whilest they were devising what exploits plots they might do, for the enriching of themselves, in a time of such combustion as was expected, there arrived more certain news, that Scipio was both alive, and in good health. There came also new Colonels, sent unto them from their General: who mildly rebuking their want of consideration, and seeming to be glad that they had no further over-shot themselves; led them to Carthage, there to receive their pay. Before their coming, Scipio had resolved to do exemplary justice on the principal offenders; and to put the whole multitude of them in fear of what they had deserved. Therefore he caused Syllanus to make ready their Companies which lay before in the Town, as it were to make an Expedition against Mandonius and Indibilis: he caused Albins and Atinius with some thirty other of their Complices, to be secretly apprehended in their lodgings: he called the Mutiners to assembly; and having them unarmed as they were, encircled round by Syllanus and his companies, prepared for the purpose, he bitterly inveighed against them all as Traitors. This done, Albins and Atinius, with the other prisoners were haled to the stake, where they were whipt and beheaded, as was the Roman custom toward such offenders. The rest of the Souldiers, to the number of eight thousand, were caused to take their oath of obedience anew; and received every man his pay when he was sworn.

Mandonius and Indibilis continued in arms: notwithstanding that they had certain word of Scipio his life and health. Well they could have been contented to be quiet: but by the severity used to the Roman Souldiers, they stood in fear, as being Spaniards, and greater offenders, of harder measure. Scipio went against them, and found them in a valley, that was scarce large enough to hold all their Army. In the entrance thereof he fought with them: and sending Laelius with all his horse, to fetch a compals about the hills, and charge them in rear, he overthrew them. Indibilis and Mandonius had after this, no hope remaining to preserve themselves and their estates, other wise than by making submission. Mandonius therefore came to Scipio: and humbly craving pardon, both for himself and for his brother Indibilis, obtained his request; yet so, that they were taught to acknowledge themselves less free Princes than formerly they had been.

Afterwards Scipio went toward Gades: and was met on the way by Masaniassa; who secretly promised to do him all service, if the people of Rome would send him to make war in Africk. Unto Mago that lay in Gades, came directions from Carthage, that letting all care of Spain alone, he should thence depart from his fleet into Italy; and there wage an Army of Gauls and Ligurians, to joyn with Hannibal. For this purpose, was money sent unto him from Carthage; and he himself laid hold upon all that he could find in the Town of Gades; without sparing either private men, the common treasury, or the Temples. In this voyage thence, he landed at Carthage; hoping to have taken it by surprise. But he failed in the attempt, and was so beaten to his ships, that he returned back to repose himself a while at Gades. The Gaditanes, offended with the robberies and spoil that he had made at his taking leave of them, would not suffer him again to enter into their City. By this he saw, that it would not be long ere they became Roman. Wherefore sending Messengers into the Town, to complain of this uncourteous dealing, he allured their Magistrates forth unto him; whom, notwithstanding all the excuse that they could make, he whipt and crucified. This done, he followed his former intended voyage; bidding Spain farewell for ever.

The Isle and City of Gades, was yielded to the Romans, presently after the departure of Mago. Then did Scipio deliver up the Province, to those that were sent from Rome to succeed him therein: & himself with ten ships returned home. At his coming to Rome, he made suit for the honour of a triumph. But it was denied him: for that it had as yet been granted unto no Proconsul, excepting to such, as received that dignity after a Consulship, as it were by protraction. But to make amends for this repulse, the election of new Consuls being then in hand, by general voice of the City, P. Cornelius Scipio was chosen Consul, and P. Licinius Crassus joyned with him. This Crassus, being high Priest, or Bishop of the Romans, might not by the custom of those times, go far from the City, as being to intend the matters of their superstition: though Cesar, and others, who in ages following held the same office, were stayed by no such religious impediment, from being far and long absent. Hereby it came to pass, that Scipio, desiring to have the war transferred into Africk, was in no danger to lose that honourable charge, by any mischance of lot, in the division of Provinces; for that his Colleague was not capable of employment so far off.

§. XVIII.

§. XVIII.

Scipio obtains leave to make war in Africk. His preparations. Of Masaniassa who was joyned with Scipio. The victories against Asdrubal and Syphax.

P. Cornelius Scipio, and P. Licinius Crassus, entering into their Consulship, held a meeting of the Senate in the Capitol: where it was decreed, that Scipio should be allowed, to bestow part of the money which he had brought out of Spain into the treasury; upon the setting forth of solemn plays, that he had vowed to make whilst he was busied in his Spanish wars. This helped ready to revive the memory of his victories already gotten; and to give hope unto the People of greater victories in the war, which he intended to make in Africk. To the same purpose, did the Spanish Embassages avail much in the Senate; especially that of the Saguntines: who magnified his actions highly and deservedly; saying, that they were the most happy of all their countrymen, since they being present, had seen him chosen Consul, and should carry home such joyful news. The Saguntine Embassadors were lovingly entertained by the Senate: as their faith to Rome (though costly it were both to them and to the Romans) had well deserved. Nevertheless, when Scipio proposed, that Africk might be decreed unto him for his Province, there wanted not many, even of the principal men, that vehemently gainsaid him. Of these was Q. Fabius Maximus the chief: who seems to have been troubled with that disease, which too often caused men, renowned for long approved virtue, to look askint upon the actions of those, that follow them in the same kind. He alleged many reasons against the purpose of the Consul; whereof the chief were, that the Treasury was unable to sustain the charges of a war in Africk; and that it was extremely perilous to hazard to great forces, where they could not at pleasure be recalled unto the defence of Rome itself, if need required. Hereunto he added many words concerning the danger wherein Italy stood, not only of Hannibal, but of Mago his brother, that was arming the Ligurians: as also concerning the honour of the Consuls, which would (he said) be greater in setting Italy free from enemies, than it could be in doing any harm to Africk. Neither did he forget, both to elevate the Spanish wars, as of less moment than the intended voyage against Carthage, nor withall to lay great blame upon Scipio, for having suffered Asdrubal to pass into Italy: shewing, that it was greatly to be feared, lest the like might happen again; and that a new Army, notwithstanding the good success of Scipio, (if it hapned to be good) might be sent from Carthage, to the utter endangering of Rome, whilst the Roman forces were employed abroad. But the main point which he urged, was, that neither the Senate had ordained, nor the People commanded, Africk to be that year a Province; which the Consul nevertheless propounded in such wise, as if it were a matter already concluded, and no longer to be argued. Scipio on the other side, insisted upon this one point, that it was better to make an offensive, than a defensive war, especially against such as the Carthaginians, who being ill provided of able men at home, did furnish themselves, by help of money, with levies made abroad. As for the care of Italy, he doubted not, but P. Licinius his Colleague would be as well able to discharge it now, as others had done in times of greater danger. So promising to draw Hannibal into Africk, for defence of his own home; and taxing as civilly as he could, the envy of Fabius, which withstood such a gallant enterprise, he proposed the matter again to the Senate. Much altercation there was about the manner of his proceeding: forasmuch as it was noised abroad, that if he could not bring the Senate to his mind, he would carry it by the people. This offended many of the ancients: who represented in this honourable man, a little spice of that arrogance, which in following ages grew to be much hotter, in those that had commanded long abroad. But in conclusion, Scipio referred himself wholly to the Senate's good will and pleasure; whereby he obtained thus much, That the Isle of Sicily might be appointed unto him for his Province; with leave to pass over into Africk, if he found it expedient.

Want of money, and no great liking to his voyage, made the Roman Senate have little care to furnish out Scipio to the war, by him intended upon Africk. Herewithall it fell out, that Mago, coming on the sudden from the Euleares to Genoa, and winning the Town, bred a fear of no less terrible invasion upon Italy, than that which Asdrubal had lately made. He could not indeed raise any great Army of the Ligurians; for that he found them distracted with civil wars. Therefore he was driven to make choice of his party; and to help those whom he thought fittest for his turn, against the others. This troublesome business, though it occupied more of his time than he could willingly have spared; yet it got him reputation by his victories, and made the unsteady Gauls ready dy to enter into his pay. Hereupon the dispersed Legions of the Romans, that under Proconsuls, and Prætors, lay ready to be employed where need should require; were directed unto the borders of Lombardy and Liguria, there to make head against Mago. But all his menaces passed away in vapour. For a fleet, either coming to his aid from Carthage, or by him sent thither (the report is uncertain) laden with the booty that he had taken, fell into the hands of the Roman Prætor, that governed in Sardinia. This did much displease him: and though after a while, there came letters from Carthage, together with store of money, heartning him in his proceedings; yet some impediments which he found, and that fatal voyage of Scipio into Africk, disturbed all; and made him be re-called home.

Against Hannibal was nothing done this year. Neither was any thing done by him, of which the Roman Historians have been pleased to take notice. Only it is said, that he spent his Summer by the Temple of Juno Lacina, where he raised an Altar, with a huge Title of all that he had performed, graven in Finnick and Greek letters. Such account of winnings past, is commonly in Gamesters that are at the height of their fortune, a cause of remission and carelessness; in those that are upon the losing hand, a cause both of the fame for the present, and shortly after of dejection, when they find a notable change. A great pestilence infecting both the Carthaginian and the Roman Camp, is said to have been the occasion of this years idleness; which fell out not much amiss for the City of Rome, that was marvelously impoverished by this war; and had already tried the utmost way to defray the charges, which grew insupportable. To relieve the present necessity, it was well thought upon, that a great part of Campania (not many years since confiscated) should be sold, or let out: in which bargain, that the City might receive no loss, the tenth part of the fine was ordained, as a reward unto the detectors of lands concealed.

Of this, or other money, none was given to Scipio. Neither was he allowed to make press of Souldiers for his African voyage; neither did he over-much labour to obtain it. That which the Senate refused, the people did for him; or rather they did it for themselves; that were therein wiser than the Senate. It is usually found in Councils of estate, that the buse, or obdurate heads of a few do carry all the rest. And many times men make a surrender of their own judgements, to the wisdom, that hath gotten it self a name, by giving happy direction in troubles forepast. Therefore, he that reposeth himself upon the advice of many, shall often find himself deceived: the counsel of those many being wholly directed by the Empire of a few, that over-sway the rest. Q. Fabius was accounted the Oracle of his time: for his wary nature forced well with the business, that fell out in the chief of his employment. Unto him therefore Q. Fulvius adhered; with other of the Senators, that were grown old in following one course; from which they could not shift, as the change of time required. But the People (who though they could not well advise, and deliberate, yet could well apprehend) embraced the needful resolution of Scipio: in such fort, that besides his Roman forces, he had from divers parts of Italy about seven thousand Voluntaries. He had also provision from the several Towns: Corn, Iron, Canvas for sails, Axes, Beed-hooks, Hand-mills, and the like implements; Firre for building of ships, many thousands of Targets, Helmets and Spears of all kinds: every place furnished him with that commodity, which it best could afford.

Unto this willingness of the people, the diligence of Scipio was correspondent. In the compass of five and forty dayes he had both fell'd his Timber, built, and lanch'd twenty Triremes, and ten Quinquereme Gallies; where with he transported his Army into Sicily. In Sicily he found, besides other forces, two Legions, that had served at Canna: which were old Souldiers, and (as he himself well knew) not guilty of the overthrow; for which they had long undergone a heavy sentence. They had served under Marcellus and Lævinus, at the taking of many Cities and strong pieces: in which regard, they were like to be of good use to him in Africk, where would be store of such employment. For increasing the number of his horse, he pressed three hundred Sicilians, all wealthy young men, and such as loved well their ease. These he afterward discharged from the War, highly to their contentment: but with condition, that they should deliver their Horse and Arms, to as many Roman Gentlemen, which he brought over with him for the purpose. Whilest he was providing to have things in a readiness for Africk, the banished Locrians, that followed the Roman side, made him acquainted with an intelligence, whereby they hoped to recover their City. Some handicrafts-men, that wrought for the Carthaginians in one of the Citadels of Loori, (for there were two in the Town) being taken prisoners by the Romans, promised to betray the place, if they might be ransomed and rewarded.

Scipio

Scipio being advertised of this gave order to have the attempt made by night: which happily succeeded, and that Citadel was surprised. The other Citadel was strongly defended by the Carthaginian Garrison, which sent to Hannibal for aid. The Romans in like sort, fearing lest that their paucity should make them too weak for Hannibal, craved help of the Consul Scipio. The Townsmen were doubtfully affected: but the best, and most of them inclining to the Romans, kept Hannibal out; whom the coming of Scipio caused thence to depart; and caused likewise the Carthaginian Garrison to abandon the other Citadel. Many outrages were committed by the Roman Souldiers, that were left by Scipio in custody of the Town. Wherefore a vehement complaint was made by the Locrians unto the Roman Senate; not only against those of the Garrison: but much more against Plinius the Captain, who gave bad example, and was worse than all the rest. Besides many Murders, Robberies, Rapes, and other villanies, the Temple of Proserpina, that had a great fame of sanctity, was spoiled by these barbarous Thieves. The Locrians therefore advised the Senate to make present amends to the goddess for this sacrilege: saying that the like had never been committed, without notorious revenge by her taken upon the Authors. The Senate gave good ear to this complaint, comforted the Locrians, and redressed the injuries done unto them; sent for Plinius, with other principal offenders; whom they cast into prison, and used according to their deserts: as also they restored unto Proserpina her money twice told. But old Q. Fabius was not herewithal contented. He laid much of the blame upon Scipio, that had placed such a man in Loori; and had not carefully hearkened to the complaints made against him, but suffered him to run on in these wicked courses. By the sharp invective that Fabius made, others took courage to speak what they pleased, as well against the demeanour of Scipio, as against the dissoluteness of his Army; which lay, as they said, idle in Sicily, neither mindful of any service toward, nor fit for it if need should require. Finally, things were so far urged, that ten Legates were sent over into Sicily, together with the Prætor appointed for that Island; two of the Tribunes, and one of the Ædiles; who should examine these matters; and either cause the General to return into Italy, or continue him in his charge, as they thought fit. The end of all was, they found him so well prepared against Carthage, as that they hastened him on his journey, and gave him high commendations at their return.

Scipio had already employed Lælius in Africk; rather to make discovery, than to work any other great effect of war. He took a great booty; and struck no little terror into the Carthaginians; who saw their affairs to be upon terms of change. But the greatest fruit of his journey was, That speaking with Masaniassa, he well informed himself of the state of Africk; and knew what was to be expected of those two Kings, that had promised to joyn with the Romans at their landing.

Concerning Masaniassa his revolt from the Carthaginians, and his compact made underhand with the Romans, Lælius doth profess, Lælius That there was no such evident cause thereof at the present; but that the long continuance of his faith and constancy, in following times, must help to prove, that this his change, was not without some good cause. But Appianus (an Historian far inferior to Lælius, both in worth and time) gives one reason for probable of this, and many accidents thereto belonging, as that it carries with it a great appearance of necessity truth. Only the doubt is, How it could any way come to pass, that the knowledge of such a matter should have escaped the diligence of Lælius, if it had been true: unless we should believe, that he wilfully forbore to rehearse a Tragedy; the sorrow whereof would cause men to think amiss of Scipio. Howsoever it was thus * Appian tells it; and many circumstances of things done, confirm it. Appian
Alexas, de
Bell. Pont. Asdrubal, the Son of Gisco, had a fair daughter, whom both King Syphax and Masaniassa loved. Masaniassa, being brought up at Carthage, and being withal a goodly Gentleman of person, and excellent in qualities, was chosen by Asdrubal to be his son-in-law. When the Virgin was betrothed unto him, he went into Spain, and there did great service. But afterwards, the Carthaginian Senate thought the marriage of Asdrubals daughter to be a matter of State: and bestowed her upon Syphax, without standing to acquaint her father or Masaniassa therewithall: This they did, for that Syphax was the more mighty Prince; and for that the indignity of the repulse, had made him become their enemy. Hereof Masaniassa was advertised; and forthwith entred into intelligence with Scipio, secretly as he thought; yet not so secretly, but some notice was taken of it: which would have cost him his life, had he not with great circumspection conveyed himself home, into his fathers Kingdom. Thus far forth we may believe Appianus: all the narration well cohering with things past, and following.

ing. Only it seems, that howsoever Sophonisba, the daughter of Asdrubal, was promised by the Carthaginians unto Syphax: yet since this their countess proceeded from fear, he thought it wisdom to continue and increase the same their fear, by making fair promises to the Romans, untill Asdrubal had sent for his daughter from Carthage, and the marriage was consummated. In other matters concerning the war it self, wherein Asdrubal differs much from Livie, and from Polybius, whom (as appears by the broken pieces of his works remaining) Livie did follow; it will be no offence, to take little heed unto his reports.

Masaniissa was the son of Gala, a King of the Numidians: whose father dying, the Crown descended, by order of the Country, unto Desalea the brother, not unto Masaniissa the son. But this Uncle of Masaniissa shortly possessed: and his elder son, who took possession of the kingdom, was vanquished, and slain in battle by a Rebel, that made himself Protector over the younger which was a child. The Traitor fortified himself against Masaniissa, whose return he feared, by Alliances with the Carthaginians and Syphax. But all would not serve: He and his Pupill, were dispossessed of their Estates by Masaniissa, that was a skilfull Warriour, and well beloved for the memory of his father Gala. The Carthaginians in reason would have been glad, that Masaniissa, who had done them notable service, was thus confirmed in his Estate, had they not been guilty of the injury by them done unto him; whilst his Uncle or Cousin reigned, and he seemed unlikely to stand them in any stead. But Syphax, by their procurement, and perhaps by his own malice, towards his Corrivall, warred upon him; and over-charging him with numbers, drave him out of his Kingdom. Nevertheless Masaniissa, still retained the hearts of his people; and thereby remained strong enough, to infect both Syphax and the Carthaginians; though he was often put in distress, by great forces that were sent against him. He therefore keeping much about the lesser Syrts, between the borders of the Carthaginians, and the Nation of the Garamantians, expected the coming of the Romans: yet so, as he made long roads over all the Country, even as far as Hippo; and when Lelium arrived thereabouts, exhorted and encouraged him to halten on Scipio to the invasion of Affrick.

But Syphax, in whose great aid and succour was reposed more hope of good success, than could be expected from the good will of poor Masaniissa, sent an Embassage into

Sicil about the same time, which was little pleasing unto Scipio. He excused himself of his promise lately made: and signified his alliance with the Carthaginians; adding, That he could not chuse but fight for the defence of Affrick, wherein he was born and reigned; and for the defence of his beloved wives Country, if it were invaded. Nevertheless he promised to remain a Neuter, so long as the Romans and Carthaginians held war abroad, far enough from Affrick, as hitherto they had done. This message hastened Scipio in his expedition, much more than any perswasion could have done. For, the promised assistance of Syphax had not a little advanced his enterprise; in procuring both the assent of the Senate, and the forwardness of many adventurers. Left therefore the failing of this hope, should work too great a change in common opinion, He thought it the best way to prevent all discourse, and set the war undertaken immediately on foot. The Embassadors he dismissed in haste, with letters to their King: wherein he wiled him to consider, that what he had promised, he had also sworn; and therefore should do well to make it good. Having sent them away, He called his Souldiers together; and bade them make ready for the voyage, which he intended no longer to defer. For, said he, Masaniissa hath been with Lelium: and Syphax hath newly sent me; greatly wondering upon what I should thus stay; and saying, That they will provide for themselves, if I fail their expectation by tarrying any longer. This fine tale prevented all further inquisition, that might else have been made concerning the message of these Embassadors: whose followers had been seen walking up and down Syracuse. And lest any thing should afterwards break out, that might hinder the business, Scipio immediately sent about his fleet unto Lysibaum: and requesting by letters M. Pomponius, that was Prator in Sicil, to meet him there; basted thither with his Army. At Lysibaum he agreed with the Prator, about the division of the Legions between them, which to leave behind for defence of the Island; and which to carry with him to Affrick. What numbers he transported, it is not certain: some Historians reckoning only ten thousand foot, and two and twenty hundred horse; others increasing them to five and thirty thousand, horse and foot. Concerning his directions for embarking, and other matters belonging to their course, I hold it needless to set them down: since they were points of ordinary care, and which it is like that neither he, when he took took his voyage into Spain, nor others upon like occasions, have omitted; they being also word for word set down by an Historian, who borrowed them from Livie, and fitted them to a Prince of later age.

This Roman Army landed in Affrick near to a fore-land then called the fair Promontory: which how far it was from Carthage, or toward what point of the Compass, I cannot precisely affirm; because it is uncertain, whether it were that Cape or Head-land which bore the name of Mercury, and lay to the North-east of Carthage; or whether that of Apollo, which lay Northerly from Carthage, and by West. The coming of Masaniissa unto Scipio at his first arrival, helped to confirm the opinion of Xylander, who thinks the fair Promontory to have been the same, that was also called Mercuries Cape, since with little difficulty Masaniissa might come thither from the lesser Syrts, whereabout was his common abiding. But forasmuch as without any memorable impediment soon after his arrival, Scipio encamped before Utica, that stood Westward from Carthage beyond the River Bagradas: it may rather seem, that he landed within the Promontory of Apollo, whence the way to Utica was not long. This is also strongly proved; for that out of Carthage were sent, the next day, five hundred horse to trouble him in his dis-embarking. Neither was it so hard for Masaniissa, that roved about the Contry with a troop of horse, to find out the Romans, though they landed far from the place to the which he usually resorted, like as before he had met with Lelium at Hippo that was farther off; as it would have been for Scipio, with his Army & Carriages, to overcome the trouble of a long journey, and fetch a great compass to Utica, by Land; when he might have disembarqued nearer unto it. Nevertheless it may pass as a conjecture, that Scipio came first of all to Emporia, a plentiful Region about the lesser Syrts; since he gave charge to the Masters of his ships, at the setting forth from Lysibaum, to shape their course for that coast. The Countrey thereabout was very rich, and fit for sustenance of an Army: neither were the Inhabitants warlike, or well provided to make resistance. Thus much perhaps Masaniissa had signified unto Lelium, when he spake with him at Hippo: thinking that the Romans, howsoever they made brave promises, would not come strong enough to fight at hand. But when he saw their Fleet and Army to be such, as not only served to invade the lands of Carthage, but threatened a conquest of the City and whole Estate: then might he better advise them to set sail for Utica, and make war upon the Enemies at their own doors.

The Carthaginians had at time neither any Captain of great worth at home, nor better Army than of raw Souldiers; that were levied, or to be levied in haste. Asdrubal the son of Gisco, the same that had lately been chased out of Spain by Scipio, was their best man of war. And good enough perhaps he was thought by Hanno and his fellows, of whose faction he was: or if ought were wanting in him, yet his Riches and Nobility, together with the affinity of King Syphax, made him passable. He was then with the King his son-in-law, working him no doubt against the Romans: when letters were brought from Carthage both to Syphax and to him, informing them of the Invasion: entreating the one of them to give assistance, and commanding the other to make his repair unto the City, where he was chosen General. But ere these could be ready, Scipio had beaten the troop of Carthaginian horse, that were sent out of the City to disturb his landings; and slain Hanno a young Gentleman, that was their Leader. He had also taken and sacked a Town of the Carthaginians: wherein, besides other booty, he took eight thousand prisoners; all which he conveyed aboard his Haulks or Ships of burden, and sent them back laden into Sicil. He took likewise a Town called Salera, which he held and fortified. In Salera lay another Hanno, with four thousand Numidian horse: whose service being fitter, for the field, than for defence of walled places, made Scipio to perceive the unskilfulness of their Leader, that had thus housed them. Wherefore he sent Masaniissa before him: who rode up to the gates; and, by making a bravado, trained out the improvident Hanno so far, that he drew him unto a place, where the Romans lay in wait for him. The victory was easily gotten, and Hanno either taken or slain. With those that fled, the Romans entered pell-mell into the Town, which presently they made their own. Thence went Scipio to Utica, a City of great importance, of which mention hath been formerly made, and late down before it. Forty dayes he spent about it, assailing it both by Land and Sea, and using all his engines of battery, whereof he had plenty, yet was in no likelihood of prevailing. And now the Summer was quite spent: so that it was time for him to choose a place, and fortifie his Winter-Camp, which must be well stored against the year following. Whilst thus necessity urged him to leave Utica: and shame of taking the repulse in his first great enterprise, rather than any hope of better success, caused him to stay there: Asdrubal and Syphax gave him the honour of a fair pretence to leave the siege. Asdrubal had made a levy of thirty thousand foot, and three thousand horse: yet adventured not with this ill-trained Army to draw near unto the Romans, before the coming of Syphax. Syphax brought with him unto Carthage fifty thousand foot, and ten thousand horse: which joining unto the forces of Asdrubal, they marched bravely toward Scipio; who thereby took occasion to dislodge. He chose for his Winter-Camp the banks of an In-let, that had good harbour for his Navy. His foot-men he lodged on a Promontory, joyning to the Continent by an arm of Land: his horse-men he bestowed upon lower ground, on the other shore; in the bottom of the Creek he moored his ships; and there he quartered the Mariners, with all that belonged unto the Fleet. The whole camp he strongly fortified, and so attended the season of the year, when it should serve him again to fight. Of cattle and other booty Masanissa had brought in great store, by driving the Country, before the coming of Asdrubal and Syphax. Corn also he had gotten some: and great store was sent him from Sciell and Sardinia. Likewise apparel for his Souldiers, was sent from home, or from Sardinia: though scarce enough to serve turn, for that it was a matter of more cost. The ships that brought these things, he freighted homewards with such part of his booty, as he could best spare: especially with captives to be sold for slaves. Asdrubal and Syphax encamped near unto Scipio: not so strongly fortifying themselves, as did the Romans, either for that they wanted the severer institution, which the Romans used in the discipline of war, or for that they presumed upon their multitude, against which they found in Scipio no disposition to issue forth of his strength, and fight. So the Winter passed without action.

When Spring drew near, Scipio thought it good to assay his old friend the Numidian King, if perhaps he might be won by persuasions to forsake the Carthaginians. It was considered, that those Barbarians were naturally unconstant; and particularly, that Syphax had given proof before this of his much levity. It might therefore be hoped, that having wearied himself by lodging a whole Winter in the Camp: and being peradventure no less weary with fatigue of his wife, who had caused him to enter into this war: he might be moved with a little entreaty to withdraw himself home into his Kingdom, and rest a Numidian. But it is not unlikely, that such a friend as this King, had been highly entertained and honoured in the City of Carthage, which was near at hand, as often as during this Winter it had pleased him, or as he had been invited, to make a step thither and repose himself a while: his wife Queen Sophonisba lying also there at the same time, to cherish him in his resolution. Howsoever it were, Syphax did only make an overture of peace: propounding it as reasonable, That Hannibal should be recalled out of Italy by the Carthaginians: and that the Romans in like sort should quietly depart out of Africa, and so make an end of the war: wherewith now both Africa and Europe were disquieted. Unto this would not Scipio at the first give ear: yet being pressed earnestly by many messages from Syphax, and desiring to continue the intercourse of Embassadors; he began to make shew, as if he would consider of the motion. He was given to understand by those whom he had sent unto the King, that the Enemies had their camps without any great defence of earth, full of wooden Cabins, and covered with boughs: and that the Numidians, such of them as came first with Syphax, used coverings of Mats and Reeds; others that came later, had thatched their lodgings with dry boughs and leaves: under which they lay carelessly without their Trenches. Upon this advertisement he thought himself, That it would not be hard for him to set their camps on fire, and thereby give them a notable overthrow: Without help of some such stratagem, he foresaw that it would be a work of great difficulty for him, to proceed in his wars when time should serve. It was a plain open Country wherein he lay: and the Enemies had great advantage of him in number, especially in horse; which, upon such ground, could not be resisted by the Roman Legions. The longer therefore that he thought upon the matter, the more needful he found it for himself, to make some sudden attempt upon their Camp. To this end he sent many Embassadors, under pretence of treating about the Peace; but indeed of purpose to discover all that might concern the intended surprise. With these Embassadors he sent, as Attendants, many old Souldiers, disguised like slaves; that wandering (as it were) idle up and down the Camp, might observe the ways and entrances, with whatsoever else was needful. When he had learned as much as he desired; upon the sudden sudden he sent word to Syphax, that it was vain to hold any longer treaty, forasmuch as he could not get the consent of his Council of war; without whose approbation, all that himself could do, was no more, than the good will of one man. This he did, to the end that, without any breach of faith, he might put his design in execution. The Truce being thus cut off, Asdrubal and Syphax were very pensive: as having lately persuaded themselves, that their trouble was almost at an end. But since it could be no better, they began to devise, by what art they might draw Scipio out of his Camp, and provoke him to battle in those Plains. This if they could do, they hoped to make his Council of war repent as greatly the refusal of peace, as did Marcus Attilius after the like presumption. But if he should refuse to come forth of his Trenches, what else remained than to besiege him? Which they themselves were well able to do by land; and the Carthaginian Fleet should do by Sea, that was making ready for the purpose. By such discourses these two comforted themselves; recompencing (in concept) the loss of their hopes past, with that victory to come. But herein they were extremely and worthily disappointed: for that consulting about the future, they provided not against present danger, but continued in the same negligence, which was grown upon them by the long discourse of peace. As for Scipio, he was not idle; but made preparation out of hand, as it were to do somewhat against Utica. Two thousand Souldiers he had made ready, and appointed to take the same piece of ground, whereon he lay against Utica before. This he did, partly to keep secret that which he had in hand, lest being suspected by his own Souldiers, the Enemy might happen to have notice of it; partly to hinder those of Utica from setting upon the few, that he purposed to leave behind him in his Camp. He caused his men that night to sup well, and betimes that they might be ready for the journey. After supper, he appointed such Companies as he thought fit, to the defence of his Camp; all the rest of the Army he led forth, about nine of the clock at night. The Carthaginians lay from him seven miles and an half: whom he purposed to undertake himself with the one half of his Army; the other half he committed to Lelius and Masanissa, whom he sent before him to set upon the camp of Syphax, that was farther off. It was his meaning, that the camp of Syphax should be on a light fire, ere he would meddle with the Carthaginians. For the fire might seem to have taken by casualty upon the Numidians that lay farther off, whereas if it first appeared in the camp of Asdrubal, it would be suspected as the doing of enemies, and give Syphax warning to look to himself. To this end therefore Scipio marched fair and softly: that Lelius and Masanissa, who had a longer journey, and were to fetch a compass about for fear of being discovered, might have time to get before him, and do their feat. It was about two or three a clock in the morning, when the camp of Syphax began to blaze: which not only the Numidians, but their King himself, imputed unto casualty; as thinking themselves safe enough from enemies, for that the Carthaginians lay interposed between them and the danger. Wherefore as if there were no more to do, (some starting half asleep, and others that had fallen up late at drinking, ran out of their Cabins to quench the fire. But so great was the tumult, that they neither could rightly understand in what case they were, nor give any remedy to the mischief as it was supposed. Many were smothered and burnt in the flame, which grew greater and greater: many, leaping into the Trenches for fear of the sudden mischief, were trampled to death by the multitude that followed them. They that escaped the fire fell upon the enemies sword, which was ready to receive them. Especially Masanissa, that best knew the Country, did great execution upon them: having laid all the ways, by which he foresaw that they would seek to escape. The Carthaginians perceiving this fire, thought none other than that it was a pitiful mischief: so that some ran out to help the poor Numidians; carrying only what would serve to quench the fire. Others ran up to the Rampart: where fearless of any danger toward themselves, they stood beholding the greatness of the flame, and lamenting the misfortune. This fell out right as Scipio would have it. Hetherfore lost no time: but setting upon those that were running toward the Numidians, he killed some, and pursued the rest back into their camp, which in a little while he made to burn as bright, as did that of Syphax. Asdrubal (seeing this, and knowing that the Romans were there, did not stand to make resistance, but shifted only for himself, and escaped with a few of his horse about him. If Hannibal, or any of the Barbarchin faction, had been taken in such a manner: it is more than probable that old Hanno would have judged him worthy to be crucified. It would then have been said, that with less than one half of 30000 men, he might at least have given some bad recompence, to them that were taking pains in kindling these fires, had he not been only careful how to save his own fearful head. Nevertheless Polybius acknowledged, and it is most likely to have been true, that it was Asdrubal, or any of those about him, would have stricken to shew valour; when the Camp was once on fire: He should not thereby have done any manner of good, because of the tumult and consternation. I shall not need to tell what a fearful thing it was, to hear the cries of so many thousands that perished by fire and sword, or to behold the cruel flame that consumed them; which (as Polybius affirms) none that hath been is able to describe. It is enough to say, That of those many thousands, very few did escape; which accompanied Asdrubal and Syphax in their several ways of flight. Besides these also there were some scatterers, especially of the Numidians, that saved themselves in the dark; but they were not many, as after shall appear. Surely it must needs have been very hard to tell, how many were burnt or otherwise made away, and what numbers escaped in the dark of night. Wherefore Lælius, who in the rest of this relation, as often elsewhere, doth follow Polybius, may seem to have followed some less worthy Author, and him no good Arithmetician, in calling up the sum. For he reckons only two thousand foot, and five hundred horse, to have escaped; forty thousand to have perished by sword or fire: and above six thousand to have been taken prisoners: the whole number of all which together, is far short of fourscore and thirteen thousand, which were in these two Camps.

Asdrubal, putting himself into the next Town that was very strongly fortified, thought there to find the Romans work, until the Carthaginians at good leisure might repair their Army. He had with him no more than two thousand foot, and five hundred horse: which he thought sufficient to defend the Town; if the Townsmen would not be wanting to themselves. But he found the Inhabitants of the place very earnest in contention, whether it were better to fight, or to yield. Unto this disputation, he well foresaw, that the arrival of Scipio would soon give an end. Wherefore, lest they should lay hold upon him, and seek the Victors favour by delivering him up: he shrank away betimes and made all haste to Carthage. As for the town which he left; it opened the gates to Scipio, at his first coming; and thereby preserved it self from all manner of loss. The two next Towns adjoining would needs be valiant, and make countenance of war: but their strength not being answerable, they were soon taken by Scipio, who abandoned them to the pleasure of his Soldiers. This being done, he returned to the siege of Utica.

The Carthaginians were sore troubled, as they had good reason, when instead of either Peace or Victory, which they lately hoped for, they heard news of such a lamentable overthrow. Necessity enforced them to make hasty provision for the future: but how to do it, few of them saw any means. Some gave advice to crave peace of Scipio; others to send for Hannibal out of Italy; but the most, and they which finally prevailed, were of opinion, That notwithstanding the loss of this Army, they might well defend themselves against the Romans, by raising new forces: especially, if Syphax would not leave them. It was therefore concluded, that they should bend all their care this way, levying in all haste another Army; and sending Embassadors to deal with Syphax, who lay then at a Town called Abba, not passing eight miles from Carthage. Immediately the same their unfortunate Commander, Asdrubal the Son of Gisco, was employed to make new levies of men: and Queen Sophonisba went forth with Embassadors to her husband Syphax, who having gathered together as many as he could of his subjects that had escaped from the late slaughter, was thinking to return into his own Kingdom. Sophonisba laboured so with her husband, that at length she won him to her own desire. And it fell out at the same time, that four thousand Spaniards, waged by the Carthaginians, were brought over to serve in Africa. Of these were made such brave reports, as if their courage, and the Arms which they used, were not to be resisted. Even the multitude within Carthage believed these tales, and were more glad than they had cause to be; which is great wonder, since in one age, the whole country of Spain had been twice conquered; first by the Carthaginians themselves, and after by the Romans. But with Syphax these tales prevailed much; which the Carthaginian Embassadors helped with a lye, saying, That there were come ten thousand of the terrible Spaniards. Upon this confidence, the people of Carthage and their friends gathered such spirit, that in thirty days they made up an Army, consisting well-near of thirty thousand men, reckoning the Spaniards and Syphax with his Numidians in the number. So they incamped in a Region called,

The

The great Fields, about five dayes journey from Utica. Scipio hearing of this, came from Utica thither, to visit them: leaving behind him his impediments, with some part of his Army, to make a shew of continuing the siege. Two or three dayes, after the meeting of both Armies, passed away in skirmish, without any great thing done. It had now been time for Asdrubal to follow the example of the Roman Fabius, and seek to weary out the Enemy by delays. But either (which is likely) he was a far worse Commander, or else it was not in his power, to mande, or else it was not in his power, to give such directions as best pleased himself. The fourth day the Armies met in battle: wherein the Romans were marshalled by Scipio after their wonted manner, having their Italian horse in the right wing; and Masanissa with his Numidians in the left. On the contrary side, Asdrubal and his Carthaginians had the right wing; Syphax the left; and the Spaniards, the battle. The victory was gotten without many blows: for the untrained followers of Syphax and Asdrubal, could not sustain the first charge of the Italians, or of Masanissa. Only the Spaniards fought a long time, even until they were all in a manner slain: rather as men desperate, and not hoping for mercy, since they were thus come over to fight against Scipio, who had otherwise deserved of them, than upon any likelihood or conceit of victory. This their obstinacy was beneficial to those that fled; for that it hindered the Romans from making any great pursuit. Hereby Asdrubal, and Syphax escaped: Asdrubal, to Carthage; and Syphax home to his own Kingdom: whether his wife was either gone before, or immediately followed him.

Scipio, having thus gotten the mastery of the field, took counsel about the prosecution of the war. It was resolved upon as the best course, That he himself, with part of the Army, should attempt the Cities round about him: and that Masanissa, with his Numidians, and Lælius, with some of the Roman Legions, should follow after Syphax; not permitting him to take rest within his own Kingdom, where easily else he might repair his forces, and put them to new trouble. This advice, it seems that Masanissa gave: who knew best the quality of the Numidians; and what good might be done among them, by the reputation of a victory. The least that could be expected, was his restitution into his own Kingdom, usurped by Syphax: which to accomplish, it no less concerned the Romans at the present, than it did himself. According to this order concluded, Lælius was sent away with Masanissa:

and Scipio stayed behind, carrying the war from town to town. Many places yielded for fear; many were taken by force; and all the subjects of Carthage wavered in their fidelity, as if the time were now come, wherein they might take notice of those unreasonable burdens, which their proud Masters had laid upon them, for maintenance of the war in Spain and Italy. What to do in this case, the Carthaginians could hardly resolve. Fortune was their enemy; they had lost their Armies and many of their Towns; neither durst they make bold to trouble their own subjects with any violent exaction of men or money; who nevertheless of their own free will were likely to give little help. Very much it grieved them to send for Hannibal out of Italy: yet since there was no other hope remaining, than in him and his good Army; it was decreed, That Embassadors should be forthwith sent to call him home. Some there were that gave advice, to set out a fleet against that of Scipio, and rode before Utica, weakly manned, that ease to be taken, whilst Scipio himself was busied in the Island Countries. Some were of opinion, that it should be their principal care, to fortify by all means the City of Carthage: upon the safety whereof they said all depended: adding, that whilst they were true, and at unity among themselves, they might well enough subsist, and expect those opportunities, with which Fortune (doubtless) would present them. These counsels were not rejected; but order was forthwith taken, both for all things concerning the defence of the City, and for the attempt upon the Roman fleet at Utica. Nevertheless, it was considered, that thereby they should only protract the war; without any advancing their own affairs towards likelihood of victory, no, though it should fall out, that all the ships at Utica might be taken, or destroyed. Wherefore the determination held concerning Hannibal, that he should immediately come over into Africa, as the last refuge of Carthage. The Council was no sooner broken up, than all the Senators betook themselves to the execution of that which was decreed: some, to the fortification of the Town: some, to make ready the Fleet; and some, appointed thereunto, forthwith to embark themselves for Italy.

In this their trepidation Scipio came to Tunes, a City in those dayes very strong, and standing in prospect almost of every part of Carthage. This place, or rather some defensible piece adjoining, he easily took; the garrisons forsaking it, and running away, as soon as he drew near. But whilst he was about there to incamp, and fortifie himself against the City, he might perceive the Carthaginian Fleet setting forth, and making towards Utica: What this meant, he readily conceived; and stood in great fear, left his own ships that were very ill prepared for Sea-fight (as being heavily laden with engines of battery, and wholly disposed in such order, as was most convenient for assaulting the town) should make bad resistance, against a fleet appointed for that special service. Wherefore he halted away towards Utica, to assist with his presence in this needful case. It fell out well, that he had sent his carriages, and all the great booty which he drew along with him, thither before, at his going to Tunes. For had not he now made great expedition, he should have come too late. Neither could he indeed have been there in due time, if the Carthaginians had used such diligence as was convenient. But they rested one night in harbour by the way: and at their coming to Utica, they tarried a while to make a bravado, presenting themselves in order of battel, as if the Romans would have put forth to Sea against them. But Scipio had no such intent: he thought it would be sufficient, if he could preserve his Gallies. As for the pleasure of their bravery at Sea; it should little avail the Carthaginians, if they got nothing by it, and lost their whole estate by Land. Wherefore he took his ships of burden, and fastning them together with cables, in four ranks, one behind another, made a four-fold bridge over the channel of the Haven; whereon he placed a thousand of his choise men, with store of Darts, and other casting weapons, to make defence. Some other spaces he left, whereat his Frigots, and other small Vessels, might run out and back again upon any advantage or need: but these he covered with planks, using the masts and yards of his ships instead of rafters, to joyn all together, that his men might help one another, and the bridge it self not be torn asunder. Scarce was this work finished, when the Carthaginians, seeing none issue forth against them, came into the Haven. The fight between them and the Romans that were in the Hulks, was rather like to the assaulting of a wall, than to any Sea-fight. For they that stood upon the bridge, had sure footing, and threw their weapons downwards, with their whole strength and violence; which the Carthaginians out of their Gallies, that were lower and unsteady, could not do, but the Roman Frigots and long boats, adventuring forth from behind the bridge, were greatly overborn by the force of the Gallies; and were one occasion of that small loss that followed. They that stood upon the Bridge, were neither able to relieve them, nor yet could freely bestow their weapons among the Carthaginians, as before; for fear of hurting these their friends, that were entangled and mixed among the enemies. The Carthaginians had brought with them grappling hooks, hanging at Iron chains. These they threw upon the masts & yards, which served as arches to joyn the bridge together: then rowing backwards, they tore all asunder; in such sort, that one ship followed another, and all the first rank was broken, or defaced. The Defendants had no other way, than to save themselves as hastily as they could, by shifting into the next rank of ships, that lay behind them untouched. Neither did the Carthaginians trouble themselves any further in this laborious work: but having haled away six ships of burden, and towed them out of the Haven, returned home to Carthage. Their welcome was greater than their victory; because among so many grievous losses, only this exploit had succeeded well, though it were of small importance.

Whilest things thus passed about Carthage, Lelium and Masanissa, in their journey against Syphax, found as good success as could be desired. The fame of the victories already gotten restored Masanissa to his Kingdom, without farther contention: the Masseyli his subjects, joyfully receiving him, and forsaking the usurpers. But here they stayed not: neither indeed would Syphax permit them to be quiet. He had such abundance of men and horses, that he felt not greatly the losses past: and therefore being solicited by Asdrubal and Sophonisba, he prepared again for war. But beside the indignation of his beloved wife, the loss of the Masseyli would let him take no rest: neither was it the purpose of Lelium and Masanissa, to give him any breathing time. It is common in men, to depart no less unwillingly from that which they have gotten by extortion, than from their proper inheritances; but to think all alike their own, whereof they are in possession, be the title unto some part never so unjust. Hereunto alludes the fable of the young Kite; which thought that she had vomited up her own guts, when it was only the garbage of some other fowl, that she had hastily swallowed, and was not able to digest. But whether or no, Syphax, like the young Kite, believed the Kingdom of the Masseyli to be part of his entrails: Lelium and Masanissa will shortly give him somewhat that shall make him cast his gorge. For to this purpose chiefly are they come so far. It concerned the Romans to dispose (if it might be) the King, whose false and hollow friendship towards them, had been converted into strong enmity; as also to set in his place another, who might do them such good offices, as Syphax had lately done unto the Carthaginians. How easily this might be effected, Masanissa knew best, as being well acquainted with the nature of those Countries; wherein, even to this day though there be many strong Towns, yet the fortune of a battle is enough, to translate the Kingdom from one Competitor to another. So they met with Syphax, who came against them with no less an Army, than his former, and marshalled in the Roman order, according to the skill, which he had learned of the Roman Centurion, long ago sent unto him out of Spain from Cn. Scipio. But though he could teach his men how to march in order; yet could he not teach them to fight courageously. They were a rabble of all sorts, gathered up in haste: and few of them had seen war before. Encamping near unto the Romans, it fell out, as commonly, that some small troops of horse on both sides, encountered one another in the mid-way: and they that had the worst, were seconded by other of their fellows. By continuance of the skirmish, more and more were drawn out from either Camp: so that at length Syphax, unwilling to dishearten his men by taking any foil at their first meeting with the Enemy, came up with all his horse, which were the best part of his forces, and therewith over-charged Masanissa, whose numbers were far less. But whilest he was prosecuting his hope of victory: some Roman squadrons of Foot came against him through their own troops of horse; which fell to the sides, and made a lane for them. So their battel standing now more firm, than a little before; Syphax was unable, though he laboured much in vain, to make them give ground. Masanissa likewise, and his troops grew confident upon this assistance: and charging afresh the Enemy, that could not make way forward, caused him to give back. Herewithal the Legions came in sight: which terrified so the Numidian horse, that they began presently to disband. Fain would Syphax have stayed them from flight: and to that end made head in person against the Romans; with hope, that his men would be ashamed to leave him. But it fell out unhappily, that he was cast from his horse, which received a wound, and so taken prisoner. Of others that were slain or taken: the multitude was not great. It sufficed, that they forsook the place, and fled; and that their King, upon whom all depended, was in the Roman hand. Masanissa told Lelium, that this victory should make an end of the Numidian war, if presently they halted away to Cirta the chief City of the Kingdom; whither he himself desired to be sent before with the Horse, carrying Syphax along with him. Hereunto Lelium agreed. Masanissa coming to Cirta, before any news of the Kings mischance was there arrived, called out the chief of the City to parlee: wherein by many fair promises and threats, but especially by shewing unto them Syphax bound, he prevailed so far, that the gates were forthwith opened unto him; and every one strove to get his favour: that was like to be their King hereafter. Among the rest, Queen Sophonisba yielded her self into his hands, and vehemently besought him, that he might not be delivered up unto the Romans. Her youth, and excellent beauty, commended her suit, that Masanissa forthwith granted it; and to make good his promise, married her himself that very day; thereby to prevent Lelium and Scipio from determining otherwife of her, since she was his wife. But Lelium, when he came thither, took the matter hainously, so that at first he would have haled her away, together with Syphax and other prisoners, and have sent her unto Scipio. But being over intreated by Masanissa, he suffered the matter to rest a while as he found it, and referred all to Scipio's discretion; to whom he sent away Syphax and other captives immediately; following shortly after himself with Masanissa, when they had done what was needful in the Kingdom.

At the coming of Syphax, there was great joy in the Roman Camp: the mighty Armies which he had lately brought into the field; and his entertainment of Scipio and Asdrubal, both at one time, when Rome and Carthage together sought his friendship; with such other commemoration of his past and present fortune, ministering to every one a large argument of discourse. Scipio demanded of him, what had moved him, not only to forsake the Roman friendship, but to make war upon them, unprovoked. He briefly answered, That his wife had moved him so to do; calling her a Fury, and a pestilent creature: and saying, that Masanissa was no wiser than himself, since he had now taken the same woman to his wife, who would shortly draw him to the same courtes. Hereat Scipio was greatly troubled: and stood in great doubt, lest this perilous woman should deprive him of Masanissa, as he had done of Syphax. It was not long, ere Masanissa and Lelins came unto him: both of whom together he lovingly welcomed; and highly commended in publick, for their notable service in this Expedition. Then taking Masanissa apart, he brake with him, as touching Sophonisba: letting him understand, that the Romans had title to her head, and that she was a mischievous enemy of theirs. Wherefore he intreated him to moderate his affections: and not to deface the memory of his great services already done (for which he should be highly rewarded to his own contentment) by committing a great offence upon little reason. Masanissa blusht, and wept: and finally promised to be governed by Scipio, whom he nevertheless intreated, to think upon his faith given to Sophonisba, that she should not be delivered into the Romans power. So he departed to his own Tent, where, after some time spent in agony, he called unto him a servant of his that had the custody of his poyson (which Princes used then to have in a readinesse, against all mischances that might make them unwilling to live:) and tempering a porion for Sophonisba, sent it unto her with this message; that gladly he would have had her to live with him as his wife: but since they who had power to hinder him of his desire, would not yield thereto, he sent her a cup, that should preserve her from falling alive into the hands of the Romans; willing her to remember her birth and estate, and accordingly to take order for her self.

At the receipt of this Message and Present, she only said; That if her husband had no better token to send unto his new wife, she must accept of this; adding, that she might have dyed more honourably, if she had not wedded so lately before her funeral. And herewithall she boldly drank off the poyson. Thus Livie reporteth. But Appian varies from this; and sets it down agreeably to that which hath been spoken before, concerning the præcontract between Masanissa, and Sophonisba. He saith, that after the taking of Syphax, Embassadors from Cirta met with Lelins and Masanissa upon their way thither, yielding up their City, and the Kings Palace: and that Sophonisba, for her own private, sent messengers to excuse her marriage with Syphax, as made against her will, by compulsion of those in whose power she was. Masanissa readily admitted this excuse; and accepted her to wife. But when Scipio had received information from Syphax, how cunning in perswasion Sophonisba was: and that all her thoughts laboured for the good of Carthage; he fell out about her with Masanissa at his return, and challenged her, as a part of the booty belonging to the Romans. Masanissa said, she was his own wife, and unto him betrothed many years before. But Scipio would not hear of this: or if it were true, yet he said it was no reason, that Masanissa should keep her in possession, as long as it was disputable, unto whom she might appertain. Wherefore he willed him first of all to produce her, and then afterwards to make his claim unto her, wherein he should have no wrong. Herewithall he sent to fetch her away: and Masanissa accompanied the messengers; as it were to deliver her: but making her acquainted with the necessity, gave unto her a cup of poyson, wherewith she ended her life, before they came that should have apprehended her. So he shewed unto the Romans her dead body, which he royally interred. The sudden violence of Masanissa his love, and the ready consent of Sophonisba to marry with him, add not so much credit unto this relation of Appian, as doth the want of all other evident cause (which Livie notes) of the sudden falling out between him and the Carthaginians, under whom he had been trained up, and done them great service. Howsoever it were; Scipio, hearing of this tragical accident, sent for Masanissa, and comforted him as well as he could, left his melancholy should lead him to some inconvenience. Having therefore gently rebuked him for his rashness, he brought him forth in presence of the Army: where extolling his noble acts, and shewing how highly he had deserved of the City of Rome, he proclaimed him King, and gave unto him a Crown of gold, with other Royal ornaments. This was indeed the ready way to divert his thoughts from the sad remembrance of that which was past, unto the more cheerful contemplation of good fortune, that began to smile upon him.

This was the first time that the Romans took upon them to create or proclaim a King. Which honour though Masanissa well deserved; yet would not the Title have redounded unto his great benefit: neither should he have been much beholding to them for it, if he had not by their means recovered possession of his Country, together with the greatest part of Syphax his Dominions. It seemeth not unlikely, that had he remained a Nester in these wars, and sustained himself with his troop of horse, in such sort as he did before the coming of the Romans; he might nevertheless have recovered his proper inheritance, by the love of his own subjects without other help, when Syphax had once or twice been vanquished.

vanquished. As for the enlargement of his Kingdom, it was not more than he deserved: neither were the Romans then in case, to make a conquest of Numidia for themselves; neither could they have wished a fitter opportunity, than of such a man upon whom to bestow it, that was their assured friend, & passable withall among the Numidians as being (for the Masessis were a Numidian Tribe) a great Prince of the same Nation. Yet this liberality of the Romans, was noised abroad as very glorious: and the Romans themselves, in a politick sort of gravity, took highly upon them; as if even their saluting him by the name of King, had been a matter of great consequence. He thrived indeed well after it: & by their maintenance waxed mighty in times following, incroaching upon his neighbours on all sides; but most of all upon the State of Carthage, whereat they were little displeased. Hence it grew that Vermina the son of Syphax (of whom we shall shortly speak more) which held some pieces of his fathers Kingdom, desiring friendship of the Romans, and promising by all means to deserve their love, requested therewithall, that they would call him King. But though it were so, that never any before him had made this a matter of suit: yet the Roman Senate was Punitious herein, and answered very bravely. That it was not their custom to give the honour of that appellation, save only unto such Kings, as had greatly deserved of their City. Thus they made it a matter of State; and in process of time grew so proud of this their imaginary prerogative, that they imputed as a singular benefit unto Kings that no way depended upon them, the salutation by that name, though it were not accompanied with any other favour or profit thence redounding.

§. XIX.

The Carthaginians desired Truce, and break it.

THE Carthaginians were extremely dismayed, when they heard of the great calamity, that was befallen their good friend Syphax, and understood that Masanissa their mortal enemy, had got possession of his Kingdom. To increase their fear, Scipio returned again to Tunes in view of their City: where he made an end of that Fortification, which he had begun at his last being there. The Carthaginians had neither forces, nor courage, to withstand him: but their hearts so failed them, that they sent forth unto them thirty Embassadors, Princes of the City, which were their Privy Councell, to make suit for peace. These being admitted into the presence of Scipio, did not only prostrate themselves on the ground; but kissed the * feet of him, and of those that sat in Councell with him.

Answerable to this base adoration was their speech that followed. They confessed themselves to have unjustly broken the Peace between them and Rome; and to have deserved whatsoever punishment it should please the Romans to inflict upon them. Yet they humbly besought Scipio and the rest, that in common regard of those misfortunes whereto all men are subject, they would shew mercy unto the City of Carthage, and let it remain, as a monument of their clemency; which, by the folly of bet Citizens, had now twice deserved to be overthrown. Herewithall they did not forget, to lay the blame upon Hannibal: who without their appointment had begun the War; and was maintained in his doings by a Faction, without the good liking of the whole City. By this it appears, that these Embassadors were no Burchin: but rather, that they were Hannibal, and the choice of his company; who had now their long desired work in hand, of suing unto the Romans for peace. Whatsoever they were, it must needs be that they were most insolent men over those that were subject unto their power, for they would not have made such adoration to the Romans in their own necessity, unless they themselves had expected the like, wherein they had the advantage.

It was not unknown to Scipio, or to his assistants, in what poor case the City of Rome then was; and how unable to defray the charges of continuing the War. Neither were the Carthaginians, notwithstanding the loss of so many Armies, in such ill case, as the Romans themselves had very lately been. For they had money enough, wherewith to wage more men: they had a City far stronger than Rome; and they had the Sea free. But they wanted the Roman resolution: and therefore distrusted the walls of Carthage; though Utica, a weaker City, had all this while held our against Scipio, and could not yet be forced by him and his Army, though so often victorious in the field. Scipio therefore accepted their submission, and told them, That though he came into Africa, to make a conquest, and not peace; yet having the Conquest as it were in his hand, he would not deny to grant them the Peace which they desired; for thereby should all Nations understand, that the people of Rome did follow the rule of Justice, both in making war, and in concluding it. The Conditions which he imposed upon them, were these; That they should render up unto him all the prisoners that they had taken, together with all Renegadoes and fugitive slaves: That they should withdraw their Armies out of Italy and Gaul: That they should not meddle in Spain, nor yet in any Island between Italy and Africk: That they should deliver up all their ships of war, save twenty; and that they should pay a great sum of money, with certain hundred thousand bushels of wheat and barley. To consider of these Articles, he gave them three daies: and when they had approved them, he granted a Truce; that they might send Embassadors unto the Roman Senate.

This done, Masaniissa was dismissed, and went home into his Kingdom, as if the war had been already at an end. Syphax was a little before sent with Lelius unto Rome: where the fame of these victories filled men with joy, and gave hope, that the long endured miseries would be shortly at an end. Wherefore all the Temples were set open, and an holy day appointed for thanksgiving and supplication to their Gods. Lelius was accompanied with Embassadors from King Masaniissa: who gratulating the happy success of the Romans in their African war, and giving thanks unto the Senate for the benefits done by Scipio unto their Master, made request for the Numidians, such as were now his Subjects and prisoners in Rome, that they might be bestowed upon him, who by rendering them to liberty, should do an act very plausible, that would make him gracious among his people in the beginning of his reign. The Roman Senate were not behind with Masaniissa in complement: but shewing themselves to be highly pleased with all that Scipio had done, and should do for him, they called him King again; released his Numidians that were captives; and sent him two purple Callocks, that had each of them one gold button, with such other presents, as in time of their poverty might serve to testify their good will. Scarcely were these and Lelius gone from Rome, when the news came, that Embassadors from Carthage were arrived to desire peace. These Embassadors were not admitted into the City, but were lodged without: untill Lelius being sent for, came back from Offis, to be present when their demands were to be heard. Then was audience given them in the Temple of Bellona; that stood in the Suburbs. The errand of these Embassadors, was peace, but the meaning of them and of their City was only to win time, and get respite for war; untill Hannibal and Mago should come out of Italy, either to chase the Romans out of Africk, or to obtain peace for Carthage, by terror of their great Names and Armies, upon more easie conditions. Wherefore they made an idle discourse of the League, that was concluded between them and Lutatus Catulus, at the end of the former war. This League they said, all things well considered, did still remain in force: neither had there since been any war at all, between the people of Rome and the Carthaginians. For it was only Hannibal, that without any leave from Carthage, had of his own head besieged and razed the Town of Saguntum: and after that adventured in like sort, without Commission, to pass the Alpes, and trouble (as he had done (the quiet of Italy. This being so, their Message was none other than to desire, that the League before spoken of, made in the time of Catulus, might hereafter stand in force; as indeed it hitherto did, and ought to do. The Senators had cause to wonder at this tale, hearing these Embassadors make (as it were) a jest of war, that had been so terrible. Wherefore they asked them a great many questions, concerning that peace made by Lutatus, and other passages following between the two Cities. But they excused themselves, by their age: (for they were all young men) and said, That those things were beyond their knowledge and remembrance. Forthwith it appeared, That all was but collusion, and that they sought no other than to gain time, untill they might repair the war. Wherefore they were sent home, in company of Lelius, without any conclusion at all of peace, and in effect, without answer. This notwithstanding, we find in Polybius, That the Senate received diversion from Scipio, of that which had passed between him and the Carthaginians in this Treaty of peace: approved the Conditions by him propounded, and gave him licence thereupon, to proceed unto Conclusion. This may with good reason be believed, since it was not unknown that if the war continued, all these goodly hopes must rest upon the most uncertain issue of one battel between Hannibal and Scipio: wherein if fortune should beaverie to them, their forces in Africk were no better than quite lost.

Matters thus hanging in suspense, before the Carthaginian Embassadors came back from Rome, a Fleet out of Sicily, wherein were two hundred ships of burden, and thirty Gallies, being bound for Africk, to victual the Roman Camp, was over-taken by foul weather at Sea, and hardly escaping

wrack, was dispersed, and driven aground in divers parts of the Bay of Carthage, even in view, and under command of the City. There was at that time, as we find in Appian, and may gather out of Polybius, a great dearth of vituals in Carthage, which caused the people to cry out upon their Magistrates, that they should not let such a booty escape them, saying, that the danger of famine was greater and worse, than of breaking Truce. Whether it were so, that hunger urged them, or that they yielded to their own greedy desires: the multitude in Carthage understood (as it seems) that all this discourse of Peace in hand, was no better than meer mockery, and therefore cared not for observation of particular points, when they meant deceit in the whole. It was the manner in Carthage, as likewise in Alexandria, for all the raffality, together with women and boys, to be meddling in upstarts: the clamors of the boyes being in such tumults, no less violent than of the men. Wherefore it is no marvel, if little regard were had of reason, or of honour, in any such commotion. A Fleet was sent out under Ardubal, to gather up the dispersed Roman ships of burden (for the Gallies, by force of Oars, recovered the station whereto their camp adjoined) and bring them into Carthage; which was done. Scipio was hereat much offended: not only for the loss; and for that the Town was thereby relieved: but for that by this breach of Truce, he foresaw the intention of the Carthaginians to renew the war, and put him to more trouble. Wherefore he sent Embassadors unto them, both to require satisfaction for the injury done; and to deter them from entertaining any other hope, than in the peace which they had so much desired. These gave the Carthaginians to understand, that Letters were come from Rome unto Scipio, with allowance to conclude the Peace; upon those conditions which he had propounded. But (say they) we hold it strange, that ye, who so lately have cast your selves to the ground before us, and kissed our feet after an unusual manner of humility, confessing your selves to have perfidiously broken the League that was between us, and thereby to have deserved such punishment as is due unto Rebels; should so soon forget what ye then uttered, and run headlong again into the same crimes: for which ye acknowledged your selves worthy to be destroyed, having only recourse unto our mercy. We are not ignorant, that it is the confidence which ye repose in Hannibal, that thus emboldens you. Yet were it not amiss, that ye should consider, how long he hath been pent up in a corner of Italy, among the Bru-tians; where he is in a manner besieged, and unable to stir: so that ye are like to find his help wanting in your greatest need. Or let it be supposed that he were now in Africk, and ready to give us battel: yet should it well agree with your wisdom to doubt what might befall, remembering that he is a man, and not invincible. Now if it should happen that he were overcome, what refuge have ye left unto your selves against hereafter? What gods will ye either swear by, to be believed, or call upon in your misery? What words, and lamentable gestures will ye henceforth use, to move compassion? Surely ye have already wasted all your force of persuasion, and shall not again deceive us, if ye refuse the grace, whereof at this present ye are capable. It is no marvel though the Carthaginians were angry, when they heard themselves upbraided with the base demeanour of their Embassadors. For it was not the general opinion of the City, that the Truce was broken by themselves: though it had pleased Hanno, or such as were of his faction, to gratifie the Romans with all manner of submission; and to renounce not only their hope of the future, but all justification of matters past. And indeed it seems, that the Roman Embassadors were very much delighted, in the rehearsal of that point which was yielded unto them, as knowing that thereon depended the justice of the quarrel. But the Carthaginians took this in (so ill part, that hardly they could refrain from doing violence unto the men, who had used unto them such insolent speeches. Yet the fury of the multitude was in some sort appeased; either by Hanno, whom Appian, (I know not why) calls Hanno the Great; or by the very reverence due unto the place of those that had uttered such liberal words. So they were dismissed in friendly sort, although it were without answer to their Proposition. There were also two Gallies appointed for their safe convoy home, though with little intent of good unto their persons. Ardubal was then in the mid-way, as men sailed from Carthage towards Utica. He, whether only desirous to please the multitude, of whose disposition he was informed, or whether directed by publick order to cut off these Embassadors in their way homeward, lay waiting for them behind a Cape, that was a little beyond the mouth of the River Bagradas. Their Convoy having brought them on the way, as far as to the mouth of Bagradas, wished them a good voyage; and so took leave of them, as if they had been then in safety, since the Roman Camp was even in sight. The Embassadors took this in ill part; not as fearing any dan-

get toward, but thinking themselves too much neglected, so far as their attendants did to abruptly leave them. But no sooner had they doubled the Cape, than Asdrubal fell upon them, in such manner, as they might well discern his purpose: which was to have stemmed them. They rowed hard therefore: and being in a Quingureme, that had more banks of Oars, than had any Gallies of Asdrubal, they lost away, and made him over-shoot himself. Yet he gave them chase, and had well-near surprised them. But they discovered some Roman Companies on the shore over against them, and therefore adventured to run their Vessel aground: whereby they saved their own lives, though a great part of their company were slain, or hurt. This practice of the Carthaginians was inexcusable, and for the same cause perhaps were the Citizens heartened in such a dishonourable attempt, by those that were desirous to continue the war; that thereby they might be driven to study nothing else, than how to get the victory, as having none other hope remaining. Yet likely it is, that the same fear, which had caused them to make such earnest suit for peace, would also have caused them to be better advised, than thus to abandon all hope of Treaty; had they not been given to understand, that Hannibal was already landed in Affrick, in whom they reposed no small confidence, but verily periwaded themselves, that he would change their fortune, and teach the Romans to hold themselves contented with more easie conditions, than were those that Scipio, in the pride of his fortune, had of late propounded.

§. XX.

In what sort Hannibal spent the time after the Battle of Metaurus: The doing of Mago in Italy. Hannibal and Mago called out of Italy. How the Romans were diversly affected by Hannibal's departure.

Ever since the loss of that battle at Metaurus, Hannibal remaining in the Country of the Bruttians, waiting for another supply from Carthage. The Roman Consuls that succeeded unto Claudius and Licinius, by whom Asdrubal was overcome and slain, were contented to be quiet all their year. Neither did Licinius the Colleague of Scipio, ought worthy of remembrance against Hannibal, being hindered by the Perseverance that was in his Army. Sempronius the Consul, who followed Licinius; and

Cn. Servilius Capius, who followed Sempronius, were earnestly bent to have done somewhat: but their diligence was in a manner fruitless. In some skirmishes with Hannibal, they had the better; in some the worse: and a few poor Towns they got from him, as it were by stealth; his care being more to preserve his Army, than to keep those places that were weak.

The Romans had at this time so many great pieces of work in hand, that their chief enemy was become not the chief part of their care. Their thoughts were mainly bent upon Affrick, wherein they were at no small charges to maintain the Army, which (as was hoped) should bring the War to a short and happy conclusion. They stood nevertheless in much fear of Mago, the brother of Hannibal: who took exceeding pains among the Ligurians and Gauls to raise an Army, wherewith to kindle anew the War in Italy, that began to wax cold. Mago solicited also the Hetrurians, and found them so ready to sit in his behalf, that if he could have entred their Country strong, it might have proved no less needful for Scipio to return home out of Affrick, than shortly it was for Hannibal to make speed unto the defence of Carthage. These dangers caused the Romans to employ one of their Consuls or Pro-consuls, with an Army, among the Hetrurians; another among the Gauls; and a third among the Ligurians: so far as it was uncertain, upon which side Mago would break out: Being thus busied, it is no wonder though they forbore to overcharge Hannibal with any great power.

As for Mago, when things were in some readiness for his setting forward, he met in the Country of the Insabrians, which is about Milan, with M. Cornelius the Roman Proconsul, and P. Quinctilius Varus one of the Prætors. With these he fought a battle, wherein though his virtue shewed it self worthy of his Father and Brethren: yet his fortune was Carthaginian. The fight continued a long while doubtful; in such sort that the Roman Commanders began to distrust the issue. Wherefore Quinctilius the Prætor taking unto him all the Roman Horse, thought to have shaken the Enemies to pieces. The Legions at the same time gave a loud shout: and strained themselves hard; as if that thirteenth victory should have been carried before them. But Mago opposed his Elephants to the Horse: the service of those beasts being fitter for such use, than against the Squadrons of Foot. The figure, sent, and braying of these Elephants, did so affright the Horse, that they started aside, and were scattered scattered over the field; their Riders being unable to manage them. Hereby the Numidians got advantage upon them: whose manner of fight was more available against those that were loose, than against the troops that were close and thick. Then fell the Elephants upon the Legions: which entertained them after the accustomed manner, with a shower of darts, and killed four of them; causing all the rest to give back. This notwithstanding the same Legions were so vehemently pressed by the Enemy; that more for shame of running away, than by any great force to make resistance, they held their ground. The Proconsul therefore brought up those forces, which he had kept unto the last, to succour where need should most require. Against these, Mago employed some of his Gauls, whom he had in readiness for the like occasion. But the Gauls discharged their parts very ill. They were soon beaten off, and recoiled so hastily, that they brought fear upon all the rest. When Mago saw that his men began to shrink; he put himself in the head of his Army; and held them so well to it, that keeping their order, they made a fair Retreat, with their faces toward the Enemy. But at length he received a grievous wound in his thigh; wherof shortly after he dyed. He was taken up, and carried out of danger by some of his own men: the rest of them, after little further resistance, provided every one for himself: So the Romans obtained victory, not without great cost: as purchasing the death of about five thousand enemies, with the loss of two thousand and three hundred of the Prætor's Army, besides those that dyed of the Proconsul's Legions; also besides divers Colonels, Captains, and Gentlemen of mark that fell in this hot piece of service. Neither were there any prisoners taken; whereby it may seem that the Enemies did not fall to rout, before they had recovered some ground that might assure them from pursuit. However it were, this victory would have much imported for the assurance of Italy, if the State of Carthage could longer have permitted these valiant sons of Amilcar to abide therein. But Mago with-drawing himself (by easie journeys, because of his wound) into Liguria, found there Embassadors from Carthage attending him: who gave him to understand the pleasure of their City, which was, That both he and Hannibal should presently repair home with all their forces; not staying any longer to think upon the conquest of Italy, since Carthage it self was ready to be lost. He obeyed this Command-

About the same time Hannibal received the like command from Carthage, to return into Affrick. He heard it with great impatience; gnashing his teeth, and groaning, and hardly keeping in the tears, that were ready to burst out, whilst the Embassadors were delivering their errand. When their message was done: He told them, that this was yet plain dealing. For, said He, They that now directly bid me come home, have long ago done their best to hale me out of Italy; though more closely and crookedly they went to work, by stopping the supply that should have enabled me to manage the War here. Scipio therefore shall not need to brag, that he hath drawn me home by the heels: it is Hanno that hath wrought this noble feat; and overwhelmed the house of the Barchines, for lack of other means to do it, with the ruin of Carthage. He had before prepared a Fleet in readiness, doubting that which after came to pass: wherein he imbarqued, besides his own men, as many of the Italians as were content to be partakers of his fortune. Many there were that shrunk back from him, and refused to do service in this expedition: of whom, such as he could take, he slew; not sparing those that fled into the Temple of Juno Lacinia, which had been held an inviolable Sanctuary unto that day. He was indeed then wholly transported with rage; and departed out of Italy no less passionate, than men are wont to be, when they leave their own Countreys to go into exile. He looked back unto the shore accusing both gods and men; and cursing his own dulness, in that he had not led his Army from Cannæ, hot and bloodied as it was, directly unto the walls of Rome. With such vexation of spirit He quitted the possession of Italy; wherein he had lived almost half his time.

If it could have been foretold unto the Romans; in the first beginning of this War, with what exceeding joy in times following they should entertain the news of Hannibal's his departure out of Italy: they would (I think) less earnestly have pressed the Carthaginians to send him over thither. When sure advertisement was brought unto the City, that Hannibal was gone with all his Army: an Holy-day was appointed for thanksgiving unto their gods; and extraordinary great sacrifices publicly made, for joy of such happy tydings. Yet old Q. Fabius was of opinion, That the danger did still remain the same, though the place were changed: for that Hannibal at his coming into Affrick.

Africk, would find P. Scipio other manner of work, than he had been troubled with at any time before; and would do greater matters in his own Country, than ever he was able to perform abroad in a land of strangers. The remove of the War from their own doors, and the conceit of that victory for which they hoped; was enough to make them presume further, than at other times they would have done. When therefore the Saguntine Embassadors brought unto them a great mass of Gold and Silver, together with some Agents of the Carthaginians taken by them in Spain: only the Carthaginian prisoners were excepted, the treasure was rendered back unto the Saguntines that had surprised it. Upon like confidence of the future, a little before this, order was taken for the repayment of those monies that had been borrowed in time of more necessity from private men. Hence also proceeded the severe chastisement laid upon those 12 Colonies, that for want either of means, or of good will, had refused to give aid to the Romans. They were commanded, and enforced to give double the number of Foot to that which they had been wont to set out for the Wars, with a proportion of Horse answerable to the very motto of their ability. So confident were the Romans grown (though their wealth were not as yet suitable to the greatness of their spirit) upon the good success of the battle at Metaurus, and the hopes which they reposed in Scipio. All this notwithstanding, when they considered more nearly of that which might happen: and were informed that the terrible Army, whereof Italy had been few days since discharged, was landed safe in Africk; they began to revolve a thousand fearful matters in their heads, and to stand in doubt, lest Q. Fabius (who died about the same time) would be found a true Prophet. For, bethinking themselves of that which might comfort them in their hopes; they found in the victories against Syphax and Asdrubal no speciality of so great worth, as might promise the like success against another manner of General, followed by other manner of men, than were either of those two. The Numidian King had been wont to bring into the field a rabal multitude of half-skullions, that were good for nothing; being himself a fit Captain for such Souldiers. Likewise Asdrubal the son of Gisco was a Commander well thought of by the Carthaginian Senate, but otherwise, one, that in the field was only good at saving himself by a swift retreat. But now there came an Army of men, hardened from their childhood with incredible patience, fleshed many hundred times in Roman blood, and wearing the spoils, not only of good Souldiers, but of brave Captains, by them slain. Such talku'd the people of Rome, saying, That Scipio was like to meet in battle with many that had slain Roman Prætors, yea, and Consuls with their own hands: with many that had been first in getting over the Trenches of several Roman Camps, or in winning the tops of walls at the siege of towns; briefly, that he should now be opposed by an Army, as good as ever had served in war, and following the dreadful name of Hannibal.

§. XXI.

Hannibal in Africk prepares to fight with Scipio; treats with him about peace in vain; loses a battle at Nodagra, and persuades the Carthaginians to sue for peace. Of the peace granted from Rome to Carthage.

Hannibal disembarked his Army at Leptis, almost an hundred miles from Carthage, Eastward from the Headland of Mercury, and somewhat more than one degree to the South. He was ill provided of Horse; which it was not easy for him to transport out of Italy. Therefore it behoved him to land, as he did, somewhat far from the enemy; that he might furnish himself of these and the like needful helps against the day of battle. From Leptis he passed on to Adrumetum, and so along through the Inland Country gathering friends unto him by the way. Tychæus a Numidian Prince, and familiar friend of Syphax, was said to have in those dayes the best Horses of service, that were to be found in Africk. Him therefore did Hannibal allure unto his party: making him understand, that if the Romans got the victory, it should be easy for Masaniissa, by their countenance and help to oppress both him, and as many other of the neighbour Princes, as hinder his prospect. This argument, and the fame of him that used it, prevailed with Tychæus; who shortly after brought unto the Carthaginian two thousand Horse. Appian further adds, That Moxædulus, (the same who had made himself Protector over Masaniissa his Cousins; and was Head of a Family, and adverse to the Numidian Kings of that race) brought to Hannibal another thousand Horse: as likewise, that Vermina the Son of Syphax, holding a great part of his Fathers Kingdom, began at the same time to assail the places that yielded obedience to Masaniissa. This Vermina, as we find in Livie, came with more than 16. thousand men (for he lost more than so many) to succour Hannibal when it was too late.

The Carthaginians were at this time in such hard estate, or (at least) so impatient of the state wherein they were; that they could not attend the leisure of those preparations, which would have made the victory assured. When they considered the worth of Hannibal, and the greatness of his Acts: it offended them to think, that they had been so base as to make humble suit unto the Romans for peace; whilst they had such a brave Champion alive, to maintain their cause by War. But when as they bethought themselves of their own sufferings, which, for want of Roman magnanimity to endure them, appeared greater than indeed they were: then cried they out earnestly that it was no time to linger, but presently to fight; that so they might see an end of these troubles, either good or bad; and to this purpose they sent their Mandates to Hannibal: requiring him without any further protraction, to do what he could do out of hand. Hannibal made answer, That they were his good Lords, and had power to dispose of him and his Army; but since he was General of their forces, He thought it reasonable that they should suffer him to do as a General ought to do; and to choose his own times. Nevertheless, to give them satisfaction, He made great marches to Zama; and there encamped.

The breach of Truce made by the Carthaginians: the violence done to his Embassadors: and the news of Hannibal his being landed in Africk, made Scipio to understand the resolution of the Carthaginians, which was, not to yield unto any conditions unprofitable for themselves, as long as they were able to make resistance. Wherefore he sent unto Masaniissa: and informed him of all that was fallen out: praying him to come away with speed, and lay all other business apart. Ten Roman Companies, of Horse and Foot together, Masaniissa had with him; that were lent unto him by Scipio, to do him service in the establishing and enlarging of his Kingdom. But he well understood, that those and many more besides all his own forces, would but little avail him; if Hannibal should drive the Romans out of Africk. Wherefore taking such order as he could upon the sudden, for the safety of his own Kingdom; with four thousand Horse, and six thousand Foot, he made all haste unto Scipio.

Soon after the beginning of these new troubles, the Carthaginian Embassadors that had been at Rome, returned back under the conduct of Lælius and Fulvius, who brought them safe into the Roman Camp. There when they arrived and understood what had lately passed, especially how their Citizens had behaved themselves towards the Roman Embassadors: they made little doubt, how their own heads should answer for such notorious outrage. To confirm them in this opinion,

M. Babinus one of the late Embassadors that had been in Carthage, being left by Scipio to take charge of the Camp, laid hands upon them and detained them; sending word unto his General, who was gone abroad to make War in the Country, that he had them in his power, and that now the Carthaginians might be repaid in their own Coyn, for the injury by them lately done. Scipio was very glad to hear of this; and commanded Babinus to use them with all possible courtesy, and send them safe home. By thus doing, He brake the hearts of his enemies; and caused them to acknowledge themselves (which was a great victory) far less honourable than the Romans. This notwithstanding, he made more cruel War upon them than before: taking their Towns by force; and putting them to sack, without hearkning to any Composition. It was the manner of the Romans, as often as they took a Town by assault, to put all that came in their way to the sword, whatsoever they were, without regard. This they did, to make themselves terrible: and the better to work such impression in the minds of those, with whom they had to do; they used oftentimes to kill the very Dogs and other Beasts, that ran athwart them in the Streets: hewing their bodies asunder: as men delighted in shedding of blood. This being their practice at other times; it is likely that now they omitted no piece of cruelty; when they meant to give proof of their vehement indignation, and revenging minds, for the injuries received. Hence it partly grew, that the Carthaginians were so earnest in pressing Hannibal to fight.

Hannibal being incamped at Zama, sent forth his Scouts and Spies, to discover where the Romans lay, what they were doing, and as much as might be, of their demeanour. Some of these were taken, and brought unto Scipio: who instead of trusting them up, gave them free leave to view his Camp at pleasure, appointing one to conduct them up and down, and shew them whatsoever they desired. This done, He gave them leave to depart; and sent them away safe unto their General. Hannibal understanding this, admired the bravery and courage rage of his enemy : with whom on the sudden he grew so desirous to have an Interview, and personal conference ; and signified so much unto him by a messenger full of purpose. Of this motion the Roman liked well : and returned answer, that He would meet him shortly in a place convenient. The next day Masaniſſa came with his Army : whom Scipio taking with him, removed unto a Town call'd Nedagara ; near unto which he sat down, in a place otherwise commodious, & close by a water that might opportunely serve his Camp. Thence he sent word unto the Carthaginian. That the time and place did fully serve, if he had ought to say to him. Hannibal thereupon removed from Cama, and came within four miles of the enemy ; where he incamped well to his own good liking in all things else ; excepting that his men were driven to take much pains, in fetching their water somewhat far off. Then was order taken for their meeting : and the two Generals each of them with a troop of Horse, rode forth of their Camps, till they came unto a piece of ground ; which was before well searched for fear of ambush. There they will their followers to stand off : and themselves with each of them one Interpreter, encountered each other in the mid-way between their Companies. They remained a while silent, viewing one the other with mutual admiration. Then began the Carthaginian, saluting the Roman, to deliver his mind to this effect : That it had been better both for Carthage, and Rome, if they could have limited and contained their ambition within the shores of Affrick and of Italy ; for that the Countreys of Sicil and Spain, about which their fathers and themselves had striven, were no sufficient recompence for so many Fleets as had been lost, and of so much blood as had been shed, in making those costly purchases. But since things past could not be recalled : He said, That it was meet for them to consider, unto what extreame dangers their own Cities had been expofed, by the greedy desire of extending their Empires abroad ; and that it was even time for them now at length to make an end of their obftinate contention, and pray the gods to endue them with greater wisdom hereafter. And to such peaceable disposition, He affirmed that his own years, and long tryal of Fortune, both good and evil, had made him inclinable. But much he feared, that Scipio, by want of the like experience, might rather fix his mind upon uncertain hopes, than upon a contemplation of that mutability, whereto all humane affairs are subject. Tet (said he) mine own example may peradventure suffice to teach thee moderation. For I am that same Hannibal, who after my victory at Cannæ, won the greatest part of Italy ; and devised with my self, what I should do with your City of Rome, which I hoped verily to have taken. Once I brought mine Army to your walls, as thou hast since brought thine to ours of Carthage : but now, see the change ! I stand here intreating thee to grant us peace. This may serve as a document of Fortunes instability. I have fought with thy Father Scipio ; He was the first of the Roman Generals that ever met me in the field. I did then little think, that the time would come, that I should have such business, as now at the present, with his son. But this is even one of Fortunes pageants, whereof she hath many. And thou must have experience of the like in thy self, who knows how soon ? Think upon M. Atilius : If he would have heard unto such persuasions, as I now use to thee, he might have returned home to Rome an happy man, and so must thou do now, if any reasonable offer will give thee satisfaction. How silt thou ? Canst thou be contented, that all Spain, Sicil, Sardinia, and whatsoever Islands are situate between Italy and Affrick be abandoned by the Carthaginians for ever, and left unto the Romans, to bear dominion therein ? Thou shalt have glory enough by giving thus much : and the Romans may be glad of such a bargain. As for us, our own quiet shall henceforth give us contentment. And the same contentment of ours, shall make us faithfully observe the peace with you. But if thou thinkest all too little, I must desire thee to ponder well how great an hazard thou must undergo for obtaining a very little more, than that which thou must have without contention. It is now in thine own power to lay hold upon good fortune, if it please thee : stay but untill to morrow night, and thou must take such fortune as it please the Gods. The issue of battel is uncertain, and many times beguileth expectation. Men and steel we shall each of us bring into the field ; but of the victory neither of us have assurance. Let us therefore without more ado make peace. And do not tell me that some self-hearted Citizens of ours deal fraudently of late in the like treaty : It is I Hannibal that now desire peace with thee, which I would never do, if I thought it not expedient for my Countrey. And thinking it expedient, I will always maintain it, like as I have maintained, unto my power, as long as the Gods did not envy me, the war by me begun.

Hereunto Scipio made answer, That it was no ambitious desire of ruling in Sicil and in Spain which had moved the Romans to enter into this or the former War : but that the defence of the Mamertines, and afterwards of the Saguntines, their confederates, had caused them to put on those arms which the gods by the final issue of the Wars had approved, and would approve to be most just. As for the mutability of Fortune, he said, that he was not thereof ignorant ; and that without any note of insolence or overweening, he might well refuse the conditions offered. For was it not plain that all these Countreys, with which the Carthaginians now so willingly departed, were already won from the Romans ? If, said he, these conditions had been propounded whilst as yet ye detained some part of Italy, they might peradventure not have been rejected. But as the case now stands, I see no reason why I should remit unto you any one piece of these my former demands to which the Carthaginians have yielded already, and thought me to be gracious in dealing so moderately. Rather I say, that the injuries which they have done me since, have made them unworthy of obtaining peace upon so friendly terms. But I cannot blame thee, Hannibal, though thou wouldst beglad to make thy Citizens understand, from how much of their burden they are by thy means eased. Only thou must think, that in like sort it concerns me in honour not to let them be gainers or savers by the wrongs which they have done of late. Thou knowest well, that besides those offers which thou here hast made, they were well contented to restore unto us ransom-free, all prisoners that they have of ours, to pay us five thousand talents, to deliver up their Gallies, and to deliver hostages for assurance of fair dealing. And must they now be discharged of all this by their breach of truce, their spoiling of our fleet, and their violating our Embassadors ? Not so. But if they can be contented, besides all this, to make such amends as I shall require, for these injuries newly done ; then will I take advice with my counsel what answer to give you ; otherwise you may even prepare for war, and blame your own selves for that I have denied you peace.

Hereupon they brake off : and returned each to his own Camp, with no other news than war ; bidding their Souldiers prepare for a battel, wherein should be decided the quarrel between Rome and Carthage. The next morning at break of day they issued into the field : a notable march, and such as hath very seldom been found : whether we regard the Generals, their Armies, the two Cities that contended, or the great importance of the battel at hand. Scipio ordered his men after the Roman manner : placing first the Hastati, divided into their Maniples, or small Battalions, with a reasonable distance between the men. Not far behind these followed the Principes, likewise divided, and so after them the Triarii. But herein Scipio altered a little the ordinary custome of the Romans : He placed not the Maniples of his Principes opposite unto the void spaces between the Hastati, that so the Hastati, as was usual, might fall back between the Principes ; but he placed them directly one behind another, as it were, in File. This he did, because of the Elephants, whereof Hannibal had many. For of those beasts the danger was less whilst there was open way to let them through. Therefore he took such order, that when they had passed through the spaces between the first Battalions, they should not come upon the Principes in Front. Unto his Velites, or those of the light armature that were to begin the fight he gave direction, that when they found themselves to be overcharged, either by the Enemies, or (which was most to be feared) by the Elephants, they should run back through those lanes that were between the Maniples ; and that those which were swiftest, or otherwise best able, should continue on their flight, until they were got behind all their own Army ; thereby leaving room enough unto those that were wounded, or cast behind, to save themselves on the void ground, that was betwixt the first and second, or the second and third battels, without cloying up the way between the Maniples, which he desired to keep open. His Italian horse he placed in the left wing, under C. Leliv. In the right wing was Masaniſſa with his Numidians. He himself riding up and down, exhorted his men to do valiantly ; using words, not many, but forcible. He had them remember what they had achieved, since their coming into Affrick. He told them, that if this day were theirs, the War was at an end ; and that their victory in this War, should make them Lords of all the World, for that afterwards, none would be found able to resist them. On the contrary, if they were beaten, he asked them whether they would flee. They were far from home, yea, and far from their own standing Camp : neither was there any place in Affrick, that would give them shelter : if they fell into the Carthaginians hands, they knew what to expect : And therefore there was none other way, but death or victory : unless they would live like wretched slaves under most merciless Enemies. In such necessity he said, that they which consider themselves to be, and take resolution answerable thereunto; have never been known to fail of getting victory.

Hannibal on the other side placed his Elephants, that were more than four score in Front of his Battle. Next behind these he made his Vant-guard all of Mercenaries, Ligurians, Gauls, Balcarcs and Moors. Then followed his Battle; which was of Carthaginians and Africans, more interested in the quarrel than were those Mercenaries; though not so good soldiers: but to help (if it might be) their want of courage, they had with them four thousand Macedonians, lately sent from King Philip. More than the space of a furlong, behind these came his Rearward, consisting of those brave Souldiers which had served him in his Italian wars; and were the only men, in whom he reposed any confidence. Opposite to Lelium, in his own right wing he bestowed the Carthaginian Horse. Tychæus and the Numidians he placed in his left wing against Masinissa. He was indeed far too weak for the Enemy in Horse, both in number and in goodness. For Tychæus and Mcgenellus had no more than three thousand; and those not so well exercised, as were the four thousand of Masinissa. The Carthaginians also were no more, nor none other, than such as could be levied in the haste of a few days; and the remainder of those, that had of late been often vanquished, and accustomed to flye. But it was no time for Hannibal, neither had he perhaps authority, to make these his companions alight and serve on foot, setting better men in their saddles. All that he could have done, was to stay a little longer, and expect more help. Had Verrinus the son of Syphax come thither, as he did in a few days after, with sixteen thousand and upwards, the most of them Horse, the advantage of number might have served well to supply all other defect. Yet since the Lords of Carthage would brook no delay, Hannibal must be fain to comfort himself with the hope that he reposed in his old Italian Souldiers; whose virtue had wrought greater wonders, when it was more strongly opposed. He encouraged therefore his men, with words agreeable to their several conditions: promising unto the Mercenaries bountiful rewards; threatening the Carthaginians with inevitable servitude if they lost that day: but especially animating his old fellow-Souldiers, by the many victories which they had obtained against far greater numbers. He had them to look upon the Enemies and make an estimate, whether they were any thing like so many, as that huge Army which they had slaughtered at Canna. He willed them to remember, That it was one P. Scipio, even the father of this man, whom they had first of all compelled to run away. He told them, that these Legions, which they yonder beheld, were for the most part of them, the very worst of the Roman Souldiers; even such, as for their dastardly flight out of sundry battels, could no longer be trusted to bear Arms in their own Country. As for the rest, they were young men, the sons of Cowards, and bred up in the continual fear of those weapons, by which their fathers were daily slain or chased. Wherefore he intreated these his old companions, upon whose virtue he meant wholly to repose himself, that they would this day strive to make good their honour, and to purchase the fame of men invincible.

Such exhortations used the two Generals before the fight. When they drew near together, the Numidian horsemen on both sides began to skirmish. The Trumpets and other instruments of war, sounded to battel; and Hannibal commanded his Elephants to break upon the Romans. Of these Elephants (as they were always an uncertain kind of help) those that stood near unto the point of the left wing, turned back for fear: and ran upon their own Numidian horse, which they affrighted and disordered. Masinissa espying this, gave charge upon the same Numidians; and not suffering them to rally themselves, drove them quite out of the field. The rest of those beasts made a great spoil of the Roman Velites, whom they followed into the spaces between the Maniples: but without any harm to the Battalions themselves; which gave them open way, accordingly as Scipio had well provided. Divers of them receiving many wounds, and growing therewith furious, could no longer be governed, but ran back upon the right point of their own battel, and beyond that into the open field. Herewithal they disordered the Carthaginian Horse, which were in that wing: against whom they gave to Lelium the same advantage that Masinissa had against the Numidians; which he used in like sort. In the mean while, the battels of foot advanced, and drew near together with a slow and stately pace, till they were almost within a weapons cast: at what time they gave a shout and ran one at the other. The Mercenaries for a time seemed both in audacity, and in quickness to have the better of the Romans; wounding many, and doing more harm, than they took. But the Roman discipline after a while prevailed against the boisterous violence of these untrained Barbarians.

Where-

Whereunto it helped not a little, that the battel of the Principes, following somewhat near after the Hastati, encouraged their fellows & shewed themselves ready, if need were, to relieve them. Contrariwise, the Mercenaries, received no manner of help or comfort, from those that should have seconded them. For the new-levied Carthaginians and Africans, when they saw their hired Souldiers give back, did also themselves retire. This caused the Ligurians, Gauls, and the rest, to think themselves betrayed: whereupon they inclined unto flight. The Carthaginian Battel was herewith more terrified than before, so as it refused to give way unto the Mercenaries for their safe retreat; and yet withal forbore to make head against the Enemies, that pursued them. It was no time to ask them what they meant by this: Fear and Indignation caused those that were at once chased by the Romans, and betrayed, as they thought, by their own fellows, to turn their arms with an heedless fury against both the one and the other. Thus were many of the Carthaginians beaten down and slain, through their own indirection; by their own Mercenaries: The Roman Hastati in like sort, fighting with desperate men in a throng, had their hands so full of work, that the Principes were fain to come up unto them, and help to over-bear this great medley of enemies, that were together by pater Captain of the Macedonians was one of the ears among themselves. In this place was made a great slaughter, both of the Mercenaries and of the Carthaginians: which hindering one another, could neither fight, nor easily flye. Such of them as escaped, ran towards Hannibal: who kept his ground, and would not stir one foot, to help or save these Run-aways. He caused his men to bend their Pikes at those of his own side, that would have rushed upon him: whom he thereby compelled to turn aside beyond his battel, and save themselves in the open field. The ground over which, the Romans were now to march, ere they could meet with Hannibal, was covered with heaps of dead bodies and weapons; and so slippery with blood, that Scipio began to stand in great doubt, lest the orders of his Battalions should be dissolved in passing that way. In such case, if he should fight with that warlike Army, which he saw before him, remaining yet entire, and without fear expecting him; He might be well assured to receive a notable overthrow. He caused therefore the Hastati to make a stand there where they were, opposite to the main battel of the Hannibalsians. Then drawing up his Principes and Triarii, he placed them, when they had overcome the bad way, all in one Front with the Hastati, and made of them his two Cornets. This done, he advanced towards Hannibal: who entertained him after another manner, than ever he had been received in his life before. All the days work till now, seemed to have been a matter of pastime, in regard of the sharp Conflict, that was maintained between these notable Souldiers. The Romans were encouraged by their having prevailed all the day before: they were also far the more in number. But these old Souldiers of Hannibal were fresh; (and perhaps the better men.) They fought with such obstinate resolution, that no man gave back one foot; but rather chose to die on the ground whereon he stood. So that, after a long time it was uncertain which part had the worse: unless it may seem, that the Romans were beginning to shrink; so far as the return of Masinissa and Lelium from pursuit of the Enemies Horse, is said to have been most happy; and in a needful time. These upon a sudden charged the Hannibalsians in the Rear; and over-bearing them by meer violence, compelled them to fall to Rout.

In this battel there dyed of the Romans fifteen hundred and upwards: on the Carthaginian side, above twenty thousand; besides as many that were taken; of whom, Scipio reports, that were together by pater Captain of the Macedonians was one of the ears among themselves. In this place was made a great slaughter, both of the Mercenaries and of the Carthaginians: which hindering one another, could neither fight, nor easily flye. Such of them as escaped, ran towards Hannibal: who kept his ground, and would not stir one foot, to help or save these Run-aways. He caused his men to bend their Pikes at those of his own side, that would have rushed upon him: whom he thereby compelled to turn aside beyond his battel, and save themselves in the open field. The ground over which, the Romans were now to march, ere they could meet with Hannibal, was covered with heaps of dead bodies and weapons; and so slippery with blood, that Scipio began to stand in great doubt, lest the orders of his Battalions should be dissolved in passing that way. In such case, if he should fight with that warlike Army, which he saw before him, remaining yet entire, and without fear expecting him; He might be well assured to receive a notable overthrow. He caused therefore the Hastati to make a stand there where they were, opposite to the main battel of the Hannibalsians. Then drawing up his Principes and Triarii, he placed them,

Scipio having spoiled the Enemies Camp, returned back to Utica: where he found P. Lentulus newly arrived, with fifty Gallies and an hundred Ships of burden. With this Fleet, and that which he had before, He thought it best to make towards Carthage: rather of purpose to terrifie the City, than with any hope to take it. His Legions he committed unto Cn. Octavius; whom he willed to meet him there by land. Then sending Lelium away to Rome with news of the victory, set sail from Utica towards Carthage. He was encountered on the way by ten Embassadors from the City: who bearing up with the Admiral Gally, began to use the piteous gesture of suppliants. But they received none other answer, than that they should meet him at Tunes; where he would give them audience. So rowing along before the City, and viewing it more in bravely, than with meaning to attempt it; he returned back to Utica, and called back Octavius thither, with whom in person he set forward to Tunes. As they were in their journey thither, they heard the news, that Vernina the son of Syphax, was coming with an Army of more horse than foot, to the succour of those that were already vanquished. This Vernina seems to have been both careless of getting intelligence how things passed; and very defective in all other duties requisite in the Commander of an Army. Part of the Roman foot, with all their power of Horse, was sent against him: which did not only beat him, but so compass him in, that he hardly escaped himself with a few; leaving fifteen thousand of his followers dead behind him; and twelve hundred taken prisoners. If this good company had been with Hannibal at Nadagara; they should have been far better conducted; and might well have changed the Fortune of the day; which the Carthaginian lost by default of Horse. But God had otherwise determined. It is not to be doubted, that this victory, though it were no great access unto the former; yet served well to daunt the Carthaginians, and imprint in them the greater fear of Scipio. When he came to Tunes, there met him thirty Embassadors from Carthage: whose behaviour, though it was more piteous than it had been before, yet procured it less commiseration, by reason of their late false dealing; after they had in like sort humbled themselves. Nevertheless it was considered, what a long and laborious work it would prove, to besiege the mighty City of Carthage. And particularly, Scipio stood in great doubt, lest the honour of this war, if it were protracted, should be taken out of his hands, and given to one of the Consuls. Cn. Servilius Cæpio, that Consul who had charge of the war against Hannibal at such time as he departed out of Italy: was bold to pass over into the Isle of Sicily (as it were in chafe of Hannibal by him terrified and driven away) with a purpose thence to have proceeded into Africa, and taken from Scipio the command of the Army

there. But a Dictator was chosen of purpose, to restrain the ambition of this Consul Servilius. After him followed Africanus Claudius, who made suit for the same Province of Africa; and was therein so earnest, that though neither the Senate nor People would grant him his desire; yet he needs would be going; procuring only leave of the Senate, that he being Consul might join with Scipio, were it with no more than equal authority. But ere he could have his Fleet; and all things in a readiness for the journey, wherein no man dared to further him, Winter came on; and he was only left at Sea with foul weather; first upon the Coast of Hebrida, and afterwards by Sardinia; where his Consulship expired; and so he returned home a private man. Then came the joyful news to Rome; of the victory obtained against Hannibal, and that the war was now even at an end. Yet Marcus Lentulus the new Consul so passionate in desiring Africa for his Province; that he said he would suffer nothing to pass in the Senate, until he had first his will. Much ado there was about this; and after many contentions, both in the Senate, and before the people; at last it was ordered, That if peace were granted; it should be granted by Scipio; if the war continued; Scipio should have command therein by Land, and the Consuls by Sea. The ambition of these men, caused Scipio to give the more favourable answer unto the Carthaginian Embassadors. He willed them to consider what they had deserved; and in regard thereof, to think themselves well dealt withal; in that he was contented not leave unto them their liberty, and their own Laws; without appointing any Governour over them, or Garrison to hold them in subjection; leaving also unto them their possessions in Africa, such as they were at the beginning of this war. As touching the rest he was at a point, that before he either granted them peace or truce, they should make satisfaction for wrongs which they had done, whilst the late Treaty was in dependance. Hereunto if they would yield, then required, He, That immediately they should deliver up to the Romans all prisoners, fugitives, and renegado; thus they had of theirs; likewise all their Gallies, excepting two; and all their Elephants. That they should make no war at all thenceforth out of Africa, neither yet within Africa, without licence of the Romans: That the Country, Towns, goods whatsoever, belonging any wife unto Masaniissa, or to any of his Ancestors; which were in their possession, should be all by them restored unto him: That they should find corn for the Roman Army; and wages for their auxiliaries, during the time of Truce, until the Peace were fully concluded; that they should pay ten thousand Talents of Silver, in the space of fifty years, by two hundred Talents a year, and that for observance of Conditions; they should give an hundred hostages; such as Scipio would choose, being none of them under fourteen years of age; nor above thirty.

With these conditions the Embassadors returned home; and reported them unto the City. They were very unpleasant; and therefore one Gellio stood up to speak against them; and exhorted the people, who gave good attention, that they should not concede unto such intolerable demands. But Hannibal, perceiving this, and noting withal what favourable audience was given to this vain Orator, by the unquiet, yet unwearied multitude, was bold to pull him down from his standing, by plain force. Hereat all the people murmured, as if their common liberty were too much wronged, by such influence of this presumptuous Captain. Which Hannibal perceiving, rose up and spake unto them, saying; That they ought to pardon him, if he had done otherwise than the custom of the City would allow; so far as he had been thence absent ever since he was a Boy of nine years old; until he was now a man of five and forty. Having thus excused himself of the disorder, he discoursed unto them concerning the Peace; and persuaded them to accept it, as wanting ability to defend themselves, had the Demands of the Enemy been yet more rigorous. Finally, upon good advice they resolved to yield unto the Conditions propounded by Scipio: to whom they paid out of hand five and twenty thousand pounds weight in Silver, in recompence of damages, and injuries by them done to his Fleet and Embassadors. Scipio granted them Truce for three months, in which time they might negotiate with the State of Rome, about confirmation of the League. But herewithal he gave injunction, that they should neither in the mean while send Embassadors any whither else, nor yet dismiss any Embassadors to them sent, without first making him acquainted what they were, and what their errand was.

At this time Hanno, and they of his Faction, were become wise and honourable men, by the miseries whereinto Carthage was fallen, through their malicious counsels. Asdrubal, furnished the Kid, a venerable man, and a great friend of Hanno, was chief of the Embassages which they sent to Rome for obtaining peace. They went thither in company of Scipio his Embassadors, who related unto the Senate and People these joyful news. About the same time arrived at Rome Embassadors from Philip King of Macedon: who, together with the Carthaginians, were fain to wait a while for audience, till the election of new Consuls, then in hand was finished; and order taken, for the Provinces of them, and the new Prætors.

Then were the Macedonian Embassadors called into the Senate: who first answering unto some points, wherein the Romans had lately signified unto their King, that they found themselves grieved; returned the blame upon those Greeks themselves, that had made their complaint at Rome. Then accused they Marcus Arelidus, who being one of the three Embassadors, that had lately been sent from Rome unto King Philip, lying in Greece behind his fellows, and there envying men, made war upon the King, without any regard at all of the League, that was between him and the Romans. Further they desired of the Senate, That one Sopater, a Macedonian Gentleman, with other of their Countrymen, that had lately served Hannibal for Pay; and being taken prisoners in Africa, were kept in bonds by Scipio, might be released and delivered unto them. Unto all this M. Furius, whom Arelidus had sent to Rome for that purpose, made a sharp answer. He said, that the Greeks, which were confederate with Rome, enduring so many injuries at the hands of Philip, that M. Arelidus was fain to stay behind, to help them as he might; which else were like to be brought under the Kings subjection. As for Sopater, he affirmed him to be one of the Kings Counsel, and very inward with him: one that served not for money, but carried money with him, and four thousand men, sent from the King to the aid of Hannibal. About these points, when the Macedonian Embassadors could make unto the Senate no good answer, they were willed to return, and tell their Master, That war he sought, and war he should find, if he proceeded as he had begun. For in two main points He had broken the League, that was between him and the Romans: first, in that he had wronged their Confederates; and secondly, in that he had aided their Enemies against them, with men and money.

These quarrels with Philip, that promised to open a way into Greece and the Eastern Countreys, helped well the Carthaginian Embassadors in their solicitation of Peace. They appeared a very reverend company, when they entered into the Senate; and Asdrubal above the rest was much respected, as one.

one, whose good offices had kept the Romans from necessity of sending Embassadors to Carthage, upon the like errand. He liberally granted, that the justice of the quarrel had been wholly on the Romans side; saying, that it was the fault of some violent men, through which the Peace was broken. Yet could he not altogether excuse the City, that had been too vehement in the prosecution of bad counsel. But if Hanno, and himself might have had their wills, the Carthaginians, even at the best of their Fortune, should have granted the peace, which they now desired. Herewithal he commended the moderation of the Romans, as no small argument of their valour; by which always they had been victorious. To the same effect spake the rest of the Embassadors: all of them entreating to have the peace ratified; though some with more lamentable words than others, according to the diversity of their stile. They had patience enough to endure such reproof of Perjury, as they themselves might have laid upon the Romans; if their diligence and fortune had been such as the Romans was. Among the rest, when one of the Senators demanded, by what gods they would swear to keep the peace hereafter: Asdrubal made answer; Even by the same gods, that are so severe unto those that violate their Leagues.

Lentulus the Consul, interposing the authority of his office, would have hindered the Senate from proceeding unto conclusion of peace; for that hereby he was like to lose the honour, which he purposed to get by making war in Africa. But the matter was propounded unto the people, in whom rested the Sovereign Command of Rome; and by them referred wholly unto the pleasure of the Senate. So it was decreed, That Scipio, with ten Delegates, sent unto him from Rome of purpose, should make a League with the Carthaginians, upon such Conditions as seemed best: which were none other, than the same which he had already propounded. For this favour the Carthaginian Embassadors humbly thanked the Senate; and craved licence, that they might visit their Countrymen, which were prisoners in Rome; afterwards, that they might ransom and carry home with them some that were their especial friends; of whom they gave in writing almost two hundred names. Whereupon the Senate ordained, that two hundred of those Prisoners, which the Embassadors would choose, should be sent over into Africa, and be freely restored to liberty by Scipio, when the peace was fully concluded. So they took leave, and returned home, in company of the ten Delegates, that were appointed by the Senate to joyn with Scipio in commission.

At their coming into Africa, the peace was given, and accepted, without any controversy or disputation. The Prisoners; fugitives, and Renegado's, were delivered up to Scipio; likewise the Gallies, and the Elephants. Scipio took more vengeance upon the Renegado's than upon the Fugitives; and upon those of the Romans, then upon the Latines, or other Italians. The Latines he beheaded: the Romans he crucified. About the first payment of their money, the Carthaginians were somewhat troubled. For though perhaps their common Treasury could have spared two hundred Talents for the present; yet since the pension was annual, and to continue fifty years: it was thought meet to lay the burden upon the Citizens. At the collection of the sum there was piteous lamentation, as if now the Roman yoke had begun to pluck them; so many, even of the Senators, could not forbear weeping. Contrariwise, Hannibal could not refrain from laughter. For which, when he was checked by Asdrubal his brother, and told, That it would of all befelcomed him to laugh, since he had been the cause why all others did weep; He answered, That laughter did not always proceed from joy, but sometimes from extremity of indignation: Yet, said He, my laughter is more seasonable, and less absurd, than your tears. For ye should have wept when ye gave up your Ships and Elephants, and when ye bound your own hands from the use of arms, without the good leave of the Romans first obtained. This miserable condition keeps us under, and holds us in assured servitude. But of these matters ye had no feeling. Now, when a little money is wrung out of your private purses, ye have thereof some sense. God grant that the time come not hereafter, wherein ye shall acknowledge, that it was the very last part of your misery for which ye have shed these tears. Thus discouraged Hannibal unto those, who tasting the bitter fruits of their own malicious counsel, repented when it was too late; and instead of cursing their own disorders, which had bred this grievous disease, accused the Physician, whose noble endeavours had been employed in procuring the remedy.

Scipio being to take leave of Africa, produced Masanissa, and magnified him in presence of the Army, with high commendations not undeservedly. To him also he consigned over those towns of King Syphax, which the Romans at that present held; wherein, to say truth, he gave him but his due; and that that which other wise he knew not well how to bestow. But the love of the Romans, and friendship of Scipio, was fully answerable, now and hereafter, to all the desertings of this Numidian King. About Carthage there rested no more to be done. Wherefore the Romans embarked themselves for Sicily: where when they arrived at Eglibœnu, Scipio with some part of his Army took his way home to Rome by Land; and sent the rest before him thither by Sea. His journey through Italy was no less glorious than any triumph: all the people thronging out of the Towns and Villages, to do him honour as he passed along. He entered the City in Triumph: neither was there ever before, or after, any triumph celebrated with so great joy of the people, as was this of Scipio; though, in bravery of the pomp, there were others in time shortly following, that exceeded this. Whether Syphax were carried through the City in this Triumph, and dying soon after in prison; or whether he were dead a while before: it cannot be affirmed. Thus much may be avowed, that it was a barbarous custome made them like in vertue unto Scipio the African.

of mighty Princes, by leading them contumeliously in Triumph; yea, though they were such, as had always made fair and courteous war. But hereof we shall have better example ere the same age pass. It was neither the person of Syphax, nor any other glory of the spectacle, that so much beautified the Triumph of Scipio; as did the contemplation of that grievous war past, whereof the Romans had been in a manner without hope that ever they should sit Italy free. This made them look cheerfully upon the Author of so great a conversion; and filled them with more joy, than they well could moderate. Wherefore they gave to Scipio the Title of the African; stilling him by the name of that Province, which he had subdued. This honourable kind of surname, taken from a conquered Province, grew afterwards more common, and was usurped by men of less desert: especially by many of the Cæsars, who sometimes arrogated unto themselves the title of Countreys, where, as if such glorious Attributes could have made them like in vertue unto Scipio the African.

CHAP. IV.

Of Philip the father of Perseus King of Macedon; his first Acts and War with the Romans, by whom he was subdued.

§. I.

How the Romans grew acquainted in the East-Country, and desirous of War there. The beginning of many Princes, with great Wars, at one time. The Etolians overrun Peloponnesus. Philip and his Associates make War against the Etolians. Alteration of the State in Sparta. The Etolians invade Greece and Macedon, and are invaded at home by Philip.

OF the great similitude found in worldly events, the limitation of matter hath been assigned as a probable cause. For since Nature is confined unto a subject that is not unbounded; the works of Nature must needs be finite, and many of them resemble one the other. Now in those actions, that seem to have their whole dependence upon the will of man, we are less to wonder, if we find less variety: since it is no great portion of things which are obnoxious unto humane power; and since they are the same affections, by which the wills of sundry men are over-ruled, in managing the affairs of our daily life. It may be observed in the change of Empires, before those times whereof we now write, how the Assyrians or Chaldeans invaded the kingdom of the Medes, with two hundred thousand Foot, and threecore thousand Horse; but failing in their intended conquest, they became subject within a while themselves unto the Medes and Persians. In like manner Darius, and after him Xerxes, fell upon the Greeks with such number of men, as might have seemed resistless. But after that the Persians were beaten home again, their Empire was never secure of the Greeks: who at all times of leisure from intestine War, devised upon that conquest thereof, which finally they made under the great Alexander.

If Nabuchodonosor with his rough old Souldiers, had undertaken the Medes: or Cyrus with his well-trained Army, had made attempt upon Greece; the issue might, in humane reason, have been far different. Yet would it then have been expedient for them, to employ the travel and virtue of their men, rather than the greatness of their names against those people; that were no less valiant, though less renowned, than their own. For the menacing words used by Cyrus, and some small displeasures done to the Greeks (in which kind it may be, that Nabuchodonosor likewise offended the Medes and Persians), were not so available to victory, as to draw on revenge in the future. Great Kingdoms, when they decay in strength, suffer as did the old Lion, for the oppression done in his youth; being pinched by the Wolf, gored by the Bull, yea and kicked by the Ass. But Princes are often carried away from reason, by mis-understanding the language of Fame: and despising the virtue that makes little noise, adventure to provoke it against themselves; as if it were not possible that their own glory should be foiled by any of less-noted excellence. Against the same stone, whereat Xerxes, and before him (as I take it) Euthimodach, had stumbled, Pyrrhus the Epirot had dashed his foot. He was not indeed the King of all Greece; though most of mark, and a better Souldier than any other Greekish King, when he entered into the war against the Romans. This war he undertook as it were for his minds sake; having received no injury; but hoping by the glory of his name, and of the Greeks that served under him, to prevail so easily against the barbarous Romans, that they should only serve as a step to his further intended conquests, of Sicily and Africa. But when the Romans by their victory against Pyrrhus had found their own virtue to be of richer metal, than was the more shining valour of the Greeks; than did all the bravery of the Epirot (his Elephants, and whatsoever else had served to make him terrible) serve only to make the Romans in time following, to think more highly of themselves. * For since they had overcome the best Warrior in Greece, even him, that, being thus beaten by them, could in a year after make himself Lord of Greece and Macedon: what should hinder them from the conquest of all those unwarlike Provinces, which in compass of 12 years a Macedonian King of late memory had won? Certainly there was hereunto requisite no more: than to bring to their own devotion by some good means, the whole Country of Greece: all the rest, this done, would follow it self. How to deal with the Greeks, Philip and Alexander had shewed a way: which, or perhaps a better, they might learn, by getting more acquaintance with the Nation.

When therefore the first Punick war was ended, which followed soon after the wars of Pyrrhus and of the Tarentines: then were the Romans at good leisure to hearke after news in Greece; and to entertain any good occasion, that should be on that side presented. They had also then a strong Fleet: and were become, though not otherwise very skilfull Mariners, yet good fighters at Sea. So it fell out as happily as could be wished, that the Illyrian Queen Tinia made at the same time cruel war upon the Greeks: wasting their Country, and sacking their Towns, only because they were unable to resist, though they had done her none offence. Into this quarrel, if the Romans were desirous to enter; the Queen was not slow to give them cause. And their happy accomplishing of that war, which they made with Her, was, in their own opinion, a matter not unworthy to make their Patronage to be desired by the Greeks. But no such thing hapned: though they sent Embassadors, as it were to offer themselves; by signifying, that for the love of Greece they had undertaken this Illyrian war. Thus began the first acquaintance betwixt the Greeks and Romans: which afterwards encreased very hastily, through the indiscretion of King Philip the Macedonian; whose business with them, now being the subject of our story, it is meet that we should relate (though somewhat briefly) the beginning of his reign, and his first Actions. It was like to prove a busie time in the world, when, within the space of 4. years, new Kings began to reign in the most of all Countreys known; and 3. of them young boyes, in 3. of the greatest kingdoms. This hapned from the third year of the hundred thirty ninth Olympiad, unto the third of the Olympiad following. For in this time died Seleucus Ceraunus King of Asia and Syria, in whose room succeeded his brother Antiochus; afterwards called the Great. Ptolomy Philopater succeeded in the Kingdom of Egypt unto his father Euergetes. And Philip the son of Demetrius, being 16. or 17. years old, received the Kingdom of Macedon, together with the Patronage of the Acheans and most of the Greeks; by the decease of his Uncle Antigonus Dofon, that was called the Tutor or Protector. About the same time also was the like change in Cappadocia, Lacedamon, and the Countreys about

Mount Taurus. For Ariarathes then began his reign in Cappadocia. Lycurgus found means to make himself King over the Lacedemonians, whose Common-weal, since the flight of Cleomenes, had continued in a manner headless; and Acheus, a kinsman of Antiochus, but a Rebel unto him, occupied the Regions near unto Mount Taurus, and kept a while the State of a mighty King. Lastly, in the second and third years of the one hundred and fortieth Olympiad it was, that open war brake out between Rome and Carthage; and that Hannibal began his great Invasion upon Italy. Those troubles of the Western world, which were indeed the greatest, we have already followed unto an end: Of Antiochus, Ptolomy, and the rest; we shall speak hereafter, when the Romans find them out.

Philip, soon after the beginning of his reign, came into Peloponnesus; greatly desired of the Acheans, and many other his dependants. That Country, having freed it self by the help of Antigonus from the danger (accounted great) of an easie subjection unto Cleomenes: was now become no less obnoxious to the Macedonian; than it should have been to the Spartans; and therewithal it lay open unto the violence of the Illyrians; who despised even the Macedonian Kings, that were Patrons thereof. The Illyrians were no men to be idles nor were much addicted unto any other Art than war. Therefore wanting employment, they fell upon the Messenians that were their own Clients, and (excepting the Eleans) that were anciently of their confanguinity) the only good friends which they had at the present in Peloponnesus. Their invasion was no less unexpected, than it was unjust: whereby with greater ease they made spoil of the Country; finding none prepared to make resistance. The Acheans, were called by the Messenians to help: which they did the more willingly: because the Illyrians passing without leave through their Territory, had (as was their manner) done what harm they listed. Old Aratus could hardly abide these Illyrians; as both knowing well their nature, and remembering the injuries, wherewith most ingratfully they had requited no small benefits done to them by the Acheans. He was therefore so hasty to fall upon this their Army, that he could hardly endure to stay few days until the time of his own Office came; being chosen Pretor of the Acheans for the year following. But his anger was greater than his courage: and he shewed himself a man fitter (as hath been already noted of him) for any other service, than leading of Army. He suffered them to pass quietly along with their booty, through a part of the Country, wherein he might very easily have distressed them; and afterwards pressed them so near, when they had recovered ground of advantage, that they easily defeated all his Army. So they departed home rich, and well animated to return again. As for the Acheans, they got hereby only the friendship of the Messenians: with whom, by licence of King Philip, they made Confederacy. Shortly after, the Illyrians invaded Peloponnesus again: having no more to do, than to pass over the narrow Straits of the Corinthian Bay, called now the Gulph of Lepanto, wherethey might land in the Country of the Eleans. There joyned with them, in this their second invasion, a great number of the Illyrians: who neglecting that Condition imposed upon them by the Romans, of setting out no Ships of war unto the Coast of Greece: made bold to seek adventures again, and did great mischief. Demetrius Pharius, a creature of the Romans, commanded a part of these Illyrians: who shortly repented him of this his voyage; which caused him to lose his Kingdom, as is shewed before. But this Demetrius went another way, and fell upon the Islands of the Cyclades in the Aegean sea: whence returning, he did some good offices for King Philip, or his friends. The rest of the Illyrians under seordilaidas, or seordileto, having gotten what they could elsewhere by roving at Sea, accompanied the Illyrians into Peloponnesus: who made greater havoc in the Country now, than in their former Expedition, and returned home without finding any resistance.

Of these things great complaint was made unto Philip, when he came to Corinth. And because men were desirous to satiate themselves with some speedy revenge: there were that urged to have some grievous punishment laid upon the Lacedemonians; who were thought underhand to have favoured the Illyrians, in meer despite of the Acheans and Macedonians; by whom themselves had lately been subdued. It is true, that the Lacedemonians had been so affected: and (which was worse) at the arrival of Philip, they slew such friends of his, as having checked their inclination, seemed likely to appease them of the intended rebellion. Neither durst they well commit themselves to judgement: but intreated the King, that he would abstain from coming to them with an Army: since their Town was lately much disquieted with civil discord, which they hoped soon to appease, and meant always to remain at his devotion. Philip was easily satisfied with this: not for that he (or rather old Aratus, who then wholly governed him) did mis-understand the Lacedæmonians: but for that a greater work was in hand, which ought not to be interrupted. There met at Corinth in presence of the King, the Embassadors of the Acheans, Ætolians, Epirots, and Acarnanians: all complaining upon the Ætolians: and desiring to have War decreed against them, by common assent. Philip sent his letters unto the Ætolians, requiring them to make ready their answer in some convenient time: if they could alledge any thing in excuse of that which they had done. They returned word, that a Diet should be holden at Rhimm for that purpose: whither if it pleased him to come, or send, he should be well informed of them and their whole meaning. The King prepared to have been there at the day. But when the Ætolians understood this for certain, they adjourned the Council unto a further time: saying, That such weighty matters ought not to be handled, save in the great Parliament of all Ætolia. This trick of Law notwithstanding, open War was proclaimed against them. And they, as it were, to shew how well they had deserved it, made election of scopas to be their Prætor, that was Author of these Invasions made on Peloponnesus; and the only man, in a sort, upon whom they must have laid the blame of these actions, if they would have shifted it from the publick.

After this, Philip went into Macedon, where he prepared busily for the War against the year following. He also assayed the Illyrian, Scerdi-laidan, with fair words and promises, whom he easily won from the Ætolian side, so far as such as the Ætolians had couzened him of his share, when he was partner with them in their late robberies. In like sort the Acheans, who had first of all others proclaimed the War in their own Country, sent unto the Acarnanians, Epirots, Messinians, and Lacedæmonians: requesting them forthwith to declare themselves, and to denounce war unto the Ætolians; without flaying (as it were) to await the event. Hereunto they received divers answers according to the qualities of those with whom they dealt. The Acarnanians, a free-hearted and valiant, though a small Nation, and bordering upon the Ætolians, of whom they stood in continual danger; said, that they could not honestly refuse to shew their faithful meaning in that War, which was concluded by general assent. The Epirots that were more mighty, were nevertheless more cunning and reserved: so that they stood upon a needless point, and desired to be held excused, until Philip (of whose meaning they needed not to have made any doubt) should first proclaim the war. The Messinians, for whose cause the war was undertaken, excused themselves, by reason of a Town which the Ætolians held upon their borders, and said, that they durst not be over-bold, until that bridle were taken out of their mouths. As for the Lacedæmonians, the chief of them studied only, how to manage the treason for which their City had been so lately pardoned: and therefore dismissed the Embassadors of the Confederates, without any answer at all. They had three years together continued subject against their wills to the Macedonians, expecting till when Cleomenes should return out of Egypt to reign over them again, and maintain, as he was wont, the honour of their City. In this regard they chose not any Kings, but were contented with the rule of Ephori. Of these there were some, that thought the publick safety to consist, in holding their faith with the Macedonian that had preserved them. And hereto they referred all their counsels: being perhaps a little moved with respect of the benefit, which might redound unto themselves, by adhering firmly to those which at the present bore rule over them. Others, and those the greater part were still devising, how to make all ready for Cleomenes against his return; and fought to joya with the Ætolians, which were the most likely to give him strong assistance. The Macedonian faction had the more authority, and durst more freely speak their minds: but the contrary side was the more passionate, and spared not by murders or any other violent courses, to set forward their desire. Neither did it suffice, that about these times there came certain report of Cleomenes his death. For it was the liberty and honour of Sparta, which these intended; fancying unto themselves the glory of their Ancestors in such Ages past, as it were not like to come again. Cleomenes was, they knew, the most able man to restore them unto their greatness & lustre; which once he had in a manner performed: But since he was dead, and that, without injury to his well-deserving virtue, they might proceed to the election of new Kings: Kings they would have, and those of the race of Hercules, as in former times; for that without such helps, they must continue little better than subjects unto the Macedonians, and far less by him respected, than were the Acheans. Thus were they transported by contemplation of their old Nobility and fame. Some of the most working among among them, procured the Ætolians to send an Embassy to Sparta: which propounded the matter openly unto the people, whereof no one of the Citizens durst have made himself the Author. Much disputation, and hot, there was, between those of the Macedonian party, and these their opposites: in such wise that nothing could be concluded; until by massacre or banishment of all, or the chief, that spake against the Ætolians: the diversity of opinion was taken quite away. Then forthwith a League was concluded between the Lacedæmonians and Ætolians: without all regard of the Macedonians or Acheans, who had spared the City, when they might have destroyed it. Then also they went in hand with the election of new Kings: wherein their diligence was so nice, and so regardful of their ancient Laws, as touching the choosing of the one King, that we may justly wonder, how they grew so careless in making choice of the other. In the one of their Royal Families they found Agæopolis, the son of Agæopolis, the son of King Cleombrotus: and him they admitted to reign over them, as heir apparent to his grandfather. This Agæopolis was a young Boy, standing in need of a Guardian; and had an Uncle, his Fathers Brother, that was fit for the Government. Yet because the Law required, that the son, how young soever, should have his fathers whole right and Title: the Lacedæmonians, though standing in need of a man, were so punctual in observation of the Law, that they made this child their King, and appointed his Uncle Cleomenes to be his Protector. But in the other branch of the Royal Family, though there was no want of heirs: yet would not the people trouble themselves about any of them, to examine the goodness of his Claim; but made election of one Lycurgus, who having no manner of title to the Kingdom, bestowed upon each of the Ephori, a Talent, and thereby made himself be saluted King of Sparta, and a Gentleman of the race of Hercules. This Lycurgus to gratifie his Partisans, and to approve his worth by action, invaded the Country of the Argives: which lay open and unguarded, as in a time of peace. There he did great spoil, and won divers Towns; whereof two he retained, and annexed unto the State of Lacedæmon. After such open hostility, the Lacedæmonians declared themselves on the Ætolian side; and proclaimed War against the Acheans.

Thus the beginnings of the War fell out much otherwise, than the Acheans and their Confederates had expected, when they first made preparation. Philip was not ready: the Epirots gave uncertain answer: the Messinians would not stir: all the burden must lye upon themselves and the poor Acarnanians, whom the Ætolians, by favour of the Eleans, could invade at pleasure, as they were like to do; and by help of the Lacedæmonians, could assail on all parts at once. It was not long ere the Ætolians, passing over the Bay of Corinth, surprized the Town of Agira: which if they could have held, they should thereby grievously have molested the Acheans, for that it stood in the mid-way between Ægium and Syeion, two of their principal Cities, and gave open way into the heart of all their Country. But as Agira was taken by surprise: so was it presently lost again, through greediness of spoil; whilst they that should have made it their first care, to assure the place unto themselves, by occupying the citadel and other pieces of strength, fell heedlessly to ransack private houses, and thereby gave the Citizens leave to make head, by whom they were driven with great slaughter back unto their Fleet. About the same time, another Ætolian Army landing among the Eleans, fell upon the Western Coast of Achaia; waiting all the Territory of the Dymeans and other people, that were first beginners of the Achaean Confederacy. The Dymeans and their neighbours made head against these Invaders; but were so well beaten, that the enemy grew bolder with them than before. They sent for help unto their Prætor, and to all the Towns of their Society in vain. For the Acheans having lately been much weakened by Cleomenes, were now able to do little of themselves: neither could they get any strength of Mercenaries; so far as such as at the end of Cleomenes his war they had covertly with-held part of their due from those that served them therein. So through this disability of the Acheans, and insufficiency of their Prætor; the Dymeans, with others, were driven to with-hold their contribution heretofore made for the publick service; and to convert the money to their own defence. Lycurgus also with his Lacedæmonians, began to win upon the Arcadians, that were confederate with Philip and the Acheans.

Philip came to the borders of the Ætolians, whilst their Army was thus employed a far off in Peloponnesus. The Epirots joined all their forces with him: and by such their willing readines, drew him to the siege of a Frontier piece, which they desired to get into their own hands; for that, by commodity thereof, they hoped shortly to make them-themselves Masters of Ambracia. There he spent forty days, ere he could end the business; which tended only to the benefit of the Epirots. Had he entered into the heart of Ætolia at his first coming in; it is thought that he might have had an end of the War. But it happens oft, that the violence of great Armies is broken upon small Towns or Forts: and not seldom, that the importunity of Associates, to have their own desires fulfilled, converts the preparations of great Kings to those uses for which they never were intended; thereby hindering the prosecution of their main designs. Thus was our King Henry the eighth led aside, and quite out of his way, by Maximilian the Emperour to the siege of Tourmay: at such time as the French King Lewis the twelfth, hearing that the strong City of Termin was lost, and that his Cavalry, wherein rested his chief confidence, two thousand were beaten by the Earl of Essex with seven hundred English; was thinking to withdraw himself into Britain, in fear that Henry would have come to Paris.

The stay that Philip made at Ambrachus, did wondrously embolden the Ætolians: in such sort, as their Prætor Scopus adventured to lead all their forces out of the Country; and therewith not only to over-run Thessaly, but to make impression into Macedon. He ran as far as to Dium, a City of Macedon upon the Ægean Sea: which, being forsaken by the Inhabitants at his coming, he took, and razed to the ground. He spared neither Temple, nor any other of the goodly buildings therein, but overturned all: and among the rest, he threw down the Statues that were there erected, of the Macedonian Kings. For this he was highly honoured by his Country-men at his return: forasmuch as hereby they thought their Nation to be grown terrible, not only (as before) unto Poloponnesus, but even to Macedon it self. But this their pride was soon abated; and they rewarded shortly at home in their own Country, for their pains taken at Dium. Philip having dispatched his work at Ambrachus, made a strong invasion upon Ætolia. He took Phæstia, Metropolis, Oeniade, Pæanium, Eleus, and divers other Towns and Castles of theirs: of which he burnt some, and fortified others. He also beat the Ætolians in sundry skirmishes: and wasted all the Country over, without receiving any harm. This done, while he was about to make a cut over the Straights into Poloponnesus, and to do the like spoil in the Country of the Eleans, whereto he was vehemently solicited by the Æchean Embassadors; news came out of Macedon, that the Dardaniæ were ready with a great Army to fall upon the Country. These Dardaniæ were a barbarous people, divided by Mount Hæmus from the Northern part of Macedon, and were accustomed to seek booty in that wealthy Kingdom, when they found their own times. Having therefore intelligence, that Philip was about to make a journey into Poloponnesus; they purposed in his absence, which they thought would be long, to get what they could for themselves in his Country: as had been their manner upon the like advantages. This made the King to dismiss the Æchean Embassadors, (whom he should have accompanied home with his Army) and to bid them have patience until another year. So he took his way home-wards: and as he was passing out of Acarnania into Epirus, there repaired unto him Demetrius Phærius, with no more than one Ship; that was newly chased out of his Kingdom by the Romans. This Demetrius had lately shewed himself a friend to Antigonus Dolon in the wars of Cleomenes: and returning in his last Voyage from the Cyclades, was ready at their first request, to take part with Philip Captain. These, or the like considerations, made him welcome unto the Macedonian King: whose Counsellor he was ever after. The Dardaniæ hearing of the Kings return, brake up their Army, and gave over for the present their invasion of Macedon, towards which they were already on their way.

All that summer following the King rested at Larissa in Thessaly, whilst his people gathered in their Harvest. But the Ætolians rested not. They avenged themselves upon the Epirots: whom for the harms by them and Philip done in Ætolia, they required with all extremities of War, among which, the most notable was the ruine of the most famous Temple of Dodona. When Winter grew on, and all thought of War, until another year, was laid aside: Philip stole a journey into Poloponnesus, with 5000. Foot, & about 400. Horse. As soon as he was within Corinth; He commanded the gates to be shut, that no word should be carried forth of his arrival. He sent privily for old Aratus to come thither unto him: with whom he took order, when, and in what places, he would have the Æchean Souldiers ready to meet him. The enemies were then abroad in the Country, without somewhat more than two thousand Foot, and an hundred Horses;

Horse; little thinking to meet with opposition. Indeed they had little cause to fear: since the Æcheans themselves were not aware that the King was in their Land with his Macedonians; until they heard, that these two thousand Eleans, Ætolians, and all made lows, were by him surprized, and all made prisoners, or slain. By this exploit which he did at his first coming, Philip got very much reputation, and likewise he purchased both reputation and love, by divers actions immediately following. He won Phosphie, an exceeding strong Town, in the borders of Arcadia, which the Eleans and Ætolians then held. He won it by assault at his first coming: wherein it much availed him, that the Enemy, not believing that he would undertake such a piece of work at such an unreasonable time of the year, was careless of providing even such store of weapons, as might have served to defend it. The Town was preserved by the King from sacks; and given to the Æcheans of his meer motion, before they requested it. Thence on, before they yielded for very want he to Lasion, which yielded for fears hearing how easily he had taken Phosphie. This Town also he gave to the Æcheans. The like liberality he used towards others, that had any such title unto places by him recovered. Then fell he upon the Country of Elie, where was much wealth to be gotten: for that the people were addicted to husbandry, and lived abroad in Villages; even such as were of the wealthier sort among them. So he came to the City of Olympia: where having done sacrifice to Jupiter, feasted his Captains, and refreshed his Army three days. He proceeded on to the spoil of those, that had taken pleasure to share with the Ætolians, in the spoils of their otherwise-deserving neighbours. Great abundance of Cattel he took, with great numbers of slaves, and much wealth of all sorts, such as could be found in rich villages. Then he fell in hand with the Towns, whereinto a great multitude of the Country people were fled. Some of these were taken at the first assault. Some yielded for fear. Some prevented the labour of his journey, by sending Embassadors to yield before he came. And some that were held with Garrisons against their wils, took courage to set themselves at liberty, by seeing the King to near: to whole Patronage thenceforth they betook themselves. And many places were spoiled by the Ætolians Captains; because they distrusted their ability to hold them. So the King won more Towns in the Country, than the sharpness of winter would suffer him to stay there days. Fain he would have fought with the Ætolians: but they made such haste from him, that he could not overtake them; till they had covered themselves within the Town of Samionis; where they thought to have been safe. But Philip assaulted them therein to forcibly, that he made them glad to yield the place; obtaining license to depart with their lives and arms. Having performed so much in this expedition, the King reposited himself a while in Metropolis, and then removed to Argos, where he spent all the rest of the winter.

Before the Kings arrival in Poloponnesus, the Lacedæmonians, with Lycurgus their new King, had gotten somewhat in Arcadia, and threatened to do great matters. But when they were admonished, by the calamity that fell upon the Eleans, of the danger hanging over their own heads; they quitted their winnings, and withdrew themselves home. This Lycurgus, as he had no other right to the Kingdom of Sparta, than that which he could buy with money, so was he neither free from danger of conspiracies made against him: nor from those jealousies, with which Usurpers are commonly perplexed. There was one Chilon, of the Royal blood, that thinking himself to have best right unto the Kingdom, purposed to make way thereunto by massacre of his opposites; and afterwards to confirm himself, by propounding unto the multitude such reformation of the State as was most popular: namely, by making an equal distribution of all the lands among the whole number of the Citizens, according to the ancient institution of that Commonwealth. He won to his party some two hundred men; with whom he fell upon the Ætolians, as they were together at supper, & slew them all. Then went he to Lycurgus his house: who perceiving the danger, stole away and fled. It remained that he should give account of these doings to the people, and procure them to take part with him. But their minds not being hereto predisposed; they so little regarded his goodly offers, as even whilst he was using his best persuasions, they were consulting how to apprehend him. Chilon perceived whereabouts they went, and shifted presently away. So he lived afterwards among the Æcheans a banished man, and hated of his own people. As for Lycurgus he returned home: & suspecting thenceforth all those of Hercules his race, found means to drive out his fellow-King young Agessipolis whereby he made himself Lord alone. His doings grew to be suspected, in such sort, as once he should have been apprehended by the Epirots. But though his actions hitherto might have been defended; yet rather than than to adventure himself into judgment; he chose to live for a time, and sojourn among his friends the Ætolians. His well-known vehemency in opposition to the Macedonians, had procured unto him such good liking among the people, that in his absence they began to consider the weakness of their own studies against him; and pronouncing him innocent, recalled him home to his Estate. But in time following, he took better heed unto himself; not by amending his condition (for he grew a Tyrant, and was so acknowledged) but by taking order, that it should not be in the power of the Citizens to expel him when they listed. By what actions he got the name of a Tyrant; or at what time it was, that he chased Agropolis out of the City; I do not certainly find. Like enough it is, That his being the first of three usurpers, which followed in order one after another, made him to be placed in the rank of Tyrants; which the last of the three very justly deserved. Whatsoever he was toward some private Citizens, in the war against Philip, he behaved himself as a provident man, and careful of his Country's good.

§. II.

How Philip was misadvised by his Counsellors: who afterwards wrought treason against him; and were justly punished. He invades the Ætolians a second time: and forceth them to sue for peace: which is granted unto them.

Whilest the King lay at Argos devising upon his business for the year following, some ambitious men that were about him, studied so diligently for their own greatness, as they were like to have spoiled all that he took in hand. Antigonus Dofon had left unto Philip such Counsellors, as to him did seem the fittest men for governing of his youth. The chief of these was Apelles; that had the charge of his person, and also the ordering of his Treasures. This man, seeming to himself a great Politician, thought that he should do a notable piece of service to his Prince, if he could reduce the Acheans unto the same degree of subjection, wherein the Macedonians lived. To bring this to pass; during the late Expedition he had caused some of the Macedonians to thrust the Acheans out of their lodgings, and to strip them of the booty that they had gotten. Proceeding further, as occasion fell out; he was bold to chastise some of that Nation; causing his Ministers to take and whip them. If any of them offered (as there were some of them that could not refrain) to help their fellows; then he laid by the heels, and punished as Mutiners. Hereby he thought to bring it to pass by little and little, that they should be qualified with an habit of blind obedience; and think nothing unjust that pleased the King. But these Acheans were tenderly sensible in matters of liberty: whereof if they could have been contented to suffer any little diminution, they needed not have troubled the Macedonians to help them in the war against Cleomenes. They bemoaned themselves unto old Aratus; and besought him to think upon some good order, that they might not be oppressed by degrees. Aratus forthwith dealt earnestly with the King; as in a matter more weighty than at first it might seem. The King bestowed gracious words upon those that had been wronged, and forbade Apelles to follow the course begun. Hereat Apelles was inwardly vexed, though he dissembled his choler for a time. He thought so well of his own Project, that he could not endure to lay it aside; being perhaps unable to do the King any valuable service, in business of other nature. He purposed therefore hereafter to begin at the head; since, in biting at the tail, the fish had shot away from his mouth. It could not otherwise be than that among the Acheans there were some, who bore no hearty affection to Aratus. These he enquired out, and sending for them, entertained them with words of Court: promising to become their especial friend, and commend them unto the King. Then brake he his purpose with the King himself: letting him know, that as long as he continued to make much of Aratus, he must be fain to deal precisely with the Acheans, and sit were by Indenture, according to the letter of the Contract: whereas if he would be pleased, to give countenance unto those others whom he himself commended, then should the Acheans, and all other Peloponnesians, be quickly brought to conform themselves unto the duty of obedient Subjects. By such persuasions, he drew the King to be present at Ægium, where the Acheans were to hold election of a new Pætor. There with much more labour, than would have been needful in a business of more importance, the King by fair words and threatenings together, obtained so much, That Epeiratus, a very insufficient man, but one of Apelles his new favourites, was chosen Pætor, instead of one more worthy, for whom Aratus had laboured. This was thought a good good introduction unto greater matters that should follow. The King from thence passed along by Patras and Dyma, to a very strong Castle held by the Eleans, which was called Ticbor. The garrison yielded it up for fear, at his first coming: whereof he was glad, for that he had an earnest desire to bestow it upon the Dymeans, as he presently did.

The King thought it strange, that all this while he heard of no messengers from the Eleans, to sue for peace. For at his departure out of their Country the last Winter, he had let loose one Amphidamus a Captain of theirs, that was his prisoner; because he found him an intelligent man, and one that undertook to make them forsake their alliance with the Ætolians, and joyn with him upon reasonable terms. This if they could be contented to do, he willed Amphidamus to let them understand, That he would render unto them freely all prisoners which he had of theirs; That he would defend them from all forrain invasion; and that they should hold their liberty entire, living after their own Laws, without paying any manner of Tribute, or being kept under by any garrison. These conditions were not to be despised, if they had found credit, as they might have done. But when Philip came to the Castle of Ticbor, and made a new invasion upon their Country: then began the Eleans, (that were not before over-hasty to believe such fair promises) to suspect Amphidamus as a Traitor, and one that was set on work for no other end, than to breed a mutual diffidence between them and the Ætolians. Wherefore they purposed to lay hands upon him, and send him prisoner unto Ætolia. But he perceived their intent, and got away to Dyma: in good time for himself; in better for Aratus. For the King (as was said) marvelling what should be the cause, that he heard no news from the Eleans, concerning the offers which he had made unto them by Amphidamus: Apelles his Counsellor, thereby took occasion to supplant Aratus. He said that old Aratus, and his son together, had such devices in their heads, as tended little to the Kings good: And long of them he said it was, that the Eleans did thus hold out. For when Amphidamus was dismissed home, the two Arati, (the father and the son) had taken him aside and given him to understand, that it would be very prejudicial to all Peloponnesus, if the Eleans once became at the devotion of the Macedonian: And this was the true cause, why neither Amphidamus was very careful in doing this message; nor the Eleans in heark-

ning to the Kings offers. All this was a false lye, devised by Apelles himself, upon no other ground than his own malice. Philip had no sooner heard this tale, but in a great rage he sent for the two Arati, and bade Apelles rehearse it over again to their faces. Apelles did so, and with a bold countenance, talking to them as to men already convicted. And when he had said all the rest, ere either Philip or they spake any word; He added this clause, as it were, in the Kings name: Since the King hath found you such ungrateful wretches; it is his meaning to hold a Parliament of the Acheans; and therein having made it known what ye are, to depart into Macedon, and leave you to your selves. Old Aratus gravely admonished the King; That whensoever he heard any accusation, especially against a friend of his own, or a man of worth, He should forbear a while to give credit, until he had diligently examined the business. For such deliberation was Kingly, and he should never thereof repent him. At the present he said there needed no more, than to call in those that had heard his talk with Amphidamus, and especially him that had brought this goodly tale to Apelles. For it would be a very absurd thing, That the King should make himself the Author of a report in the open Parliament of Achaia, whereof there was none other evidence, than one man yes, and another no. Hereof the King liked well; and said that he would make sufficient inquiry. So passed a few dayes: wherein whilest Apelles delayed to bring in the proof, which indeed he wanted, Amphidamus came from Elis, and told what had befallen him there. The King was not forgetful, to examine him about the conspiracy of the Arati: which, when he found no better than a meer device against his honourable friends; he entertained them in loving manner as before. As for his love to Apelles, though it was hereby somewhat cooled; yet by means of long acquaintance and daily employment, no remission therein could be discerned.

The unrestful temper of Apelles, having with much vehemency brought nothing to pass, began (as commonly Ambition useth) to swell and grow venomous for want of his free motion. He betakes himself to his cunning again: and as before, being checkt in his doings with those of the vulgar, he had prepared a snare for the Arati: so falling of them, he thinks it wisdom to lay for the King himself, and for all at once which were about him. In such manner sometime, the Spider thought to have taken the Swallow: which drave away flies out of the chimney; but but was carried (net and all) into the Air by the bird, that was too strong to be caught, and held by the subtle workmanship of a Cob-web. Of the four that next unto Apelles were left by Antigonum in chief place about Philip; Taurion, his Lieutenant in Peloponnesus, and Alexander Captain of the Guard, were faithful men, and such as would not be corrupted. The other two, Leontium Captain of the Targettiers, and Megalas chief of the Secretaries, were easily won to be at Apelles his disposition. This politician therefore studied how to remove the other two from their places, and put some Creatures of his own into their rooms. Against Alexander he went to work the ordinary way, by calumny and privy detraction. But for the supplanting of Taurion he used more fineness; loading him with daily commendations, as a notable man of war, and one, whom for his many virtues the King might ill spare from being always in his presence. By such Art he thought to have removed him, as we say, Out of Gods blessing into a warm sun. In the mean season Aratus retired himself: and sought to avoid the dangerous friendship of the King, by forbearing to meddle in affairs of State. As for the new Pretor of Achaia, lately chosen by such vehement instance of the King; He was a man of no dispatch, and one that had no grace with the people. Wherefore a great deal of time was lost, whilst Philip wanted both the money and the Corn, wherewith he should have been furnished by the Acheans. This made the King understand his own error: which he wisely fought to reform betimes. He persuaded the Acheans to rejoin their Parliament from Agium, to Sycion, the Town of Aratus. There he dealt with the old man and his son, persuading them to forget what was past; and laying all the blame upon Apelles, on whom thenceforth he intended to keep a more diligent eye. So by the travel of these worthy men, he easily obtained what he would of the Acheans. Fifty talents they gave him out of hand; with great store of Corn; and further decreed, That so long as he himself in person followed the wars in Peloponnesus, he should receive ten talents a month. Being thus enabled, he began to provide shipping, that so he might invade the Etolians, Eleans, and Lacedaemonians, that were maritime people, at his pleasure, and hinder their excursions by Sea.

It vexed Apelles beyond measure, to see things go forward so well without his help; even by the ministry of those whom he most hated. Wherefore he entred into conspiracy with Leontium and Megalas: binding himself and them by Oath, to cross and bring to nought, as well as they were able, all that the King should take in hand. By so doing, they thought to bring it to pass, that very want of ability to do any thing without them; should make him speak them fair, and be glad to submit himself to their directions. The King it is like had stood in some awe of them whilst he was a child; and therefore these wise men persuaded themselves, that by looking big upon him; and imputing unto him all that fell out ill through their own misgovernment of his affairs, they might rule him as a child still. Apelles would needs go to Glaucia, there to take order for the provisions, which were to come that way out of Macedon: The other two staid behind with the King, to play their parts; all more mindful of their wicked oath, than of their duty.

His Fleet and Army being in a readiness: Philip made countenance, as if he would have bent all his forces against the Eleans; so whose aid therefore the Etolians sent men, little fearing that the mischief would have fallen, as soon after it did, upon themselves. But against the Eleans and those that came to help them, Philip thought it enough to leave the Asbeans, with some part of his and their Mercenaries. He himself with the body of his Army putting to Sea, landed in the Isle of Cephalonia: whence the Etolians, dwelling over against it, used to furnish themselves of shipping, when they went to rove abroad. There he besieged the Town of Palaea, that had been very serviceable to the Enemy against him and his Confederates; and might be very useful to him, if he could get it. Whilst he lay before this Town, there came unto him fifteen ships of war from Serdilidae; and many good Souldiers, from the Epirots, Acarnanians, and Messenians. But the Town was obstinate, and would not be terrified with numbers. It was naturally fenced on all parts save one, on which side Philip carried a Mine to the wall, wherewith he overthrew two hundred foot thereof. Leontium Captain of the Targettiers, was appointed by the King to make the assault. But he, remembering his covenant with Apelles, did both wilfully forbear to do his best: and caused others to do the like. So the Macedonians were put to foile, and many slain, not of the worst Souldiers: but such as had gotten over the breach, and would have carried the Town, if the Treason of their Captain, and some by him corrupted, had not hindered the victory. The King was angry with this, but there was no remedy: and therefore he thought upon breaking up the siege. For it was easier unto the Towns-men to make up the gap in their wall, than for him to make it wider. Whilst he stood thus perplexed and uncertain what course to take: the Messenians and Acarnanians lay hard upon him, each of them desirous to draw him into their own Country. The Messenians alleged, that Lycorgus was busie in waiting their Country: upon whom the King might come unawares in one day; the Etolians winds which then blew, serving fitly for his Navigation. Hereto also Leontium persuaded, who considered that those winds, as they would easily carry him thither, so would they detain him there perforce (blowing all the Dog-days) and make him spend the Summer to small or no purpose. But Aratus gave better counsel, and prevailed: he shewed how unfitting it were, to let the Etolians over-run all Thebessy again, and some part of Macedon, whilst the King withdrew his Army far off to seek small adventures. Rather, he said that the time now served well to carry the war into Etolia: since the Pretor was gone thence abroad on roving, with the one half of their strength. As for Lycorgus, he was not strong enough to do much harm in Peloponnesus: and it might suffice, if the Acheans were appointed to make head against them. According to this advice, the King set sail for Etolia, and enters the Bay of Ambracia, which divided the Etolians from Acarnania. The Acarnanians were glad to see him on their borders, and joyed with him as many of them as could bear arms, to help in taking vengeance upon their bad neighbours. He marched up into the inland Country: and taking some places by the way, which he filled with Garrisons to assure his Retreat; He passed on to Thermum, which was the Receptacle of the Etolians, and surest place of defence in all extremities. The Country round about was a great fastness, environed with rocky Mountains of very narrow steep, and difficult ascent. There did the Etolians use to hold all their chief meetings, their Fairs, their election of Magistrates, and their slem Games. There also they used to bestow the most precious of their goods, as in a place of greatest security. This opinion of the natural strength, had made them careless in looking unto it. When Philip therefore had overcome the bad way, there was nothing else to do than to take spoil: whereof he found such plenty, that he thought the pains of his journey well recompensed. So he loaded his Army: and consumed all that could not be carried away, forgetting not to raze a goodly Temple, the chief of all belonging unto the Etolians; in remembrance of their like courtship, shewed upon the Temples of Dium and Dodana. This burning of the Temple, might (questionless) more for the Kings honour have been forgotten. But perhaps he thought, as Monsieur du Gourgues the French Captain told the Spaniards in Florida, That they which had no faith, needed no Church. At his return from Thermum, the Etolians laid for him: which that they would do, he believed before, and therefore was not taken unawares. Three thousand of them there were that lying in ambush, fell upon his skirts: but he laid a Counter-ambush for them, of his Illyrians; who staying behind the rest, did set upon the backs of the Etolians, whilst they were busily charging in Rear the Army that went before. So with slaughter of the enemy, he returned the same way that he came: and burning down those places that he had taken before, as also waiting the Country round about him, He safely carried all that he had gotten aboard his fleet. Once the Etolians made countenance of fight, if- fusing out of Siratus in great bravery. But they were beaten home faster than they came, and followed to their very gates.

The joy of this victorious expedition being every way compleat, and not deformed (as commonly happens) by any sinister accident; it pleased the King to make a great feast unto all his friends and Captains. Thither were invited among the rest Leontium, with his fellow Megalas. They came because they could not choose: but their heavy looks argued, what little pleasure they took in the Kings prosperity. It grieved them to think, that they should be able to give no better account unto Apelles, of their hindering the Kings business; since Apelles himself, as will be shewed anon, had played his own part with a most mischievous dexterity. Finding Aratus on the way home to his Tent: they fell to reviling him, throwing stones at him, so that they caused a great uprore: many running in (as happens in such cases) to take part with the one or the other. The King sending to enquire of the matter, was truly informed of all that had passed: Which made him send for Leontium and his fellows. But Leontium was gotten out of the way: Megalas, and another with him, came. The King began to rate them for their disorder: and they, to give him froward answers: in so much, as they said at length, That they would never give over, till they had rewarded Aratus with a mischief as he deserved.

ved. Hereupon the King committed them to ward. Leontius hearing of this comes boldly to the King, with his Targettiers at his heels: and with a proud grace demanded, who it was that had dared to lay hands upon Megaleas, yea, and to cast him into prison? Why said the King, it was even I. This resolute answer, which Leontius had not expected, made him depart both sad and angry; seeing himself out-frowned, and not knowing how to remedy the matter. Shortly after Megaleas was called forth to his answer, and was charged by Aratus with many great crimes. Among which were, The hinderance of the Kings victory at Pales, and the Compact made with Apelles: matters no less touching Leontius, that stood by as a looker on, than Megaleas that was accused. In conclusion, the presumptions against him were so strong, and his answers thereto so weak; that he, and Crinon one of his fellows, were condemned in twenty Talents: Crinon being remanded back to prison; and Leontius becoming Bail for Megaleas. This was done upon the way home-wards, as the King was returning to Corinth.

Philip dispatched well a great deal of business of this year. For as soon as he was at Corinth, he took in hand an Expedition against the Lacedaemonians. These and the Eleans had done what harm they could in Peloponnesus, whilst the King was absent. The Achaens had opposed them as well as they could; with ill success; yet so, as they hindered them from doing such harm as else they would have done. But when Philip came, he over-ran the Country about Lacedaemon: and was in a manner at the Gates of Sparta, ere men could well believe that he was returned out of Etolia. He took not in this Expedition any Cities, but made great waite in the fields: and having beaten the enemy in some skirmishes, carried back with him to Corinth a rich booty of cattle, slaves, and other Country spoil. At Corinth he found attending him, Embassadors from the Rhodiens and Chians, that requested him to set Greece at quiet, by granting peace unto the Etolians. They had gracious audience: and he willed them to deal first with the Etolians, who if they would make the same request, should not find him unreasonable. The Etolians had sped ill that year: neither saw they any likely hopes for the years following. The Army that they had sent forth to waite Thebais and Macedon, found such opposition on the way; that not daring to proceed, it returned home without bringing any thing to effect. In the mean season they had been grievously afflicted, as before is shewed, by Philip in the centre of their own Country. All Greece and Macedon was up in arms against them, and their weak Allies the Eleans and Lacedaemonians. Neither was it certain, how long the one or other of these their Peloponnesian friends should be able to hold out, since they were not strong enough to keep the field, but had already suffered those miseries of war, which by a little continuance would make them glad, each to seek their own peace, without regard of their Confederates. Wherefore the Aitolians readily entertain'd this negotiation of peace: and taking truce for thirty dayes with the King, dealt with him by intercession of the same Embassadors, to intreat his presence at a Diet of the Nation, that should be held at Rhium; whither if he would vouchsafe to come, they promised that he should find them conformable to any good reason.

Whilst these things were in hand, Leontius and Megaleas thought to have terrified the King, by raising sedition against him in the Army. But this device forted to no good effect. The Souldiers were easily and quickly incensed against many of the Kings friends, who were said to be the cause, why they were not rewarded with so much of the booty, as they thought to belong of right unto them: But their anger spent it self in a noise, and breaking open of doors, without further harm done. This was enough to inform the King (who easily pacified his men with gentle words) that some about him were very false. Yea, the Souldiers themselves repenting of their insolence, desired to have the Authors of the tumult sought out, and punished according to their deserts. The King made shew as if he had not cared to make such inquisition. But Leontius and Megaleas were afraid, lest the matter would soon come out of it self to their extrem danger. Wherefore they sent unto Apelles, the Head and Architect of their treason, requesting him speedily to repair unto Corinth, where he might stand between them and the Kings displeasure. Apelles had not all this while been wanting to the business, undertaken by him and his treacherous companions. He had taken upon him, as a man that had the Kings heart in his own hand: and thereby was he grown into such credit, that all the Kings Officers in Macedon and Thebais addressed themselves unto him, and received from him their dispatch in every business. Likewise the Greeks in all their flattering Decrees; took occasion to magnifie the virtue of Apelles, making slight mention (only for satisfaction sake) of the King: who seemed no better better than the Minister and Executioner of Apelles his will and pleasure. Such was the arrogance of this great man, in setting himself out unto the people: but in managing the Kings affairs, he made it his special care, that money and all things needful for the publick service, should be wanting. Yea, he enforced the King for very need, to sell his own Plate and household vessels: thinking to resolve these and all other difficulties, by only saying, Sir, be ruled wholly by me, and all shall be as you would wish. Here-to if the King would give assent, then had this Politician obtained his hearts desire. Now taking his journey from Chalcis in the Isle of Euboea, to the City of Corinth where Philip then lay: he was fetcht in with great pomp and royalty, by a great number of the Captains and Souldiers; which Leontius and Megaleas drew forth to meet him on the way. So entering the City with a goodly train, he went directly to the Court, and towards the Kings chamber. But Philip was well aware of his pride, and had vehement suspicion of his falshood. Wherefore one was sent to tell him, that he should wait a while, or come another time, for the King was not now at leisure to be spoken with. It was a pretty thing, that such a check at his made all his attendants forsake him, as a man in disgrace; in such sort, that going thence to his lodging, he had none to follow him save his own Pages. After this, the King vouchsafed him now and then some slender graces: but in consultations, or other matters of privacy, he used him not at all. This taught Megaleas to look to himself, and run away betimes: Hereupon the King sent forth Taurion his Lieutenant of Peloponnesus, with all the Targettiers, as it were to do some piece of service; but indeed of purpose to apprehend: Leontius in the absence of his followers. Leontius being taken, dispatched away a messenger presently to his Targettiers, to signify what was befallen him: and they forthwith sent unto the King in his behalf. They made request, That if any other thing were objected against him, he might not be called forth to trial before their return: as for the debt of Megaleas, if that were all the matter, they said they were ready to make a purse for his discharge. This affection of the Souldiers made Philip more haity than else he would have been, to take away the Traitors life. Neither was it long ere letters of Megaleas were intercepted, which he wrote unto the Etolians, vilifying the King with opprobrious words, and bidding them not to hearken after peace, but to hold out a while, for that Philip was even ready to sink under the burden of his own poverty. By this the King understood more perfectly the falshood, not only of Megaleas, but of Apelles; whose cunning head had laboured all this while to keep him so poor. Wherefore he sent one to pursue Megaleas that was fled to Thebes. As for Apelles, he committed both him, his son, and another that was inward with him, to prison; wherein all of them shortly ended their lives. Megaleas also, neither daring to stand to trial, nor knowing whither to flee, was weary of his own life, and slew himself about the same time.

The Etolians, as they had begun this war upon hope of accomplishing what they listed in the Nonage of Philip: so finding that the vigour of this young Prince tempered with the cold advice of Aratus, wrought very effectually toward their overthrow; they grew very desirous to make an end of it. Nevertheless, being a turbulent Nation, and ready to lay hold upon all advantages, when they heard what was happened in the Court, the death of Apelles, Leontius, and Megaleas, together with some indignation thereupon conceived by some of the Kings Targettiers, they began to hope anew, that these troubles would be long lasting, and thereupon brake the day appointed for the meeting at Rhium. Of this was Philip nothing sorry. For being in good hope thoroughly to tame this unquiet Nation; he thought it much to concern his own honour, that all the blame of the beginning and continuing the War should rest upon themselves. Wherefore he willed his Confederates to lay aside all thought of peace, and to prepare for War against the year following; wherein he hoped to bring it to an end. Then gratified he his Macedonian Souldiers, by yielding to let them winter in their own Country. In his return homeward, he called into judgement one Ptolemy, a companion with Apelles and Leontius in their Treasons: who was therefore condemned by the Macedonians; and suffered death. These were the fame Macedonians, that lately could not endure to hear of Leontius his imprisonment; yet now they think the man worthy to die that was but his adherent. So vain is the confidence, on which Rebels use to build, in their favour with the Multitude.

During his abode in Macedon, Philip won some bordering Towns, from which the Dardaniens, Etolians, and other his ill neighbours, were accustomed to make rodes into his Kingdom: when he had thus provided for safety of his own; the Etolians might well know what they were to expect. But there came again Embassadors from the Rhodians and Chians, with others from Piomy King of Aegypt, and from the City of Bizantium, recontaining the former solicitation about the peace. This fashion had been taken up in matters of Greece, ever since the Kings that reigned after Alexander, had taken upon them to set the whole Country at liberty: No sooner was any Province or City in danger to be oppressed and subdued by force of war, but presently there were found Intercessors, who pitying the effusion of Greekish blood, would importune the stronger to relinquish his advantage. By doing such friendly offices in time of need, the Princes and States abroad fought to bind unto them those people, that were howsoever weak in numbers, yet very good Souldiers: But hereby it came to pass, that the more forward fort, especially the Etolians, whose whole Nation was addicted to falsehood and robbery, durst enter boldly into quarrels with all their neighbours: being well assured that if they had the word, The love of Greece would be sufficient for to redeem their quiet. They had, since the late Treaty of Peace, done what harm they could in Peloponnesus: but being beaten by the Acheans, and standing in fear to be more soundly beaten at home, they desired now more earnestly than before, to make an end of the War as soon as they might. Philip made such answer unto the Embassadors, as he had done the former year: That he gave not occasion to the beginning of this War, nor was at the present afraid to continue it, or unwilling to end it: But that the Etolians, if they had a desire to live in rest, must first be dealt withal, to signify plainly their determination, whereto himself would return such answer as he should think fit.

Philip had at this time no great liking unto the Peace, being a young Prince, and in hope to increase the honour which he daily got by the War. But it happened in the midst of this Negotiation, that he was advertised by letters out of Macedon, what a notable victory Hannibal had obtained against the Romans in the battel at Thrasymene. These letters he communicated unto Demetrius Pharius: who greatly encouraged him to take part with Hannibal: and not to sit still, as an idle beholder of the Italian War. Hereby he grew more inclinable than before unto Peace with the Etolians: which was concluded shortly in a meeting at Naples. There did Agellus an Etolian make a great Oration: telling; how happy it was for the Greeks, that they might at their own pleasure dispute about finishing War between themselves, without being molested by the Barbarians. For when once either the Romans, or Carthaginians had subdued one the other; it was not to be doubted, that they would forthwith look Eastward, and seek, by all means, to set footing in Greece. For this cause he said it were good, that their Country should be at peace within itself; and that Philip, if he were desirous of War, should lay hold on the opportunity, now fully serving to enlarge his Dominion, by winning somewhat in Italy.

Such advice could the Etolians then give, when they stood in fear of danger threatening them at hand: but being soon after weary of rest, as being accustomed to enrich themselves by pillage, they were so far from observing and following their own good counsel, that they invited the Romans into Greece, whereby they brought themselves and the whole Countray (but themselves before any other part of the Country) under servitude of Strangers. The Condition of this Peace was simple. That every one should keep what they held at the present, without making restitution, or any amends for damages past.

§. III.

Philip, at the persuasion of Demetrius Pharius, enters into League with Hannibal against the Romans. The tenour of the League between Hannibal and Philip.

This being agreed upon: the Greeks betook themselves to quiet courses of life; and Philip to prepare for the business of Italy, about which he consulted with Demetrius Pharius. And thus passed the time away, till the great battel of Cannae, after which he joyned in league with Hannibal, as hath been shewed before. Demetrius Pharius bore great malice unto the Romans, and knew no other way to be avenged upon them, or to recover his own lost kingdom, than by procuring the Macedonians, that was in a manner wholly guided by his counsel, to take part with their enemies. It had otherwise been far more expedient for Philip, to have supported the weaker of those two great Cities against the more mighty. For by so doing, he should perhaps have brought them to peace upon some equal terms; and thereby, as did Hiera, a far weaker weaker Prince, have both secured his own Estate, and caused each of them to be desirous of chief place in his friendship. The issue of the counsel which he followed, will appear soon after this. His first quarrel with the Romans; the trouble which they and the Attolians did put him to in Greece; and the Peace which they made with him for a time, upon such Conditions that might easily be broken, have been related in another place, as belonging unto the second Punick War. Wherefore I will only here set down the tenour of the League between him and Carthage, which may seem not unworthy to be read, if only in regard of the form it self then used: though it had been overlong to have been inserted into a more bulke piece.

The Oath and Covenants between HANNIBAL General of the Carthaginians, and XENOPHANES Embassador of PHILIP King of Macedon.

This is the League ratified by Oath, which need, and shall do according to the Covenants Hannibal the General, and with him between Us. But if the Gods shall witness Magos, Myrcal, and Barmocal, as also the Senate unto You and Us their help in this War against Carthage that are present, and all the Romans and their Associates; themselves the Carthaginians that are in his Army, have Romans offer friendship, We shall make stipend made with Xenophanes the son of Cleomachus in such wise, that ye shall be partakers of the same friendship, with condition: That if Demetrius hath sent unto us, for himself and they shall not have power to make War upon the Macedonians, and his Associates: Before You: Neither shall the Romans be Lords over Jupiter, and Juno, and Apollo, before the Gods of the Carthaginians, Hercules and Tommale, nor the Parthini, nor Atintania. They shall also render unto Demetrius Pharius all the Gods accompanying Arms, the Sun, the Moon, and the Earth: before Rivers and Meltdowns, and Waters: before all the Gods that rule over Carthage: before all the Gods that rule over Macedon, and the rest of that War, as either shall have need. The same shall be observed in War made by any other, excepting those Kings, Cities, and States, with whom we hold already league and friendship. To this league, if War or detraction shall be made by our common consent.

Nations with which we hold friendship in Italy, Gauls, and Liguria, and with whom we shall hold alliance hereafter in this Region; be preferred by King Philip and the Macedonians, and such of the Greeks as are their Associates. In like manner, shall King Philip and the Macedonians, and either the Greeks his Associates, be saved and preserved by the Carthaginian Armies, and by the Uticans, and by all Cities and Nations that obey the Carthaginians, and by their Associates and Souldiers, and by all Nations and Cities in Italy, Gauls, and Liguria, that are of our Alliance, or shall hereafter join with Us in Italy. We shall not take Counsel one against the other, nor deal fraudulently one with the other. With all readines and good will, without deceit or subtilty, We shall be enemies unto the enemies of the Carthaginians, excepting those Kings, Towns, and Havens, with which We have already league and friendship: We also shall be enemies to the enemies of King Philip, excepting those Kings, Cities, and Nations, with which we have already league and friendship. The War that We have with the Romans, have ye also with them, with the Gods shall give Us a new and happy end: To shall aid Us with those things wherof we have

§. IV.

How Philip yielded to his natural vices, being therein soothed by Demetrius Pharius. His desire to tyrannize upon the free States his Associates: With the troubles into which he thereby fell, whilst he bore a part in the second Punick War. He poisoneth Aratus, and grows hateful to the Achæans.

Hitherto Philip had carried himself as a virtuous Prince. And though with more commendation of his wisdom, he might have offered his friendship to the Romans, that were like to be oppressed, than to the Carthaginians, who had the better hand: yet this meddling in the Punick War, proceeded from a royal greatness of mind, with a desire to secure and increase his own estate; adding therewithal reputation to his Country. But in this business he was guided (as hath been said) by Demetrius Pharius: who looking thoroughly into his nature, did accommodate himself to his desires, and thereby shortly governed him as he listed. For the virtues of Philip were not indeed such as they seemed. He was lustful, bloody, and tyrannical: desirous of power to do what he listed, and not otherwise listening to do what he ought, than so far forth, as by making a fair shew he might breed in men such good opinion of him, as should help to serve his turn in all that he took in hand. Before he should busie himself in Italy, he thought it requisite in good policy, to bring the Greeks that were his Associates, under a more absolute form of subjection. Hereunto Apelles had advised him before: and he had liked reasonably well of the counsellor. But Apelles was a boysterous Counsellor: and one that referring all to his own glory, thought himself deeply wronged; if he might not wholly have his own way, but were driven to await the Kings opportunity at other times. Demetrius Pharius could well be contented to observe the Kings humours: and guided, like a Coach-man, with the reins in his hand, those affections which himself did only seem to follow. Therefore he grew daily more and more in credit: so as, without any manner of contention, he supplanted Aratus; which the violence of Apelles could never do.

There arose about these times a very hot Faction among the Messenians, between the Nobility and Commons: their vehement thoughts being rather diverted (as happens often after a foreigne War) unto domestical objects, than allayed and reduced unto a more quiet temper. In process of no long time, the contention among them grew so violent, that Philip was intreated to compound the differences. He was glad of this: resolving so to end the matter, that they should not henceforth strive any more about their Government: for that he would assume it wholly to himself. At his coming thither, he found Aratus busie among them to make all friends, after a better manner than agreed with his own secret purpose. Wherefore he consulted not with this revered old man: but talked in private with such of the Messenians as repaired unto him: He asked the Governours, what they meant to stand thus disputing: and whether they had not Laws to bridle the insolence of the unruly Rabble: Contrariwise, in talking with the heads of the popular Faction, he said it was strange, that they being so many would suffer themselves to be opposed by a few; as if they had not hands to defend themselves from Tyrants. Thus whilst each of them presumed on the Kings assistance, they thought it best to go roundly to work, ere that he were gone, that should countenance their doings. The Governours therefore would have apprehended some feditious Orators, that were, they said, the stirrers up of the multitude unto sedition. Upon this occasion, the people took Arms: and running upon the Nobility and Magistrates, killed of them in a rage, almost two hundred. Philip thought, it seems, that it would be safe to worry the Sheep, when the Dogs their Guardians were slain. But his falsehood and double dealing was immediately found out. Neither did the younger Aratus forbear to tell him of it in publick, with very bitter and disgraceful words. The King was angry at this. But having already done more than was commendable, or excusable: and yet further intending to take other things in hand wherein he should need the help and countenance of his best friends; he was content to smother his displeasure, and make as fair weather as he could. He led old Aratus aside by the hand, and went up into the Castle of Ithome, that was over Messene. There he pretended to do sacrifice: and sacrifice he did. But it was his purpose to keep the place to his own use: for that it was of notable strength; and would serve to command the further parts of Peloponnesus, as the Citadel of Corinth, which he had already, commanded the entrance into that Country. Whilst he was therefore sacrificing, and had the entrails of the beast delivered into his hands, as was the manner; he shewed them to Aratus, and gently asked him, whether the tokens that he

he saw therein did signifie, That being now in possession of this place, he should quietly go out of it, or rather keep it to himself. He thought perhaps, that the old man would have soothed him a little; were it only for desire for to make amends for the angry words newly spoken by his son. But as Aratus stood doubtful what to answer, Demetrius Pharius gave this verdict: If thou be a Southsayer, thou must go thy way, and let slip this good advantage, if thou be a King, thou must not neglect the opportunity, but hold the Oxe by both his horns. Thus he spake; resembling Ithome and Acrocorinthus unto the two horns of Peloponnesus. Yet would Philip needs hear the opinion of Aratus: who told him plainly, That it were well done to keep the place, if it might be kept without breach of his faith unto the Messenians: But if, by seizing upon Ithome, he must lose all the other Castles that he held, and especially the strongest Castle of all that was left unto him by Antigonus, which was his credit; then were it far better to depart with his Souldiers, and keep men in duty, as he had done hitherto, by their own good wills, than by fortifying any strong places against them; to make them of his friends become his enemies.

To this good advice, Philip yielded at the present: but not without some dislike thenceforth growing between him and the Arati: whom he thought more froward than he seemed them, in contradicting his will. Neither was the old man desirous at all, to deal any longer in the Kings affairs, or be inward with him. For, as he plainly discovered his tyrannous purposes; so likewise he perceived, that in resorting to his house, he had been dishonest with his sons wife. He therefore staid at home: where at good leisure he might repent, that in despite of Cleomenes, his own Countryman, and a temperate Prince, he had brought the Macedonians into Peloponnesus.

Philip made a Voyage out of Peloponnesus into Epirus, wherein Aratus refused to bear him company. In this journey he found by experience what Aratus had lately told him, That unhoneest counsels are not to be profitable in deed, as in appearance. The Epirots were his followers and dependants; and so they purposed to continue. But he would needs have them so to remain, whether they purposed it or not. Wherefore to make them the more obnoxious unto his will, he seized upon their Town of Oricum, and laid siege to Apollonia; having no good colour of these doings: but thinking himself strong enough to do what he listed, and not seeing whence they should procure friends to help them. Thus instead of settling the Country, as his intended Voyage into Italy required: he kindled a fire in it which he could never quench, until it had laid hold on his own Palace. Whilst he was thus labouring to bind the hands that should have fought for him in Italy, M. Valerius the Roman came into those parts; who not only maintained the Epirots against him, but procured the Aetolians to break the Peace, which they had lately made with him.

Thus began that War; the occurrences whereof we have related before, in the place whereto it belonged. In managing whereof, though Philip did the offices of a good Captain: yet when leisure served, he made it apparent that he was a vicious King. He had not quite left his former desire, of oppressing the liberty of the Messenians; but made another journey into their Country, with hope to deceive them as before. They understood him better now than before; and therefore were not hasty to trust him too far. When he saw that his cunning would not serve, he went to work by force; and calling them his enemies, invaded them with open War. But in that War he could do little good; perhaps, because none of his Confederates were desirous to help him in such an enterprise. In this attempt upon Messene, he lost Demetrius Pharius; that was his Counsellor and Flatterer, not his Perverter; as appears by his growing daily more naught in following times. The worse that he sped, the more angry he waxed against those that seemed not to favour his injurious doings. Wherefore, by the ministry of Taurion, his Lieutenant, he poisoned old Aratus; and shortly after that, he poisoned also the younger Aratus: hoping that these things would never have been known; because they were done secretly, and the poisoners themselves were more sure than ministers in operation. The Sicyonians, and all the people of Achaia, decreed unto Aratus more than humane honours, as Sacrifices, Hymns, and Processions, to be celebrated every year twice, with a Priest ordained unto him for that purpose; as was accustomed unto the Heroes, or men, whom they thought to be translated into the number of the gods. Hereunto they are said to have been encouraged by an Oracle of Apollo; which is like enough to have been true, since the help of the Devil is never failing to the increase of Idolatry.

The living memory of Aratus their Patron, and singular Benefactor, could not but work work in the Achaens a marvellous dislike of that wicked King which had made him thus away. He shall therefore hear of this hereafter, when they better dare to take counsel for themselves. At the present, the murder was not generally known or believed: neither were they in case to suspect, without his help that had committed it. The Boians were a most outrageous people, great darers, and shameless robbers. With these the Romans made a league: whereof the Conditions were soon divulged, especially that main point, concerning the division of the purchase which they should make, namely, That the Boians should have the Countrey and Towns; but the Romans the spoil, and carry away the people to sell for slaves. The Achaens, who in times of greater quiet, could not endure to make strait alliance with the Boians, as knowing their unciivil disposition; were much the more averse from them, when they perceived how they had called in the Barbarians (for such did the Greeks account all other Nations except their own) to make havock of the Countrey. The same consideration moved also the Lacedemonians to stand off a while, before they would declare themselves for the Boians, whose friendship they had embraced in the late war. The industry therefore of Philip, and the great care which he seemed to take of the Achaens his Confederates, sufficed to retain them: especially, at such time, as their own necessity was thereto concurrent. More particularly he obliged unto himself the Dymeans by an inestimable benefit: recovering their Town, after it had been taken by the Romans and Boians; and redeeming their people wheresoever they might be found, that had been carried away captive, and sold abroad for slaves. Thus might he have blotted out the memory of offences past; if the malignity of his natural condition had not otherwise broken out, and given men to understand, that it was the Time, and not his Merit, which caused him to make such a shew of goodness. Among other foul acts, whereof he was not ashamed, he took Polycratia the wife of the younger Aratus, and carried her into Macedon: little regarding how this might serve to confirm in the people their opinion, that he was guilty of the old mans death. But of such faults he shall be told, when the Romans make War upon him the second time: for, of that which happened in this first Invasion, I hold it superfluous to make repetition.

S. V.

Of Philopemen General of the Achaens: and Machanidas, Tyrant of Lacedemon. A battel between them, wherein Machanidas is slain.

It happens often, that the decease of one eminent man discovers the virtue of another. In the place of Aratus, there stood up Philopemen: whose notable valour, and great skill in Arms, made the Nation of the Achaens redoubtable among all the Greeks, and careles of such practices as in former times they had needed against the violence of their neighbours. This is that Philopemen, who being then a young man, and having no command, did especial service to Antigonus, at the battel of Sellasia, against Cleomenes. Thence forward untill now, he had spent the most part of his time in the Isle of Crete: the Inhabitants whereof being a valiant people, and seldom or never at peace between themselves; he betwixt among them his knowledge, and practice in the Art of War. At his return home, he had charge of the Horse; wherein he carried himself so strictly, travelling with all the Cities of the Confederacy, to have his followers well mounted, & armed at all places; as also he so diligently trained them in all exercise of service, that he made the Achaens very strong in that part of their forces. Being afterward chosen Priest or General of the Nation, he had no less care to reform their military discipline throughout, whereby his Countrey might be strong enough to defend itself, and not any longer (as in former times) used to depend upon the help of others. He persuaded the Achaens to cut off their vain expenses of bravery, in apparel, household stuff, and curious fare, and to bestow that cost upon their Arms: wherein by how much they were the more gallant; by so much were they like to prove the better Souldiers, and suitable in behaviour, unto the pride of their furniture. They had served hitherto with little light Bucklers, and slender Darts, to cast afar off; that were useful in skirmishing at some distance, or for surprises, or sudden and hasty Expeditions, whereto Aratus had been most accustomed. But when they came to handi-strokes, they were good for nothing, so long as they were wholly driven to rely upon the courage of their Mercenaries. Philopemen altered this: causing them to arm themselves more weightily, to use a larger kind of shield, with good swords, and strong pikes, fit for service at hand. He taught them also to fight in close order, order, and altered the form of their combatting: not making the Files so deep as had been accustomed, but extending the Front; that he might use the service of many hands.

Eight moneths were spent of that year, in which he first was Priest of the Achaens, when Machanidas the Tyrant of Lacedemon caused him to make trial, how his Souldiers had profited by his discipline. This Machanidas was the successor unto Lycurgus, a man more violent than his fore-goer. He kept in pay a strong Army of Mercenaries: and he kept them not only to fight for Sparta, but to hold the City in obedience to himself person. Wherefore it behoved him not to take part with the Achaens, that were favourers of liberty; but to strengthen himself by friendship of the Boians: who in making Alliances, took no further notice of vice or virtue, than as it had reference to their own profit. The people also of Lacedemon, through their inveterate hatred unto the Argives, Achaens, and Macedonians, were in like sort (all or most of them) inclinable to the Boian Faction. Very unwisely. For in seeking to take revenge upon those, that had lately hindered them from getting the Lordship of Peloponnesus; they hindered themselves thereby from recovering the Mastery of their own City. This affection of the Spartans, together with the regard of his own security, and no small hope of good that would follow, suffered not Machanidas to be idle; but always made him ready to fall upon his neighbours backs, and take of theirs what he could, whilst they were enforced, by greater necessity, to turn face another way. Thus had he often done, especially in the absence of Philip: whose sudden coming into those parts, or some other opposition made against him, had usually made him fail of his attempts. At the present he was stronger in men, than were the Achaens, and thought his own men better Souldiers than were theirs.

Whilst Philip therefore was busied elsewhere, he entered the Countrey of the Mantineans: being not without hope to do as Cleomenes had done before him; yea and perhaps to get the Lordship of Peloponnesus, as having stronger friends and weaker opposition, than Cleomenes had found. But Philopemen was ready to entertain him at Mantineia; where was fought between them a great battel. The Tyrant had brought into the field upon Carts a great many of engines, wherewith to beat upon the Squadrons of his enemies, and put them in disorder. To prevent this danger, Philopemen sent forth his light armature a good way before him; so as Machanidas was fain to do the like. To second these, from the one and the other side came in continual supply; till at length all the Mercenaries, both of the Achaens and of Machanidas, were drawn up to the fight: being so far advanced, each before their own Phalanx, that it could no otherwise be discerned which pressed forward, or which recoyled, than by rising of the dust. Thus were Machanidas his engines made unserviceable, by the interposition of his own men; in such manner as the Cannon is hindered from doing execution, in most of the battels fought in these our times. The mercenaries of the Tyrant prevailed at length: not only by their advantage of number, but (as Polybius well observeth) by surmounting their opposites in degree of courage, wherein usually the hired Souldiers of Tyrants exceed those that are waged by free States. For as it is true, that a free people are much more valiant than they which live oppressed by Tyranny, since the one, by doing their best in fight, have hope to acquire somewhat beneficial to themselves, whereas the other do fight (as it were) to assure their own servitude: so the Mercenaries of a Tyrant, being made partakers with him in the fruits of his prosperity, have as good cause to maintain his quarrel as their own; whereas they that serve under a free State, have no other motive to do manfully, than their bare stipend. Further than this, when a free State hath gotten the Victory, many companies (if not all) of foreign Auxiliaries are presently cast; and therefore such good fellows will not take much pains to bring the War to an end. But the Victory of a Tyrant, makes him stand in need of more such helpers; because that after it be done wrong to more, as having more subjects; and therefore stands in fear of more, that should seek to take revenge upon him. The stipendiaries of the Achaens, being forced to give ground, were urged so violently in their retreat by those of Machanidas; that shortly they betook themselves to flight; and could not be staid by any persuasions of Philopemen, but ran away quite beyond the battel of the Achaens. This disaster had been sufficient to take from Philopemen the honour of the day; had he not wisely observed the demeanour of Machanidas, and found in him that error which might restore the Victory. The Tyrant with his Mercenaries gave chase unto those that fled: leaving behind him in good order of battel his Lacedemonians; whom he thought sufficient to deal with the Achaens, that were already disheartned by the flight of their companions. But when this his rashness had carried him out of sight, Philopamen advanced towards the Lacedæmonians that stood before him. There lay between them athwart the Country a long ditch, without water at that time, and therefore passable (as it seemed) without much difficulty, especially for Foot. The Lacedæmonians adventured over it, as thinking themselves better Soldiers than the Acheans, who had in a manner already lost the day. But hereby they greatly disordered their own Battel, and had no sooner the foremost of them recovered the further bank, than they were stoutly charged by the Acheans, who drove them headlong into the ditch again. Their first ranks being broken, all the rest began to shrink: so as Philopamen getting over the ditch, easily chased them out of the Field. Philopamen knew better how to use his advantage, than Machabide had done. He suffered not all his Army to disband and follow the chase, but retained with him a sufficient strength, for the custody of a bridge that was over the ditch, by which he knew that the Tyrant must come back. The Tyrant with his Mercenaries returning from the chase, looked very heavily when he saw what was fallen out. Yet, with a fully troop of Horse about him, he made towards the bridge: hoping to find the Acheans in disorder, and to set upon their backs, as they were carelessly pursuing their Victory. But when he and his Company saw Philopamen ready to make good the bridge against them; then began every one to look, which way he might shift for himself. The Tyrant, with no more than two in his company, rode along the ditch side, and searched for an easy passage over. He was easily discovered by his purple Callock, and the costly trappings of his Horse. Philopamen therefore leaving the charge of the bridge unto another, coated him all the way as he rode, and falling upon him at length in the ditch itself, as he was getting over it, slew him there with his own hand. There died in this Battel on the Lacedæmonians side about four thousand: and more than four thousand were taken prisoners. Of the Achean Mercenaries, probable it is, that the loss was not greatly cared for; since that War was at an end, and for their money they might hire more when they should have need.

Philip having peace with Rome, and with all Greece, prepares against Asia. Of the Kings of Pergamus, Cappadocia, Pontus, Paphlagonia, Bithynia, and their Enemies. Of the Galatians.

By this Victory the Acheans learned to think well of themselves. Neither needed they indeed after a while (such was their discipline and continuall exercise) to count themselves in matter of War inferior to any; that should have brought against them no great odds of numbers. As for the Macedonians, he made no great use of them: But when he had once concluded peace with the Romans and Athenians, he studied how to enlarge his Dominion Eastward: since the fortune of his friends the Carthaginians declined in the West. He took in hand many matters together; of very nearly together, and some of them not without where in if the Acheans would have done him service, they might by helping him to oppress others that never had wronged him; have taught him the way how to deal with themselves. He greatly hated Antiochus King of Pergamus, who had joyed with the Romans and Athenians in War against him.

This Antiochus, though a King, was feared yet a Nobleman, otherwise than as he was compassed by his own, and by his Father's virtue. His fortune began in Phileterus his Uncle: who being guided, by reason of a misthap which he had, when he was a child, grew afterwards thereby to be the more esteemed: as great men in those times reported much confidence in Eunuchs; whose affections could not be obliged unto wives or children. He was entertained into the family of Docimus, a Captain following Antiochus the first; and after the death of Antiochus, he accompanied his Master, that he took himself to Lysimachus King of Thrace. Lysimachus had a good opinion of him; and put him in trust with his money and accounts. But when at length he stood in fear of this King, that grew a bloody Tyrant; he fled into Asia, where he seized upon the Town of Pergamus, and thence thousand talents belonging to Lysimachus. The Town and money, together with his own service, he offered unto Selenus the first, that then was ready to give Lysimachus battel. His offer was kindly accepted; but never performed; for that Selenus, having slain Lysimachus, died shortly after himself: before he made use of Phileterus or his money. So this Eunuch still retained Pergamus, with the Country round about it; and reigned therein twenty years as an absolute King. He had had two brethren: of which the elder is said to have been a poor Carter; and the younger perhaps not much better, before such time, they were raised by the fortune of this Eunuch. Phileterus left his Kingdom to the elder of these, or to the son of the elder, called Eumenes. This Eumenes enlarged his Kingdom; making his advantage of the dissention between Selenus Calinicus and Antiochus Hierax, the sons of the second Antiochus. He fought a battel with Hierax, near unto Sardis, and won the Victory. At which time, to animate his men against the Gauls that served under his Enemy, he used a pretty device. He wrote the word * Victory upon the hand of his Soothsayer, in such colours as would easily come off: and when the hot liver of the beast that was sacrificed, had cleanly taken the print of the letters, He published this unto his Army as a Miracle, plainly foreshowing that the gods would be assistant in that Battel.

After this Victory, he grew a dreadful enemy to Selenus: who never durst attempt to recover from him, by War, the Territory that he had gotten and held. Finally, when he had reigned two and twenty years, he died by a surfeit of over-much drink, and left his Kingdom to Attalus, of whom we now treat; that was son unto Attalus the youngest brother of Phileterus. Attalus was an undertaking Prince, very bountiful, and no less valiant. By his own proper forces he restored his friend Ariarathes the Cappadocian into his Kingdom, whence he had been expelled. He was grievously molested by Achæus: who setting up himself as King against Antiochus the Great, reigned in the lesser Asia. He was besieged in his own City of Pergamus: but by the help of the Troians, a Nation of the Gauls, whom he called over out of Thrace, he recovered all that he had lost. When these Gauls had once gotten footing in Asia, they never wanted employment, but were either entertained by some of the Princes reigning in those quarters, or interposed themselves without invitation, and found themselves work in quarrels of their own making. They caused Prusias King of Bithynia to cease from his War against Byzantium. Whereunto when he had condescended; they nevertheless within a while after invaded his Kingdom. He obtained against them a great Victory; and used it with great cruelty, sparing neither age nor sex. But the swarm of them increasing, they occupied the Region about Hellepontus where, in seating themselves, they were much beholding unto Attalus. Nevertheless, presuming afterwards upon their strength, they forced their Neighbour Princes and Cities to pay them tribute: in the sharp exaction whereof, they had no more respect unto Attalus, than to any that had worse deserved of them. By this they compelled him to fight against them: and he being victorious, compelled them to contain themselves within the bounds of that Province, which took name from them in time following, and was called Galatia. Yet continued they still to oppress the weakness of their neighbours, and to fill up the Armies of those that could best hire them.

The Kings reigning in those parts, were the posterity of such, as had saved themselves and their Provinces, in the bloody reign of the Persians; or in the busy times of Alexander, and his Macedonian followers. The Cappadocians were very ancient: for the first of their line had married with Andriæ, sister unto the great King Cyrus. Their Country was taken from them by Perdiccas, as is shewed before. But the son of that King, whom Perdiccas crucified, espousing his time while the Macedonians were at civil war among themselves; recovered his Dominion, and passed it over to his off-spring. The Kings of Pontus had also their beginning from the Persian Empire; and are said to have issued from the royal house of Achæmenes. The Paphlagonians derived themselves from Pylæmenes, a King that assisted Priamus at the war of Troy. These, applying themselves unto the times, were always conformable unto the strongest. The Ancestors of Prusias had begun to reign in Bithynia, some few generations before that of the great Alexander. They lay somewhat out of the Macedonians way: by whom therefore, having no other employment, they were the less molested. Calanus, one of Alexander's Captains, made an expedition into their Country, where he was vanquished. They had afterwards to do with a Lieutenant of Antiochus, that made them somewhat more humble. And thus they thrived, as did the rest, until the reign of Prusias, whom we have already sometimes mentioned.

§. VII.

The Town of Chios taken by Philip, at the instance of Prusias, King of Bithynia, and cruelly destroyed. By this and the like actions, Philip grows hateful to many of the Greeks: and is warred upon by Attalus King of Pergamus, and by the Rhodians.

Prusias as a neighbour King, had many quarrels with Attalus; whose greater

he suspected. He therefore strengthened himself, by taking to wife the daughter of Philip; as Attalus, on the contrary side, entered into a strict Confederacy with the Ætolians, Rhodiens, and other of the Greeks. But when Philip had ended his Ætolian war, and was deviling with Antiochus about sharing between them two the Kingdom of Egypt, wherein Pholomy Philopater, a friend unto them both, was newly dead; and had left his son Ptolomy Epiphanes, a young child, his heir: the Bythinian entered this his Father-in-law to come over into Asia, thereto win the Town of the Ciani, and bestow it upon him. Philip had no right unto the Town, nor just matter of quarrel against it: but it was fitly feared for him, and therewithal rich. Philip came, as one that could not well deny to help his Son-in-law. But hereby he mightily offended no small part of Greece. Embassadors came to him whilst he lay at the siege, from the Rhodiens, and divers other States: intreating him to forsake the enterprise. He gave dilatory, but otherwise gentle answers: making shew as if he would condescend to their request, when he intended nothing less. At length he got the Town: where, even in presence of the Embassadors, of whose solicitation he had seemed so respectful, he omitted no part of cruelty. Hereby he rendred himself odious to his neighbours, as a perfidious and cruel Prince. Especially his fact was detested of the Rhodiens, who had made vehement intercession for the poor Ciani: and were advertised by Embassadors of purpose sent unto them from Philip. That howsoever it were in his power to win the Town as soon as he listed, yet in regard of his love to the Rhodiens, he was contented to give it over. And by this his clemency, the Embassadors said, that he would manifest unto the world what slanderous tongues they were, which noised abroad such reports, as went of his falshood and oppression. Whilst the Embassadors were declaiming at Rhodes in the Theater to this effect; there came some that made a true relation of what had happened: shewing that Philip had sacked and destroyed the Town of Cios, and, after a cruel slaughter of the Inhabitants, had made slaves of all that escaped the sword. If the Rhodiens took this in great despite, no less were the Asiatics inflamed against him: since they had sent a Captain to take charge of the Town; warned before by his doings at Lysimachia and Chalcedon (which he had withdrawn from their Confederacy to his own) what little trust was to be repoled in the faith of this King. But most of all others was Attalus moved with consideration of the Macedonians violent ambition, and of his own estate. He had much to lose; and was not without hope of getting much, if he could make a strong party in Greece. He had already, as a new King, followed the example of Alexanders Captains, in purchasing with much liberality the love of the Athenians; which were notable Trumpeters of other mens virtue, having lost their own. On the friendship of the Ætolians he had cause to presume; having bound them unto him by good offices, many & great, in their late war with Philip. The Rhodiens that were mighty at Sea, and held very good intelligence with the Egyptians, Syrians, and many other Princes and States, he easily drew into a straight alliance with him; by their hatred newly conceived against Philip.

Upon confidence in these his friends, but most of all, in the ready assistance of the Rhodiens, Attalus prepared to deal with the Macedonian by open war. It had been unreasonable to procrastinate, and expect whereto the doings of the enemy tended; since his desire to fasten upon Asia was manifest, and his falshood no less manifest, than was such his desire. They met with him shortly not far from Chios; and fought with him a battle at Sea: wherein though Attalus was driven to run his own Ship on ground, hardly escaping to land: though the Admiral of the Rhodiens took his death wound: and though Philip after the battle took harbour under a Promontory, by which they had fought, so that he had the gathering of the wracks upon the shore: Yet so much as he had suffered far greater loss of Ships, and men, than had the enemy; and since he durst not in few days after put forth to Sea, when Attalus and the Rhodiens came to brave him in his Port; the honour of the victory was adjudged to his enemies. This notwithstanding, Philip afterwards besieged and won some Towns in Caria: whether only in a bravery, and to despite his opposites: or whether upon any hopeful desire of conquest, it is uncertain. The stratagem, by which he won Prinassus, is worthy of noting. He attempted it by a mine: and finding the earth so stony, that it resisted his work; he nevertheless commanded the Pioneers to make a noise under ground; and secretly in the night time he raised great mounds about the entrance of the mine, to breed an opinion in the besieged, that the work went marvelously forward. At length he sent word to the Towns-men, that by his undermining, two acres of their wall stood only upon wooden props, to which if he gave fire, and entered by a Breach, they should expect no mercy. The Prinassians little thought, that he had fetched all his earth and rubbish by night a great way off, to raise up those heaps which they saw; but rather that all had been extracted out of the mine. Wherefore they suffered themselves to be out-faced, and gave up the Town as lost, which the enemy had no hope to win by force. But Philip could not stay to settle himself in those parts. Attalus and the Rhodiens were too strong for him at Sea, and compelled him to make haste back into Macedon; whither they followed him all the way in manner of pursuit.

The Romans, after their Carthaginian War, seek matter of quarrel against Philip. The Athenians upon slight cause, proclaim War against Philip: moved thereto by Attalus; whom they flatter. Philip wins divers Towns; and makes peremptory answer to the Roman Embassador. The furious resolution of the Abydeni.

THESE Asiatick matters, which no way concerned the Romans, yet served well to make a noise in Rome; and fill the peoples heads, if not with a desire of making war in Macedon, at least with a conceit that it were expedient so to do. The Roman Senate was perfectly informed of the state of those Eastern Countries; and knew, that there was none other Nation than the Greeks, which lay between them and the Lordship of Asia. These Greeks were factious, and seldom or never at peace. As for the Macedonian; though length of time, and continual dealings in Greece ever since the reigns of Philip and Alexander, had left no difference between him and the Naturals: yet most of them abhorred his Dominion, because he was originally forsooth a Barbarian: many of them hated him upon ancient quarrels: and they that had been most beholding unto him, were nevertheless weary of him, by reason of his personal faults. All this gave hope, that the affairs of Greece would not long detain the Roman Armies: especially since the divisions of the Country were such, that every petty Estate was apt to take Counsel apart for it self; without much regarding the generality. But the poor Commonalty of Rome had no great affection to such a chargeable enterprise. They were already quite exhausted, by that grievous war with Hannibal: wherein they had given by Loan to the Republick, all their money: neither had they as yet received, neither did they receive until fifteen or sixteen years after this, their whole sum back again. That part of payment also which was already made, being not in present money, but much of it in Land: it bestowed them to rest a while; and bestowed the more diligence in tilling their grounds, by how much they were the less able to bestow cost. Wherefore they took no pleasure to hear, that Attalus and the Rhodiens had sent Embassadors to sollicite them against Philip, with report of his bold attempts in Asia: or that M. Aurelius, their Agent in Greece, had sent letters of the same tenour to the Senate, and magnified his intelligence, by setting out the preparations of this dangerous enemy, that solicited not only the Towns upon the Continent, but all the Islands in those Seas, visiting them in person, or sending Embassadors, as one that meant shortly to hold war with the Romans upon their own ground. Philip had indeed no such intent: neither was he much too strong, either of himself, or by his alliance in Greece, to be resisted by Attalus and the Rhodiens; especially with the help of the Ætolians their good friends, and (in a manner) his own professed enemies. But such things must be published abroad, if only to predispose men unto the war, and give it the more honest colour.

Philip was a man of ill condition; and therefore could not thrive by intermeddling in the affairs of those that were more mighty than himself. He was too unskilful, or otherwise too unapt, to retain his old friends: yet would he needs be seeking new enemies. And he found them such, as he deserved to have them: for he offered his help to their destruction, when they were in misery, and had done him no harm. It behoved him therefore, either to have strained his forces to the utmost in making war upon them; or in desisting from that injurious course, to have made amends for the wrongs past, by doing friendly offices of his own accord. But he, having broken that League of peace, which is of all other the most natural, binding all men to offer no violence willingly, unless they think themselves justly provoked; was afterwards too fondly perfwaded, that he might well be secure of the Romans, because of the written Covenants of peace between him and them. There is not any form of Oath, whereby such Articles of peace can be held inviolable, save only * by the water of Syx, that is, by Necessity: which whilst it binds one party, or both unto performance, making it apparent, that he shall be a loser who starts from the Conditions; it may so long (and so long only) be presumed, that there shall be no breach: Till Hannibal was vanquished, the Romans never hearkened after Philip: for necessity made them let him alone. But when once they had a peace with Carthage; then was the River of Styx dried up: and then could they swear as Mercury did in the Comedy, by their own selves, even by their good words, that they had good reason to make war upon him. The voyage of Sopater into Africa, and the protest war against Attalus, were matter of quarrel as much as needed: or if this were not enough; the Athenians helped to furnish them with more.

The Athenians, being at this time Lords of no more than their own barren Territory, took state upon them nevertheless, as in their ancient fortune. Two young Gentlemen of Asarania entering into the Temple of Ceres in the days of Initiation (wherein were delivered the mysteries of Religion, or rather of idolatrous superstition, vainly said to be available unto felicity after this life) discovered themselves by some impertinent questions, to be none of those that were initiated: Hereupon they were brought before the officers: and though it was apparent, that they came into the place by meer error, not thinking to have therein done amiss; yet, as it had been for some heinous crime, they were put to death. All their Country-men at home took this in ill part; and sought to revenge it as a publick injury, by war upon the Athenians: Procuring therefore of Philip some Macedonians to help them, they entered into Attica: who walked it with fire and sword; and carried thence a great booty. This indignity stirred up the high-minded Athenians; and made them think upon doing more, than they had ability to perform. All which at the present they could do, was to send Embassadors to King Attalus, gratulating his happy success against Philip, and intreating him to visit their City. Attalus was hereto the more willing, because he understood that the Roman Embassadors, hovering about Greece for matter of intelligence, had a purpose to be there at the same time. So he went thither, accompanied, besides his own followers, with some of the Rhodians. Landing in the Piræus, he found the Romans there, with whom he had much friendly conference: they rejoicing that he continued enemy to Philip; and he being so less glad, when he heard of their purpose to renew the war. The Athenians came out of their City, all the Magistrates, Priests, and Citizens, with their wives and children, in as solemn a pomp as they could devise, to meet and honour the King. They entertained the Romans that were with him, in very loving manner: but towards Attalus himself they omitted no point of observance, which their flattery could suggest. At his first coming into the City, they called the people to Assembly: where they desired him to honour them with his presence, and let them hear him speak. But he excused himself; saying, That with an evil grace he should recount unto them those many benefits, by which he studied to make them know what love he bore them. Wherefore it was thought fit, that he should deliver in writing, what he would have to be propounded. He did so. The points of his Declaration were; first, what he had willingly done for their sake: then, what had lately passed between him and Philip: lastly, an exhortation unto them, to declare themselves against the Macedonians; whilst he, with the Rhodians and the Romans, were willing and ready to take their part: which if they now refused to do, he protested, that afterwards it would be vain to crave his help. There needed little intreaty: for they were as willing to proclaim the war, as he to desire it. As for other matters, they loaded him with immoderate honours: and obtained, That unto the ten Tribes, whereof the body of their Citizens consisted, should be added another, and called after his name; as if he were in part one of their Founders. To the Rhodians they also decreed a Crown of Gold, in reward of their virtue; and made all the Rhodians free Citizens of Athens.

Thus began a great noise of war, wherein little was left unto the Romans for their part: Attalus and the Rhodians taking all upon them. But while these were vainly mispending the time, in seeking to draw the Ætolians to their party: that contrary to their old manner were glad to be at quiet: Philip won the Towns of Maronea and E-nus, with many other strong places about the Hellepont. Likewise passing over the Hellepont, he laid siege unto Abydos; and won it, though he was fain to stay there long. The Town held out, rather upon an obstinate resolution, and hope of succour from Attalus and the Rhodians, than any great ability to defend it self against so mighty an Enemy. But the Rhodians sent thither only one Quadrivemus Gallie; and Attalus no more than three hundred men, far too weak an aid to make good the place. The Roman Embassadors wondred much at this great negligence of them that had taken so much upon them.

Roman

These Embassadors, C. Claudius, M. Amylius, and P. Sulpicius, were sent unto Ptolemy Epiphane King of Egypt, to acquaint him with their Victory against Hannibal and the Carthaginians; as also to thank him for his favour unto them shewed in that War; and to desire the continuance thereof, if they should need it against Philip. This Egyptian King was now in the third or fourth year of his reign, which (as his father Philopater had done before him) he began a very young boy. The courtier for which the Romans were to thank him, was that out of Egypt they had lately been supplied with corn, in a time of extrem Dearth; when the miseries of War had made all their own Provinces unable to relieve them. This message could not but be welcome to the Egyptian: since it was well known, how Philip and Antiochus had combated themselves against him, conspiring to take away his Kingdom. And therefore it might in reason be hoped, that he, or his Counsel for him, should offer to supply the Romans with corn: since this their Macedonian Expedition concerned his Estate no less than theirs.

But as the errand was for the most part complementary; so had the Embassadors both desire and direction from the Senate, to look unto the things of Greece by the way. Wherefore they agreed, that M. Amylius the youngest of them should step aside, and visit Philip, to trie if he could make him leave the siege of Abydos; which else he was like to carry. Amylius, coming to Philip, tells him that his doings are contrary to the League that he had made with the Romans. For Attalus and the Rhodians, upon whom he made War, were Confederate with Rome: and the Town of Abydos, which he was now besieging, had a kind of dependancy upon Attalus. Hereto Philip answered, That Attalus and the Rhodians had made War upon him: and that he did only requite them with the like. Do you also (said Amylius) requite these poor Abydens with such terrible War, for any the like Invasion by them first made upon you? The King was angry to hear himself thus taken short: and therefore he roundly made answer to Amylius: It is your youth, Sir, and your beauty, and (above all) your being a Roman, that makes you thus presumptuous. But I would wish ye to remember the League that ye have made with me, and to keep it: If ye do otherwise, I will make ye understand, that the Kingdom, and Name of Macedon is in matter of War, no less noble than the Roman: So he dismissed the Embassador; and had the Town immediately yielded to his discretion. The people had entertained a resolution, to have died every one of them, and let their Town on fire; binding themselves hereto by a fearful oath when Philip denied to accept them upon reasonable conditions. But having in desperate fight, once repelling him from the Breach, lost the greatest number of their Youth; it was thought meet by the Governors and Ancients of the City to change this resolution; and take such peace as could be gotten. So they carried out their Gold and Silver to Philip: about which, whilst they were busy, the memory of their oath wrought so effectually in the younger sort, that, by exhortation of the Priests, they fell to murdering their women, children, and themselves. Hereof the King had so little compassion, that he said, he would grant the Abydens three dayes leisure to die; and to that end forbade his men to enter the Town, or hazzard themselves in interrupting the violence of those mad souls.

The Romans decree War against Philip, and send one of their Consuls into Greece, as it were in defence of the Athenians their Confederates. How poor the Athenians were at this time both in quality and estate.

His calamity of the Abydens, was likened by the Romans unto that of the Saguntines: which indeed it nearly resembled; though Rome was not alike interested in the quarrel. But to help themselves with pretence for the War, they had found out another Saguntum, even the City of Abydos; which if the Macedonian should win, they rested there no more to do, than that he should presently embark himself for Italy, whither he would come, not as Hannibal from Saguntum, in five months, but in the short space of five days sailing. Thus P. Sulpicius the Consul told the multitude, when he exhorted them to make War upon Philip; which at his first propounding they had denied. The example of Pyrrhus was by him alledged; to shew, what Philip, with the power of a greater Kingdom, might dare to undertake: as also the fortunate voyage of Scipio into Africa; to shew the difference of making War abroad, and admitting it into the bowels of their own Country. By such arguments was the Commonalty of Rome indeed to believe, that this War with the Macedonian was both just and necessary. So it was decreed: and im-immediately the same Consul hastened away towards Macedonia, having that Province allotted unto him before, and all things in a readiness, by order from the Senate; who followed other Motives than the people must be acquainted with. Great thanks were given to the Athenian Embassadors, of their constancy (as was said) in not changing their faith at such times as they stood in danger of being besieged. And indeed great thanks were due to them, though not upon the same occasion. For the people of Rome had no cause to think it a benefit unto themselves, that any Greek Town, refusing to sue unto the Macedonian for peace, requested their help against him. But the Senate, intending to take in hand the Conquest of the Eastern parts, had reason to give thanks unto those, that ministered the occasion. Since therefore it was an untrue suggestion, that Philip was making ready for Italy: and since neither Attalus, the Rhodians, nor any other State in those quarters, desired the Romans to give them protection: these busy-headed Athenians, who falling out with the Acarnanians, and consequently with Philip, a matter of May-game, (as was shewed before) sent Embassadors into all parts of the World, even to Phoenicia of Egypt; and to the Romans, as well as to Attalus and others their neighbours; must be accepted as cause of the War, and Authors of the benefit thence redounding.

Nevertheless as it loves to fall out where the meaning differs from the pretence, the doings of P. Sulpitius the Consul were such, as might have argued Athens to be the least part of his care. He failed not about Peloponnesus, but took the ready way to Macedonia, and landing about the River of Apfus, between Dyrrhacium and Apollonia, there began the War. Soon upon his coming, the Athenian Embassadors were with him and craved his help: whereof they could make no benefit whilst he was far from them. They bemoaned themselves as men besieged, and intreated him to deliver them. For which cause he sent unto them C. Claudius with twenty Gallies, and a competent number of men: but the main of his forces he retained with him, for the prosecution of a greater design. The Athenians were not indeed besieged: only some Rivers from Chalch, in the Isle of Euboea, and some bands of adventures out of Corinth used to take their Ships, and spoil their fields, because they had declared themselves against King Philip, that was Lord of these two Towns. The robberies done by these Pyrats and Free-booters, were by the more eloquent than war-like Athenians, in this declining Age of their Fortune and Vertue, called a Siege. From such detriment the arrival of Claudius, and shortly after of three Rhodian Gallies, easily preserved them. As for the Athenians themselves, they that had been wont, in ancient times to undertake the conquests of Egypt, Cyprus, and Cilicia, to make War upon the great Persian King, and to hold so much of Greece in subjection, as made them redoubtable unto all the rest; had now no more than three Ships, and those open ones, not much better than long boats. Yet thought they not themselves inferior to the worse men, but stood as highly upon the glory and vertue of their Ancestors, as if it had been still their own.

The Town of Chalcis in Euboea taken and sacked by the Romans & their Associates, the lay in Garrison at Athens. Philip attempteth to take Athens by surprise, maketh the Country about, and makes a journey into Peloponnesus. Of Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedaemon; and his wife: Philip offers to make War against Nabis for the Achaeans. He returneth home through Attica, which he spoileth again: and provides against the Romans. Some exploits of the Romans. Divers Princes joyn with them. Great labouring to draw the Epirotes into the War.

Philip returning home from Attica, heard news of the Roman Consul his being about Apollonia. But ere he stirred forth to give him entertainment, or perhaps before he had well relolved, whether it were best a while to sit still, and try what might be done for obtaining of peace, or whether to make opposition, and resist these Invaders with all his forces: he received advertisement from Chalcis of a grievous mishap there befallen him, by procurement of the Athenians. For C. Claudius with his Romans, finding no such work at Athens as they had expected, or was answerable to the fame that went abroad, purposed to do somewhat that might quicken the War, and make his own employment better. He grew soon weary of sitting as a Scar-crow, to save the Athenians grounds from spoil; and therefore gladly took in hand a business of more importance. The Town of Chalcis was very negligently guarded by the Macedonian Souldiers therein, for that there was no Enemy at hand: and more negligently by the Towns-men, who reposed themselves upon their Garrison. Hereof Claudius having advertisement, failed thither by night, for fear of being descried: and arriving there a little before break of day, took it by Scalado. He used no mercy, but slew all that came in his way: and wanting men to keep it, (unless he should have left the heartless Athenians to their own defence) he set it on fire, consuming the Kings Magazines of Corn, and all provisions for War, which were plentifully filled. Neither were he and his Associates contented with the great abundance of spoil which they carried aboard their Ships, and with enlarging all those, whom Philip, as in a place of most security, kept there imprisoned: but to shew their despatch and hatred unto the King, they overthrew and brake in pieces the Statues to him there erected. This done, they hastened away towards Athens: where the news of their exploit was like to be joyfully welcomed. The King lay then at Demetria, about some 20. miles thence; whither then these tidings, or part of them, were brought him, though he saw that it was too late to remedy the matter; yet he made all haste to take revenge. He thought to have taken the Athenians, with their trusty friends, busie at work in ransacking the Town, and loading themselves with spoil: but they were gone before his coming. Five thousand light-armed foot he had with him, and three hundred horse: whereof leaving at Chalcis only a few to bury the dead, he marched from thence away speedily towards Athens: thinking it not impossible to take his enemies in the joy of their Victory, as full of negligence, as they had taken Chalcis. Neither had he much failed of his expectation, if a Foot-post that stood Scout for the City upon the borders, had not descried him afar off, and swiftly carried word of his approach to Athens. It was mid-night when this Post came thither: who found all the Town asleep, as fearless of any danger. But the Magistrates, hearing this report, caused a Trumpet out of their Citadel to sound the Alarm; and with all speed made ready for defence. Within a few hours Philip was there; who seeing the many lights, and other signs of busie preparation usual in such a case, understood that they had news of his coming; and therefore willed his men to repose themselves till it were day. It was indeed an Image to be made, lively representing her; and apparelled it with such costly garments as she used to wear. But it was indeed an Engine, serving to torment men. Hereof he made use, when he meant to try the vertue of his Rhetorick. For calling unto him some rich man, of whose money he was desirous; he would bring him into the kept of their own, besides the great multitude of Citizens; they adventured to issue forth at a gate, whereto they saw Philip make approach. The King was glad of this; reckoning all those his own, that were thus hardy. He therefore only willed his men to follow his example; and presently gave charge upon them. In that fight he gave singular proof of his valour; and beating down many of the Enemies with his own hands, drove them with great slaughter back into the City. The heat of his courage transported him further than discretion would have allowed, even to the very gate. But he retired without harm taking; for that they which were upon the Towers over the gates, could not use their casting weapons against him, without much endangering their own people that were thronging before him into the City. There was a temple of Hercules, a place of exercise, with a Grove, and many goodly Monuments besides, near adjoining unto Athens: of which he spared none; but suffered the rage of his anger to extend, even unto the sepulchres of the dead. The next day came the Romans, and some Companies of Attalus his men from Egina; too late in regard of what was already past; but in good time to prevent him of satisfying his anger to the full, which as yet he had not done. So he departed from thence to Corinth, and hearing that the Achaeans held a Parliament at Argos, he came thither to them unexpected.

The Achaeans were devising upon War: which they intended to make against Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedaemon: who being started up in the room of Machanidas, did greater mischief than any that went before him. This Tyrant relied wholly upon his mercenaries: and of his subjects had no regard. He was a cruel oppressor, a greedy extortioner upon those that lived under him; and one that in his natural condition smelt rankly of the Hangman. In these qualities, his wife Apege was very fitly matched with him; since his dexterity was no greater. In spoiling the men, then hers in fleeing their wives; whom the world never suffer to be at quiet, till they had presented her with all their jewels and apparel. Her husband was so delighted with her property, that he caused an Image to be made, lively representing her; and apparelled it with such costly garments as she used to wear. But it was indeed an Engine, serving to torment men. Hereof he made use, when he meant to try the vertue of his Rhetorick. For calling unto him some rich man, of whose money he was desirous; he would bring him into the room where this counterfeit Apaga stood, and there use all his art of persuasion, to get what he desired, as it were by good will. If he could not so speed, but was answered with excuses; then took he the refractory denier by the hand, and told him, that perhaps his Wife Apaga (who sat by in a Chair) could persuade more effectually. So he led him to the Image, that rose up and opened the arms, as it were for imbracement. Those arms were full of sharp iron nails, the like whereof was also sticking in the breasts, though hidden with her clothes: and here-with the griped the poor wretch, to the pleasure of the Tyrant, that laughed at his cruel death. Such, and worse (for it were long to tell all here that is spoken of him) was Nabbi in his government. In his dealings abroad he combined with the Ætoli-ans, as Manthanidas and Lycurgus had done before him. By these he grew into acquaintance with the Romans; and was comprehended in the League which they made with Philip, at the end of their former War. Of Philopamen's virtue he stood in fear: and therefore durst not provoke the Acheans, as long as they had such an able Commander. But when Cycliades, a far worse Captain, was their Prætor, and all, or the greatest part of their Mercenaries were discharged; Philopamen being also gone into Crete, to follow his beloved occupation of War; then did Nabbi fall upon their Territory; and waisting all the fields, made them distrust their own safety in the Towns.

Against this Tyrant the Acheans were preparing for War, when Philip came among them, and had set down what proportion of Souldiers every City of their Corporation should furnish out. But Philip willed them not to trouble themselves with the care of this business; forasmuch as he alone would ease them of this War, and take the burden upon himself. With exceeding joy and thanks they accepted of this kind offer. But then he told them, That whilst he made War upon Lacedæmon, he ought not to leave his own Towns unguarded. In which respect he thought they would be pleased to send a few men to Corinth, and some Companies into the Isle of Eubœa; that so he might securely pursue the War against Nabbi. Immediately they found out his device; which was none other, than to engage their Nation in his War against the Romans. Wherefore their Prætor Cycliades made him answer, That their Laws forbade them to conclude any other matters in their Parliament, than those for which it was assembled. So passing the Decree, upon which they had agreed before, for preparing War against Nabbi, he brake up the Assembly, with every mans good liking; whereas in former times, he had been thought no better than one of the Kings Parasites.

It grieved the King to have thus failed in his purpose with the Acheans. Nevertheless he gathered up among them a few Voluntaries; and so returned by Corinth back into Attica. There he met with Phibolus, one of his Captains, that with two thousand men had been doing what harm he might unto the Country. With this addition of strength, he attempted the Castle of Eleusis, the haven of Pireus, and even the City of Athens. But the Romans made such haste after him by Sea, thrusting themselves into every of these places; that he could no more than wreak his anger upon those goodly Temples, with which the Land of Attica was at that time singularly beautified. So he destroyed all the works of their notable Artificers, wrought in excellent Marble; which they had in plenty of their own: or having long ago been Masters of the Sea, had brought from other places, where best choice was found. Neither did he only pull all down: but caused his men to break the very Stones, that they might be unserviceable to their reparation. His loss at Chalcis being thus revenged upon Athens, he went home into Macedon; and there made provision, both against the Roman Consul that lay about Apollonia; and against the Dardanians, with other his bad neighbours, which were likely to infect him. Among his other cares, he forgot not the Ætoli-ans: to whose Parliament, shortly to be held at Naupactus, he sent an Embassy, requesting them to continue in his friendship. Thus was Philip occupied.

Sulpitius the Roman Consul encamped upon the River of Aspis. Thence he sent forth Apudius his Lieutenant, with part of the Army to waste the borders of Macedon. Apudius took sundry Castles and Towns; using such extremity of sword and fire at Antipatria, the first good Town which he won by force, that none durst afterwards make resistance, unless they knew themselves able to hold out. Returning towards the Consul with his spoil, he was charged in the Rear, upon the passage of a brook, by Athenagoras a Macedonian Captain: but the Romans had the better, and killing many of these enemies, took prisoners many more, to the increase of their booty, with which they arrived in safety at their Camp. The success of this Expedition, though it it were not great, yet served to draw into the Roman friendship those that had formerly no good inclination to the Macedonian. These were Pleuratus, the son of Scordilais the Illyrian: Aminander King of the Athamanians; and Bato the son of Longarus, Prince of the Dardanians. They offered their assistance unto the Consul, who thanked them: and said, That he would shortly make use of Pleuratus and Bato, when he entered into Macedon: but that the friendship of Aminander, whose Country lay between the Ætoli-ans and Thessaly, might be perhaps available with the Ætoli-ans, to stir them up against Philip.

So the present care was wholly set upon the Ætolian Parliament at hand. Thither came Embassadors from the Macedonian, Romans, and Athenians. Of which, the Macedonian spake first, and said: That as there was nothing fallen out, which should occasion the breach of peace between his Master and the Ætoli-ans; so was it to be hoped, that they would not suffer themselves, without good cause to be carried away after other mens fancies. He prayed them to consider, how the Romans heretofore, had made shew, as if their War in Greece tended only to the defence of the Ætoli-ans, and yet notwithstanding had been angry, that the Ætoli-ans, by making peace with Philip, had no longer need of such their Patronage. What might it be that made them so busy, in obtruding their protection upon those that needed it not? Surely it was even the general hatred, which these Barbarians bore unto the Greeks. For even after the same sort had they lent their help to the Mamertines: and afterwards delivered Syracuse, when it was oppressed by Carthaginian Tyrants; but now both Syracuse and Messana, were subject unto the Rods and Axes of the Romans. To the same effect he alledged many examples, adding, That in like sort it would happen to the Ætoli-ans: who if they drew such masters into Greece, must not look hereafter to hold, as now, free Parliaments of their own, wherein to consult about War and Peace: the Romans would ease them of this care, and send them such a Moderator, as went every year from Rome to Syracuse. Wherefore he concluded, that it was best for them, whilst as yet they might, and whilst one of them as yet could help the other, to continue in their League with Philip: with whom if at any time, upon light occasion, they hapned to fall out, they might as lightly be reconciled: and with whom they had three years ago made the peace which still continued; although that the very same Romans were then against it, who sought to break it now. It would have troubled the Romans, to frame a good answer to these objections. For the Macedonian had spoken the very truth, in shewing whereunto this their Patronage, which they offered with such importunity, did tend. Wherefore the Athenians were set on by them to speak next: who had store of eloquence, and matter of recrimination enough, to make Philip odious. These affirmed, that it was a great impudence in the Macedonian Embassador, to call the Romans by the name of Barbarians; knowing in what barbarous manner his own King had, in few days past, made War upon the gods themselves, by destroying all their Temples in Attica. Herewithal they made a pitiful rehearsal of their own calamities: and said, that if Philip might have his will, Ætolia, and all the rest of Greece, should feel the same that Attica had felt; yea, that Athens itself, together with Minerva, Jupiter, Ceres, and other of the gods, were like to have felt, if the Walls and the Roman arms had not defended them.

Then spake the Romans: who excusing, as well as they could, their own oppression of all those, in whose defence they had heretofore taken Arms, went roundly to the point in hand. They said, that they had of late made War in the Ætoli-ans behalf, and that the Ætoli-ans had without their consent made peace: whereof since the Ætoli-ans must excuse themselves, by alledging that the Romans, being busied with Carthage, wanted leisure to give them aid conveniently; so this excuse being now taken away, and the Romans wholly bent against their common Enemy, it concerned the Ætoli-ans to take part with them in their war and victory, unless they had rather perish with Philip.

It might easily be perceived, that they which were so vehement, in offering their help ere it was desired, were themselves carried unto the War by more earnest motives, than a simple desire to help those friends, with whom they had no great acquaintance. This may have been the cause, why Dorymachus the Ætolian Prætor shifted them off a while with a dilatory answer: though he told his Country-men, That by reserving themselves, till the matter were inclined one way or other, they might afterwards take part with those that had the better fortune. His answer was, first, in general terms; That over-much haste was an enemy to good counsel: for which cause they must further deliberate, ere they concluded. But coming nearer to the matter in hand, he passed a Decree, That the Prætor might at any time call an Assembly of the State, and therein conclude upon this business; any Law to the contrary notwithstanding: whereas otherwise it was unlawful to treat of such affairs, excepting two of their great Parliaments, that were held at set times.

§. XI.

The meeting of Philip with the Romans, and skirmishing with them on his borders. The Ætolians invade his Dominions, and are beaten home. Some doings of Attalus and the Roman Fleet.

Philip was glad to hear, that the Romans had sped no better in their solicitation of the Ætolians. He thought them hereby disappointed in the very beginning, of one great help; and meant himself to disappoint them of another. His son Perseus, a very boy, was sent to keep the Straights of Salonica against the Dardanians; having with him some of the Kings Council, to govern both him and his Army. It was judged, as may seem, that the presence of the Kings son, how young soever, would both encourage his Followers, and terrifie the Enemies, by making them at least believe, that he was not weakly attended. And this may have been the reason, why the same Perseus, a few years before this, was in like manner left upon the borders of Ætolia by his father; whom earnest business called thence another way. No danger of enemies being left on either hand; it was thought that the Macedonian Fleet under Heraclides, would serve to keep Attalus, with the Rhodiens and Romans, from doing harm by Sea, when the Kings back was turned: who took his journey Westward against Sulpicius the Consul.

The Armies met in the Country of the Disparietis, a people in the utmost borders of Macedon towards Illyria, about the Mountains of Candavia; that running along from Hemus in the North, until they join in the South with Pindus, inclose the Western parts of Macedon. Two or three dayes they lay in sight the one of the other, without making offer of battel. The Consul was the first that issued forth of his Camp into the open field. But Philip was not confident in the strength which he had then about him; and therefore thought it better to send forth some of his light-armed Mercenaries, and some part of horse, to entertain them with skirmish. These were easily vanquished by the Romans, and driven back into their Camp. Now although it was so, that the King was unwilling to hazzard all at first upon a Cast; and therefore sent for Perseus with his Companies, to increase his own forces: yet being no less unwilling to lose too much in reputation; he made shew a day after, as if he would have fought. He had found the advantage of a place fit for ambush, wherein he bestowed as many as he thought meet of his Targettiers: and so gave charge to Athenagoras, one of his Captains, to provoke out the Romans to fight, instructing both him and his Targettiers, how to behave themselves respectively, as opportunity should fall out. The Romans had no mistrust of any ambush, having fought upon the same ground a day before. Wherefore perhaps they might have sustained some notable detriment, if the Kings directions had been well followed. For when Athenagoras began to fall back, they charged him so hotly, that they drove him to an hasty flight, and pursued him as hard as they were able. But the Captains of the Targettiers, not staying to let them run into the danger, discovered themselves before it was time; and thereby made frustrate the work to which they were appointed. The Consul hereby gathered, that the King had some desire to try the fortune of a battel: which he therefore presented the second time: leading forth his Army, and setting it in order, with Elephants in the front: a kind of help which the Romans had never used before, but had taken these of late from the Carthaginians. Such are the alterations wrought by Time. It was scarce above fourscore years ere this, that Pyrrhus carried Elephants out of Greece into Italy, to affright the Romans, who had never seen any of those beasts before. But now the same Romans (whilst possibly some were yet alive, which had known that Expedition of Pyrrhus) came into Macedon, bringing Elephants with them: whereof the Macedonians and Greeks have none. Philip had patience to let the Consul brave him at his Trenches: wherein he did wisely for the Roman had greater need to fight, than he. Sulpicius was unwilling to lose time: neither could he without great danger, lying so near the Enemy, that was strong in horse, send his men to fetch in corn out of the fields. Wherefore he removed 8. miles off: presuming that Philip would not adventure to meet him on even ground: and so the more boldly he suffered his Forragers to over-run the Country. The King was nothing sorry of this; but permitted the Romans to take their good pleasure: eventill their presumption, and his own supposed fear, should make them careless. When this was come to pass, he took all his horse, and light-armed foot, with which he occupied a place in the mid-way, between the Forragers and their Camp. There he stayed in covert with part of his forces, to keep the passages that none should escape. The rest he sent abroad the Countrey, to fall upon the stragglers: willing them to put all to the sword, and let none run home with news to the Camp. The slaughter was great: and those which escaped the hands of them that were sent abroad to scowre the fields, lighted all or most of them upon the King and his companies in their flight: so as they were cut off by the way. Long it was ere the Camp had news of this. But in the end there escaped some: who though they could not make any perfect relation how the matter went: yet by telling what had hapned to themselves, raised a great multitude. Sulpicius hereupon sends forth all his horse, and bids them help their fellows where they saw it needful: He himself with the Legions followed. The companies of horse divided themselves, accordingly as they met with adventures upon the way, into many parts: not knowing where was most of the danger. Such of them as lighted upon Philip's Troops, that were canvassing the field, took their talk where they found it: But the main bulk of them fell upon the King himself. They had the disadvantage; as coming fatter, and unprepared, to one that was ready for them. So they were beaten away; as their fellows also might have been, if the King had well bethought himself, and given over in time. But while, not contented with such an harvest, he was too greedy about a poor gleaning; the Roman Legions appeared in sight: which emboldened their horse to make a re-charge. Then the danger apparent, enforced the Macedonians to look to their own safety. They ran which way they could: and (as men that lie in wait for others, are seldom heedful of that which may befall themselves) to escape the Enemy, they declined the fairest way; so as they were plunged in Marishes and Bogs, wherein many of them were lost. The Kings horse was slain under him: and there had been cast away, if a loving subject of his he had not alighted, mounted him upon his own horse, and delivered him out of peril, at the expence of his own life, that running on foot was overtaken and killed.

In the common opinion Philip was charged with improvident rashness; and the

Consul with as much dulness, for his dayes service. A little longer stay would have delivered the King from these enemies without any blow: since when all the fields about them were wasted, they must needs have retired back to the Sea. On the other side, it was not thought unlikely, That if the Romans following the King, had set upon his Camp, at such time as he fled thither, half amazed with either being slain or taken, they might have won it. But that noble Historian, Livie, (as is commonly his manner) hath judiciously observed, That neither the one, nor the other, were much to blame in this days work. For the main body of the Kings Army lay safe in his Camp; and could not be so astonished with the loss of two or three hundred horse, that it should therefore have abandoned the defence of the Trenches. And as for the King himself, he was advertised, that Perseus, the Illyrian, and the Dardanians, were fallen upon his Country; when they found the passage thercinto open, after Perseus was called away from custody of the Straights. This was it which made him adventure to do somewhat betimes; that he might let the Romans going the sooner, and afterwards look unto his troublesome neighbours. In consideration of this, Philip was desirous to clear himself of the Romans, as soon as he might. And to that purpose he sent unto the Consul, requesting a day of truce for burial of the dead. But instead of so doing, he marched away by night, and left fires in his Camp to beguile the enemy, as if he had not stirred out of the place. Sulpicius, when he heard of the Kings departure, was not slow to follow him. He overtook the Macedonians in a place of strength, which they had fenced (for it was a woody ground) by cutting down trees, and laying them athwart the way where it was most open. In making of such places good, the Macedonian Phalanx was of little use; being a square battel of pikes, not fit for every ground. The Archers of Crete were judged, and were indeed, more serviceable in that case. But they were few; and their arrows were of small force against the Roman shields. The Macedonians therefore helped them by flinging of stones. But to no purpose. For the Romans got within them, and forced them to quit the place. This Victory (such as it was) laid open unto the Consul some poor Towns thereabout; which partly were taken by strong hand, partly yielded for fear. But the spoil of these, and of the fields adjoining, was not sufficient to maintain his Army; and therefore he returned back to Apollonia.

The

The Dardanians, hearing that Philip was come back, withdrew themselves a pace out of the Country. The King sent Athenagoras to wait upon them home; whilst he himself went against the Atolians. For Damocritus the Prætor of the Atolians, who had reserved himself and his Nation unto the event of things, hearing report, that Philip was beaten once, and again: as also that Pleuratus and the Dardanians were fallen upon Macedon; grew no less busie on the sudden, than before he had been wise. He persuaded his Nation to take their time: and so, not staying to proclaim War, joynted his forces with Aminander the Atamani, and made invasion upon Theffaly. They took, and cruelly sacked a few Towns: whereby they grew confident; as if, without any danger, they might do what they listed. But Philip came upon then ere they looked for him: and killing them as they lay dispersed, was like to have taken their Camp, if Aminander more warie than the Atolians, had not helped at need, and made the Retreat through his own mountainous Country.

About the same time the Roman Fleet, assisted by Attalus and the Rhodians, had taken some small Islands in the Egean Sea. They took likewise the Town of Oreum in the Isle of Eubœa; and some other places thereabout. The Towns were given unto Attalus, after the same Compact that had formerly been made with the Atolians: the goods therein found were given unto the Romans: and the people, for slaves. Other attempts on that side were hindered: either by foul weather at Sea: or by want of daring, and of means.

§. XIII.

Villius the Roman Consul wastes a year to no effect. War of the Gauls in Italy. An Embassadour of the Romans to Carthage, Malanilla, and Vermina. The Macedonian prepares for defence, of his Kingdom: and T. Quintius Flaminius is sent against him.

Thus the time ran away: and P. Villius a new Consul, took charge of the War in Macedon. He was troubled with a mutiny of his oldest Souldiers: whereof two thousand, having served long in Sicil and Africk, thought themselves much wronged, in that they could not be suffered to look unto their own estates at home. They were (belike) of the Legions that had served at Cannæ: as may seem by their complaint, of having been long absent from Italy: whither say they would have returned, when by their Colonels they were shipped for Macedon. How Villius dealt with them, it is uncertain. For the History of his year is lost: whereof the mis is not great, since he did nothing memorable. Valerius Antius, as we finde in Livie, hath adorned this Villius with a great exploit against Philip. Yet since Livie himself, an Historian to whom few of the best are marchable, could finde no such thing recorded in any good Author: we may reasonably believe, that Villius his year was idle.

In the beginning of this Macedonian War, the Romans found more trouble than could have been expected with the Gauls. Their Colony of Placentia, a goodly and strong Town, which neither Hannibal, nor after him Adrubal, had been able to force: was taken by these Sarbarians, and burnt in a manner to the ground. In like sort Cremonia was attempted: but saved her self, taking warning, by her neighbours calamity. Amilcar a Carthaginian, that stayed behind Adrubal, or Mago in those parts: was now become Captain of the Gauls, in these their enterprizes. This when the Romans heard, they sent Embassadours to the Carthaginians: giving them to understand, that if they were not weary of the peace, they moved them to call home; and deliver up, this their Citizen Amilcar; who made War in Italy. Hereunto it was added (perhaps left the message might seem otherwise to have favoured a little of some fear) That of the fugitive slaves belonging to the Romans, there were some reported to walk up and down in Carthage: which if it were so, then ought they to be restored back to their Masters: as was conditioned in the late peace. The Embassadours that were sent on this errand, had further charge to treat with Masaniissa, as also with Vermina the son of Syphax. Unto Masaniissa, besides matter of complement, they were to signify what pleasure he might do them, by lending them some of his Numidian Horse, to serve in their War against the Macedonian. Vermina had entreated the Senate, to vouchsafe unto him the name of King: and promised thereafter to deserve it, by his readines in doing them all good offices. But they were somewhat scrupulous in the matter, and said, That having been, and being still (as they took it) their Enemy, He ought first of all to desire peace; for that the name of King, was an honour which they used not to confer upon any, save only upon such as had royally deserved it at their hands. The authority to make peace with him; was wholly committed unto these Embassadours, upon such termes as they should think fit; without further relation to the Senate and People: For they were then busied with greater cares. The Carthaginians made a gentle answer, That they wholly disclaimed Amilcar: banishing him, and confiscating his good. As for the Fugitives, they had restored as many as they could finde; and would in that point, as far as was requisite, give satisfaction to the Senate. Herewithal they sent a great proportion of Corn to Rome; and the like unto the Army that was in Macedon. King Masaniissa would have leapt unto the Romans two thousand of his Numidian horse: but they were contented with half the number; and would accept no more. Vermina met with the Embassadours, to give them entertainment, on the borders of his Kingdom; and without any disposition, agreed with them upon terms of peace.

Thus were the Romans busied in taking order for their Macedonian War, that they might pursue it strongly, and without interruption. As for Amilcar and his Gauls, they laid siege unto Cremonia; where L. Furius a Roman Prætor came upon them, fought a battle with them, and overcame them: Amilcar the Carthaginian died in this battle; and the fruit of the Victory was such, as both made amends for losses past, and left the work easie to those, that afterwards should have the managing of War among those Gauls. So was there good leisure to think upon the business of Macedon: where Philip was carefully providing to give contentment unto his Subjects, by punishing a bad Counsellor whom they hated; as also to assure unto himself the Acheans, by sending unto them some Towns that he held of theirs; and finally to strengthen his Kingdom, not only by exercising and training his people, but by fortifying the passages that led thereto out of Epirus. This was in doing when Villius, having unprofitably laboured to finde way into Macedon, taking a journey (as Sulpicius had done before him) wherein he could not be supplied with victuals, determined at length to trie a new course. But then came advertisement, that T. Quintius Flaminius was chosen Consul, and had Macedon allotted him for his Province; whose coming was expected; and he very shortly arrived at the Army.

§. XIII.

The Romans begin to make War by negotiation. T. Quintius wins a passage against Philip. Theffaly wasted by Philip. the Romans, and Atolians. The Acheans forsaking the Macedonian, take part with the Romans. A treaty of peace, that was quain, Philip delivers Argos to Nabis the Tyrant, who presently enters into League with the Romans.

The Romans had not been wont in former times, to make War after such a trifling manner. It was their use, to give battle to the enimie, as soon as they met with him. If he refused it, they besieged his Towns: and so forced him to try the fortune of a day, with his disadvantage in reputation, when he had long forbore it (as it would be interpreted) upon knowledge of his own weakness. But in this their War with Philip, they began to learn of the subtle Greeks, the art of Negotiation: wherein hitherto they were not grown so skilful, as within a little while they proved. Their Treasury was poor, and stood indebted, many years after this unto private men, for part of those moneys that had been borrowed in the second Punic War. This had made the Commonalty averse from the Macedonian War; and had thereby driven the Senators, greedy of the enterprize, to make use of their cunning. Yet being weary of the slow pace wherewith their business went forward, they determined to increase their Army, that they might have the less need to rely upon their Confederates. So they levied eight thousand Foot, and eight hundred Horse (the greater part of them, of the Latines) which they sent, with T. Quintius Flaminius, the new Consul, into Macedon. Their Navie, and other means could well have served, for the setting forth and transportation of a greater Army; but by straining themselves to the most of their ability, they should (besides other difficulties incident unto the sustenance of those that are too many and too far from home) have bred some jealousy in their friends of Greece, and thereby have lost some friends, yea, perhaps have increased the number of their enemies, more than of their own Souldiers. This present augmentation of the forces was very requisite; for that Attalus, about the same time, excused himself unto them by his Embassadour; requesting that either they would undertake the defence of his Kingdom against Antiochus, who invaded it; or else that they would not take it uncourteously;

courteously, that he quitted the War with Philip, and returned home, to look unto that which most concerned him. Their answer was remarkable. They said, That it was not their manner to use the aid of their friends, longer then their friends had good opportunity, and could also be well contented to afford it; That they could not honestly take part with Attalus, their good friend, though he were against Antiochus, whom they held in the like account; but, That they would deal with Antiochus by Embassadors, and (as common friends unto both of the Kings) do their best to persuade an atonement between them. In such loving fashion did they now carry themselves, towards their good friend the King Antiochus; who reciprocally at their intreaty, withdrew his Army from the Kingdom of Attalus. But how little they regarded these terms of friendship, after that once they had made an end with Philip, it will very soon appear.

Quintius having away from Rome, came betimes into his Province, with the supply decreed unto him; which consisted for the most part, of old Souldiers, that had served in Spain and Africa. He found Villius the Consul, (whom at his coming he presently discharged) and King Philip of Macedonia, encamped one against the other, in the Straights of Epirus, by the river of Apus; or Arax. It was manifest, that either the Romans must fetch a compass about, and seek their way into Macedon, through the poor Country of the Dassaretians; or else win, by force, that passage which the King defended. In taking the former way, they had already two years together mis-spent their time; and been forced to return back without profit, for want of victuals: whereof they could neither carry with them store sufficient, nor find it on the way. But if they could once get over these Mountains, which divided the South of Epirus from Thessaly, then should they enter into a plentiful Country; and, which by long dependance on the Macedonians, was become (in a manner) part of his Kingdom, whereof it made the South border: Nevertheless, the desire of winning this passage, was greater than the likelihood. For the river of Apus running along through that valley which alone was open between the Mountains, made it all a deep Marish and unpassable Bogge: a very narrow way excepted, and a path cut out of the main rock by man's hand. Wherefore Quintius assailed to climb in the Mountains; but finding himself disappointed of this hope, through the diligence of his enemy, who neglected not the guard of them that was very easie; he was compelled to sit still, without doing any thing for the space of forty dayes.

This long time of rest gave hope unto Philip, that the War might be ended by composition, upon some reasonable terms. He therefore to deal with some of the Epirians, (among whom he had many friends) that He and the Consul had a meeting together. But nothing was effected. The Consul would have him to set all Towns of Thessaly at liberty; and make amends for the last of his late Wars. Philip was contented to give liberty to those whom he had subdued of late; but unto such, as had been long subjects to him and his Ancestors. He thought it against all reason, that he should relinquish his claim and dominion over them. He also said, That as far forth as it should appear that he had done wrong unto any Town or people whatsoever, he could well be pleased to make such amends, as might seem convenient in the judgement of some free State; that had not been interested in those quarrels. But herewithal Philip was not satisfied. There needed (he said) no judgement or compromise, forasmuch as it was apparent, that Philip had always been the invader; and had not made war, as one provoked, in his own defence. After this altercation, when they should come to particulars: and when the Consul was required to name those Towns, that he would have to be set at liberty: the first that he named were the Thessalians. These had been subjects (though conditional) unto the Macedonian Kings, ever since the dayes of Alexander the Great, and of Philip his Father. Wherefore, as soon as Flaminius had named the Thessalians, the King in a rage demanded what sharper condition he would have laid upon him, had he been but vanquished. And herewithal abruptly he flang away: refusing to hear any more of such discourse.

After this the Consul strove in vain two or three dayes together, to have prevailed against the difficulties of that passage which Philip kept. When he had well wearied himself, and could not resolve what course to take: there came to him an Heathen sent from Charopus a Prince of the Epirians that favoured the Romans, who having long kept beasts in those Mountains, was thoroughly acquainted with all by-paths, and therefore undertook to guide the Romans, without any danger, to a place where they should have advantage of the Enemy. This guide, for fear of treacherous dealing, was fast bound: and being promised a great reward, in case he made good his word, had such Companies as was thought fit, appointed to follow his directions. They travelled by night (it being then about the full of the Moon) and rested in the day-time, for fear of being discovered. When they had recovered the hill-tops; and were above the Macedonians (though undiscovered by them, because at their banks) they raised a great tumult, whereby they gave notice of their success unto the Consul. Some skirmishes, whilst these were on their journey, T. Quintius had held with the Macedonians; thereby to avert him from thought of that which was intended. But when on the third morning he saw the smoke arise more and more plainly, and thereby knew that his men had attained unto the place whither they were sent, he pressed as near as he could unto the Enemy's Camp, and assailed them in their strength. He prevailed as little as in former times, until the shoutings of those that ran down the hill, and charged Philip on the back, astonished the Macedonians, that they betook themselves unto flight. The King, upon first apprehension of the danger, made all speed away to save himself. Yet anon considering, that the difficulty of the passage must needs hinder the Romans from pursuing him: he made a stand at the end of five miles, and gathered there together his broken troops, of whom he found wanting no more than two thousand men. The greatest loss was of his Camp and provisions: if not rather perhaps of his reputation: for that now the Macedonians began to stand in fear, lest being driven from a place of such advantage, they should hardly make good their party against the Enemy upon equal ground. Neither was Philip himself much better perfwaded. Wherefore he caused the Thessalians, as many of them as in his hasty retreat he could visit, to forsake their Towns and Country, carrying away with them as much as they were able, and spoiling all the rest. But all of them could not be perfwaded, thus to abandon (for the pleasure of their King) their ancient habitations, and all the substance which they had gotten. Some there were that forcibly resisted him; which they might the better do, for that he could not stay to use any great compulsion. He also himself took it very grievously, that he was driven to make such waste of a most pleasant and fruitful Country, which had ever been well affected unto him: so that a little hindrance did serve, to make him break off his purpose, and

withdraw himself home into his Kingdom of Macedon.

The Etolians and Athamanians, when this fell out, were even in a readiness to invade Thessaly: whereinto the ways lay more open, out of their several Countries. When therefore they heard for certainty, that Philip was beaten by the Romans: they forefollowed not the occasion, but made all speed, each of them to lay hold upon what they might. T. Quintius followed them within a little while: but they had gotten so much before his coming, that he, in gleaming after their harvest, could not find enough to maintain his Army. Thus were the poor Thessalians, of whose liberty the Romans a few days since had made them to be very desirous, wasted by the same Romans and their Confederates; not knowing which way to turn themselves, or whom to avoid. T. Quintius won Phaleria by assault: Metropolis and Piera yielded unto him. Rhage he besieged: and having made a fair breach, yet was unable to force it: so stoutly it was defended both by the Inhabitants, and by a Macedonian garrison therein. Philip also at the same time, having somewhat recollected his spirits, hovered about Tempe with his Army, thrusting men into all places; that were like to be distressed. So the Consul, having well near spent his victuals, and seeing no hope to prevail at Rhage: brake up his siege, and departed out of Thessaly. He had appointed his Ships of burden to meet him at Anticyra, an Haven Town of Phocia, on the Gulph of Corinth: which Country being friend to the Macedonian, he presently invaded; not so much for hatred unto the people, as because it lay conveniently seated between Thessaly and other regions, where in he had business, or was shortly like to have. Many Towns in Phocia he won by assault: many were yielded up unto him for fear; and within short space he had (in effect) mastered it all.

In the mean time L. Quintius the Consul's brother, being then Admiral for the Romans in this War, joyned with King Attalus and the Rhodian Fleet. They won two Cities in Euboea; and afterward laid siege unto Cenchræe, an Haven and Arceval of the Corinthians on their Eastern Sea. This enterprise did somewhat help forward the Athamanians, in their desire to leave the part of Philip; since it might come to pass, that Corinth itself, ere long time were spent; and that Cenchræe, with other places appertaining to Corinth, now very shortly should be rendered unto their Nation, by favour of the Romans.

courteously, that he quitted the War with Philip, and returned home, to look unto that which most concerned him. Their answer was remarkable. They said, That it was not their manner to use the aid of their friends, longer than their friends had good opportunity, and could also be well contented to afford it; That they could not honestly take part with Attalus, their good friend, though he were against Antiochus, whom they held in the like account; but, That they would deal with Antiochus by Embassadors, and (as common friends unto both of the Kings) do their best to persuade an atonement between them. In such loving fashion did they now carry themselves, towards their good friend the King Antiochus; who reciprocally at their intreaty, withdrew his Army from the Kingdom of Attalus. But how little they regarded these terms of friendship, after that once they had made an end with Philip, it will very soon appear.

L. Quintius having away from Rome, came betimes into his Province, with the supply decreed unto him; which consisted for the most part, of old Souldiers, that had served in Spain and Africa. He found Villius the old Consul; (whom at his coming he presently discharged) and King Philip of Macedon, encamped one against the other, in the Streights of Epirus; by the river of Apfus; or Arfus. It was manifest, that either the Romans must fetch a compass about, and seek their way into Macedon, through the poor Country of the Dassaretians; or else win, by force, that passage which the King defended. In taking the former way, they had already two years together mis-spent their time; and been forced to return back without profit, for want of victuals: whereof they could neither carry with them store sufficient, nor find it on the way. But if they could once get over these Mountains, which divided the South of Epirus from Thessaly, then should they enter into a plentiful Country; and, which by long dependance on the Macedonians, was become (in a manner) part of his Kingdom, whereof it made the South border! Nevertheless, the desire of winning this passage, was greater than the likelihood. For the river of Apfus running along through that valley which alone was open between the Mountains, made it all a deep Marish and unpassable Bogge; a very narrow way excepted, and a path cut out of the main rock by mans hand. Wherefore Quintius assailed to climb in the Mountains: but finding himself disappointed of this hope, through the diligence of his enemy, who neglected not the guard of them that was very easie; he was compelled to sit still, without doing any thing for the space of forty dayes.

This long time of rest gave hope unto Philip, that the War might be ended by composition, upon some reasonable terms. He therefore to deal with some of the Epirians, (among whom he had many friends) that he and the Consul had a meeting together. But nothing was effected. The Consul would have him to set all Towns of Thessaly at liberty; and make amends for the Injuries, which he had done to many people in his late Wars. Philip was contented to give liberty to those whom he had subdued of late; but unto such, as had been long subject unto him and his Ancestors, he thought it against all reason, that he should relinquish his claim and dominion over them. He also said, That as far forth as it should appear that he had done wrong unto any Town or people whatsoever, he would be pleased to make such amends, as might seem convenient in the judgement of some free State; that had not been interested in those quarrels. But herewithal Quintius was not satisfied. There needed (he said) no judgement or compromise, forasmuch as it was apparent, that Philip had always been the Invader; and had not made War, as one provoked, in his own defence. After this altercation, when they should come to particulars; and when the Consul was required to name those Towns, that he would have to be set at liberty: the first that he named were the Thessalians. The greatest loss was of his Camp and provisions: if not rather perhaps of his reputation: for that now the Macedonians began to stand in fear, left being driven from a place of such advantage, they should hardly make good their party against the Enemy, upon equal ground. Neither was Philip himself much better persuaded. Wherefore he caused the Thessalians, as many of them as in his hasty retreat he could visit, to forsake their Towns and Country, carrying away with them as much as they were able, and spoiling all the rest. In the mean time L. Quintius the Consul's brother, being then Admiral for the Romans in this War, joyned with King Attalus and the Rhodian Fleet. They won two Cities in Euboea; and afterward laid siege unto Cenchree, an Haven and Arcenal of the Corinthians on their Eastern Sea. This enterprise did somewhat help forward the *Achaean*s, in their desire to leave the part of Philip; since it might come to pass, that Corinth itself, ere long time were spent; and that Cenchree, with other places appertaining to Corinth, now very shortly should be rendered unto their Nation, by favour of the Romans.

But there were other motives, inducing the Acheans to prefer the friendship of the Romans, before the patronage of Philip; whereto they had been long accustomed. For this King had so many ways offended them in time of peace, that they thought it best course to rid their hands of him, whilst being intangled in a dangerous War, he wanted means to hinder the execution of such counsel as they should hold the safest. His tyrannous practices to make himself their absolute Lord: his poisoning of Aratus their old Governour: his false dealing with the Messinians, Epirots, and other people their Confederates: and his own dependants: together with many particular outrages by him committed: caused them long since to hold him as a necessary evil, even whilst they were unable to be without his assistance. But since by the virtue of Philopemen, they were grown somewhat confident in their own strength: so as without this Macedonian help they could as well subsist, as having him to friend: then did they only think how evil he was; and thereupon rejoice the more, in that he was become no longer necessary. It angered him to perceive how they stood affected: and therefore he sent murderers to take away the life of Philip. But failing in this enterprize; and being detected, he did thereby only set fire to the Wood, which was thoroughly dry before, and prepared to burn. Philopemen wrought so with the Acheans, that no discourse was more familiar with them, than what great cause they had to withdraw themselves from the Macedonian. Cycladus, a principal man among them: and lately their Prætor, was expelled by them: for shewing himself passionate in the cause of Philip; and Aristodemus, chosen Prætor, who laboured to joyn them as Citizens with the Romans.

These news were very welcome to Quintus. Embassadors were sent from the Romans and their Confederates, King Attalus, the Rhodians and Athenians, to treat with the Acheans, making promise, that they should have Corinth restored unto them, if they would forsake the Macedonian. A Parliament of the Acheans was held at Syracusa, to deliberate and resolve in this weighty cause. Therein the Romans and their adherents desired the Acheans to joyn with them in making War upon Philip. Contrariwise, the Embassadors of Philip, whom he had also sent for this business, admonishing the Acheans of their Alliance with the King, and of their faith due unto him, requested them, that they would be contented to remain as Neuters. This moderate request of Philip Embassadors, did no way advance their Masters cause. Rather it gave the Acheans to understand, That he, who could be satisfied with so little at their hands, knew himself unable to gratifie them in any reciprocal demand. Yet were there many in that great Council, who remembering the benefits of Philip and Antigonus, laboured earnestly for the preservation of the ancient League. But in fine, the scale of life injuries, and expectations of like or worse from him in the future, prevailed against the memory of those old good turns, which he (and Antigonus before him) had partly sold unto them, and partly had used as baits, whereby to allure them into absolute subjection. Neither was it perhaps of the least importance, That the Romans were strong, and likely to prevail in the end. So after much altercation, the Decree was passed, That they should thenceforward renounce the Macedonian, and take part with his enemies in this War. With Attalus and the Rhodians they forthwith entered into society; with the Romans (because no League would be of force, until the Senate and people had approved it) they forsook to decree any society at the present: until the return of those Embassadors from Rome, which they determined to send thither of purpose. The Megalopolitans, Dymeans, and Argives, having done their best for the Macedonian, as by many respects they were bound, rose up out of the Council, and departed before the passing of the Decree; which they could not resist, nor yet with honesty thereto give assent. For this their good will, and greater, which they shortly manifested, the Argives had so little thank, that all the rest of the Acheans may be the better held excused, for escaping how they might, out of the hands of so fell a Prince.

Soon after this, upon a solemn day at Argos, the affection of the Citizens discovered itself so plainly, in the behalf of Philip, that they which were his Partisans within the Town, made no doubt of putting the City into his hands, if they might have any small assistance. Philotes, a Lieutenant of the King, lay then in Corinth, which he had manfully defended against the Romans and Attalus. Him the Conspirators drew to Argos; whither coming on a sudden, and finding the multitude ready to joyn with him, he easily compelled the Achean Garrison to quit the place.

This getting of Argos, together with the good defence of Corinth, and some other Towns, as it helped Philip a little in his reputation, so they gave him hope to obtain

some good end by Treaty, whilst as yet with his honour he might seek it: and when (the Winter being now come on) a new Consul would shortly be chosen, who should take the work out of Titus his hands, if it were not concluded the sooner. Titus had the like respect unto himself; and therefore thought it best, since more could not be done, to pre-dispose things unto a Conclusion, for his own reputation. The meeting was appointed to be held on the Sea-shore, in the Bay then called the Melian, or Lamiæan Bay, now (as is supposed) the Gulf of Zitoni, in the Ægean Sea, or Archipelago. Thither came Titus with Animander the Albanian, an Embassador of Attalus; the Admiral Rhodes; and some Agents for the Ætolians and Acheans. Philip had with him some few of his own Captains, and Cycladus, lately banished for his sake out of Achaia. He refused to come on shore: though fearing (as he said none but the immortal Gods: yet misdoubting some treachery in the Ætolians. The demands of Titus in behalf of the Romans were, That he should set all Cities of Greece at liberty: deliver up to the Romans and their Confederates, all prisoners which he had of theirs, and Renegadoes; likewise whatsoever he held of theirs in Ulyria: and whatsoever about Greece or Asia he had gotten from Ptolemy then King of Egypt, after his fathers death. Attalus demanded restitution to be made, entire of Ships, Towns, and Temples by him taken and spoiled in the late War between them. The Rhodians would have again the Country of Peræa, lying over against their Island; as also that he should withdraw his garrisons out of divers Towns about the Hælespont, and other Havens of their friends. The Acheans desired restitution of Argos and Corinth: about the one of which they might, not unjustly, quarrel with him; the other had been long his own by their consent. The Ætolians took upon them angrily, as Patrons of Greece: willing him to depart out of it, even out of the whole Country, leaving it free; and without to deliver up unto them, whatsoever he held that had at any time been theirs. Neither were they herewithal content: but insolently declaimed against him, for that which he had lately done in Thessaly; corrupting (as they said) the rewards of the Victors, by destroying, when he was vanquished, those Towns, which else they might have gotten. To answer these malapart Ætolians, Philip commanded his Gally to be rowed nearer the shore. But they began to pite him afresh: telling him that he must obey his betters, unless he were able to defend himself by force of Arms. He answered them (as he was much given to gybing) with sundry scoffs; and especially with one, which made the Roman Consul understand what manner of companions these Ætolians were. For he said, That he had often dealt with them; as likewise the best of the Greeks; desiring them to abrogate a wicked law, which permitted them to take spoil from spoil: yet could he get no better an answer, than that they would sooner take Ætolia out of Ætolia. Titus wondered what might be the meaning of this strange Law. So the King told him, That they held it a laudable custom, as often as War happened between their friends, to hold up the quarrel, by sending Voluntaries to serve on both sides, that should spoil both the one and the other. As for the liberty of Greece, he said it was strange, that the Ætolians should be so careful thereof, since divers Tribes of their own, which he there named, were indeed no Grecians: wherefore he would fain know, whether the Romans would give him leave to make slaves of those Ætolians, which were no Greeks. Titus hereat smiled, and was no whit offended, to hear the Ætolians well rated up; touching whom he began to understand, how odious they were in all the Country. As for that general demand of setting all Greece at liberty, Philip acknowledged, that it might well seem that greatnels of the Romans; though he would also consider, what might becom his own dignity. But that the Ætolians, Rhodians, and other petty Estates, should thus presume, under countenance of the Romans; to take upon them, as if by their great might he should be therunto compelled: it was, he said, a strange and ridiculous insolence. The Acheans he charged with some ingratitude; reciting against them some Decrees of their own; wherein they had laden both Antigonus and him, with more than humane honours. Nevertheless, he said, that he would render Argos unto them: but as touching Corinth, that he would further deliberate with Titus himself. Thus he addressed himself wholly to the Roman General; unto whom if he could give satisfaction, he cared little for all the rest. With Attalus and the Rhodians, his late War (he said) was only defensive; they having been the offenders: or if he gave them any occasion, it was only in helping Prusias, his son-in-law; neither did he see why they should rather seek amends at his hands, than he at theirs. For, whereas they complained, that spoiling a Temple of Jove, he had cut down the Grove, and pleasant walks there-thereabouts: what could he do more, than send Gardners thither with young plants; if one King of another would stand to ask such recompence? Thus he jested the matter out: but offered nevertheless, in honour of the Romans, to give back the Region of Peræa to the Rhodian; as likewise to Attalus, the Ships and Prisoners of his, whereof he had then possession. Thus ended that dayes conference, because it was late: Philip requiring a nights leisure to think upon the Articles, which were many, and he ill provided of Counsel, wherewith to advise about them. For your being so ill provided of Counsel (said Titus) you may even thank your self, as having murdered all your friends, that were wont to advise you faithfully. The next day Philip came not, until it was late at night, excusing his long stay by the weightiness of the things propounded; whereon he could not suddenly tell how to resolve. But it was believed, that he thereby sought to abridge the Ætolians of leisure to rail at him. And this was the more likely, for that he desired conference in private with the Roman General. The sum of his discourse, as Titus afterward related it, was, That he would give the Achaens both Argos and Corinth; as also that he would render unto Attalus; and the Rhodian what he had promised the day before; likewise to the Ætolians, that he would grant some part of their demands; and to the Romans, whatsoever they did challenge. This when Titus his associates heard, they exclaimed against it, saying, That if the King were suffered to retain any thing in Greece, he would shortly get possession of all which he now rendred up. The noise that they made came to Philips ear: who thereupon desired a third day of meeting; and protested, that if he could not persuade them, he would suffer himself to be perfwaded by them. So the third day they met early in the morning: at what time the King intreated them all, that they would with sincere affection hearken unto good offers of peace; and immediately conclude it, if they could like well of those Conditions which he had already tendered; or otherwise, that they would make truce with him for the present, and let him send Embassadors to Rome, where he would refer himself to the courtlie of the Senate.

This was even as Quintius would have it: who stood in doubt, lest a new Consul might happen to defraud him of the honour, which he expected by ending of the War. So he easily prevailed with the rest to assent herunto: forasmuch as it was Winter, a time unfit for service in the War; and since, without authority of the Senate, he should be unable to proceed resolutely, either in War or Peace. Further, he willed them to send their several Embassadors to Rome, which intimating unto the Senate what each of them required, should easily hinder Philip from obtaining any ship to their prejudice. Among the rest, he perswaded King Aminander to make a journey to Rome in person: knowing well, that the name of a King, together with the consequence of so many Embassadors, would serve to make his own actions more glorious in the City. All this tended to procure that his own command of the Army in Greece might be prorogued. And to the same end had he dealt with some of the Tribunes of the people at Rome, who had already (though as yet he knew not so much) obtained it for him, partly by their authority, partly by good reasons which they alleged unto the Senate.

The Embassadors of the Greeks, when they had audience at Rome, spake bitterly against the King, with good liking of the Senate; which was more desirous of Victory, than of satisfaction. They magnified the honourable purpose of the Romans, in undertaking to let Greece at liberty. But this (they said) could never be effected: unless special care were taken, that the King should be dispossessed of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias. In this point they were so vehement, producing a Map of the Country, and making demonstration how those places held all the rest in servility; that the Senate agreed to have it even so as they desired. When therefore the Embassadors of Philip were brought in, and began to have made a long Oration; they were briefly cut off in the midst of their Preface, with this one demand: Whether their Master would yield up Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias. Hereto they made answer, That concerning those places, the King had given them no direction or commission what to say or do. This was enough. The Senate would no longer hearken to Philip's desire of peace: wherein they said he did no better than trifle. Yet might his Embassadors have truly said, That neither the Ætolians, Achaens, nor any of their fellows, had in the late Treaty required by name, that Chalcis and Demetrias should be yielded up. For which of them indeed could make any claim to either of these Towns? As for Corinth, whereto the Achaens had some right; (though their right was no better, than that, having stoln it from one Macedonian King in a night, they had, after mature deliberation, made it away away by bargain unto another) Philip had already concended to give it back unto them. And this perhaps would have been alledged, even against the Greeks, in excuse of the King, by some of T. Quintius his friends; that so he might have had honour to conclude the War, if a successor had been decreed unto him. But since he was appointed to continue General: neither his friends at Rome, nor he himself, after the return of the Embassadors into Greece, cared to give ear unto any talk of peace.

Philip seeing that his Achaens had forsaken him, and joyned with their common enemies; thought even to deal with them in the like manner, by reconciling himself unto Nabis, whom they hated most. There were not many years past, since the Lacedæmonians under Cleomenes, with little other help than their own strength, had been almost strong enough both for the Macedonians and Achaens together. But now the condition of things was altered. Nabis his force consisted, in a manner, wholly in his Mercenaries: for he was a Tyrant, though styling himself King. Yet he sorely vexed the Achaens: and therefore seemed to Philip one likely to stand him in great stead, if he could be won. To this purpose it was thought meet, that the Town of Argos, which could not otherwise be easily defended, should be conveyed over into his hands; in hope, that such a benefit would serve to tie him fast unto the Macedonian. Philocrates the Kings Lieutenant, who was appointed to deal with Nabis, added further, That it was his Masters purpose to make a straight alliance with the Lacedæmonian, by giving some daughters of his own in marriage unto Nabis his sons. This could not but be well taken. Yet Nabis made some scruple in accepting the Town of Argos; unless by decree of the Citizens themselves he might be called into it. Hereabout Philocrates dealt with the Argives: but found them so averse, that, in open assembly of the people, they detested the very name of the Tyrant, with many railing words. Nabis hearing of this, thought he had thereby a good occasion to rob and fleece them. So he willed Philocrates, without more ado, to make over the Town which he was ready to receive. Philocrates accordingly did let him with his Army into it by night; and gave him possession of the strongest places therein. Thus dealt Philip with the Argives: who for very love had forsaken the Achaens, to take his part. Early in the morning, the Tyrant made himself master of all the gates. A few of the principal men, understanding how things went, fled out of the City at the first tumult. Wherefore they were all banished, and their goods confiscated. The rest of the chief Citizens that stayed behind, were commanded to bring forth, out of hand, all their Gold and Silver. Also a great imposition of money was laid upon all those that were thought able to pay it. Such as made their contribution readily, were dismissed without more ado. But if any stood long upon the matter: or played the thieves in purloining their own goods: they were put to the whip, and besides loss of their wealth, had their tortments to boot. This done, the Tyrant began to make popular laws: namely, such as might serve to make him gracious with the rascal multitude: abrogating all debts, and dividing the lands of the rich among the poor. By such art of oppressing the great ones, it hath been an old custom of Tyrants, to assure themselves of the Vulgar for a time.

As soon as Nabis had gotten Argos, He sent the news to T. Quintius and others to joyn with him against Philip. Titus was glad of it: so as he took the pains to cross over the Straights into Peloponnesus, there to meet with Nabis. They had soon agreed (though King Attalus who was present with the Consul, made some cavil touching Argos) and the Tyrant lent unto the Roman, six hundred of his Mercenaries of Crete: as also he agreed with the Achaens, upon a Truce for four months, reserving the final conclusion of peace between them until the War of Philip should be ended; which after this continued not long.

§. XIV.

The battel at Cynosephale, wherein Philip was vanquished by T. Quintius.

Titus Quintius, as soon as he understood that he was appointed to have command of the Army, without any other limitation of time, than during the pleasure of the Senate; made all things ready for diligent pursuit of the War. The like did Philip: who having failed in his negotiation of peace, and no less failed in his hopes of getting Nabis to friend in that War, meant afterwards wholly to rely upon himself.

Titus had in his Army about six and twenty thousand: and Philip a proportionable number. But neither of them knew the other's strength, or what his Enemy intended to do. Only Titus heard that Philip was in the Theſſaly, and thereupon addreſſed himſelf to ſeck him out. They had like to have met unawares, near unto the City of Phere: where the vant-currers on both ſides diſcovered each other; and ſent word thereof unto their ſeveral Captains. But neither of them were over-haſty to commit all to hazard upon ſo ſhort warning. The day following each of them ſent out three hundred Horſe, with as many light-armed Foot, to make a better diſcovery. Theſe met, and fought a long while: returning finally back into their ſeveral Camps, with little advantage unto either ſide. The Country about Phere was thick ſet with trees: and otherwiſe full of gardens and mud-walls; which made it unproper for the ſervice of the Macedonian Phalanx. Wherefore the King diſlodged, intending to remove back into Scotſa, in the Frontier of Macedon; where he might be plentifully ſerved with all neceſſaries. Titus conceived aright his meaning: and therefore purpoſed alſo to march thitherwards; were it only to waſte the Country. There lay between them a great ledge of hills, which hindered the one from knowing what courſe the other took. Nevertheless they encamped not far aſunder, both the firſt and the ſecond night; though neither of them underſtood what was become of the other. The third day was very tempeſtuous; and forced each of them to take up his lodging where he found it by chance. Then ſent they forth diſcoverers again, in greater number than before. Theſe meeting together, held a long fight, wherein at firſt the Macedonians had the worſe. But Philip anon ſent in ſuch ſtrong ſupply; that if the reſiſtance of the Ætolians had not been deſperate, the Romans their fellows had been driven back into their Camp. Yet all reſiſtance notwithstanding, the Macedonians prevailed: ſo that Titus himſelf was fain to bring forth his Legions, that were not a little diſcouraged, by the defeat of all their Horſe, to animate thoſe which were in flight.

It was altogether beſides the Kings purpoſe to put the fortune of a battel in truſt that day, with ſo much of his Eſtate as might thereon depend. But the news came to him thick and tumultuouſly; how the enemies fled, and how the day was his own, if he could uſe an occaſion, the like whereof he ſhould not often find. This cauſed him to alter his purpoſe: inſomuch as he embattel- led his men; and climbed up thoſe hills, which, for that the knops thereon had ſome reſemblance unto Dogs heads, were called, by a word ſignifying as much, Cynocephale.

As ſoon as he was on the hill-top; it did him good to ſee that they of his own light armature were buſie in fight, almoſt at the very Camp of the Enemies; whom they had repelled ſo far. He had alſo liberty to chooſe his ground; as might ſerve beſt his advantage; forſomuch as the Romans were quite driven from all parts of the Hill. But of this commodity he could make no great uſe: the roughneſs of the place among thoſe Dogs heads, as they were called, ſerving nothing aptly for his Phalanx. Nevertheless he found convenient room, wherein to marſhall the one part of his Army; and gave order unto his Captains, to follow with the reſt, embattelling them as they might. Whileſt he was doing this, He perceived that his Horſemen and light armature began to ſhrink; as being fallen upon the Roman Legions; by force whereof they were driven to recoyle. He ſets forward to help them: and they no leſs haſtily draw unto him for ſuccour; having the Romans not far behind them.

As the Legions began to climb the Hill, Philip commanded thoſe of his Phalanx to charge their pikes, and entertain them. Here Titus found an extremum difficult piece of work. For this Phalanx being a great ſquare battel of armed pikes; like in all points to thoſe which are now uſed in our modern Wars; and being in like manner uſed, as are ours; was not to be reſiſted by the Roman Targettiers, as long as the Phalanx it ſelf held together undiſſolved. The Macedonians were embattelled in very cloſe order: ſo that two of them ſtood oppoſite to one of the Romans; as alſo the pikes of the firſt rank had their points advanced two or three foot before their fore-man. Wherefore it is no marvel if the Romans gave back: every one of them being troubled (as it were) with ten enemies at once; and not able to come nearer to the next of them, than the length of a dozen foot, or thereabout. Titus finding this, and not knowing how to remedy it, was greatly troubled: for that ſtill the Phalanx bare down all which came in the way. But in the mean while he obſerved, That they which were appointed by Philip to make his left wing, were not able through the much unevenneſs of the ground, to put themſelves in order: ſo as either they kept their places on the Hill-tops; or elſe (which was worſe) upon deſire either of beholding the paſſage, or of ſeeming to be partakers in the work, ran fooliſhly along by the ſide of their fellows, which were occupied in fight.

Of this their diſorder he made great and preſent uſe. He cauſed the right wing of his battel to march up the Hill againſt theſe ill-ordered troops: his Elephants leading the way, to increaſe the terror. The Macedonians were readier to diſpute what ſhould be done in ſuch a caſe, than well advised what to do; as having no one man appointed to command that part in chief. Indeed if they ſhould have done their beſt, it could not have ſerved; ſince the ground whereon they ſtood, made their weapons uſeleſſe. For let it be ſuppoſed, that Philip having ſix and twenty thouſand in his Army (as he is ſaid to have been equal to the Enemy in number) had four thouſand Horſe, four thouſand Targettiers, and four thouſand light-armed; ſo ſhall there remain fourteen thouſand Pikes: whereof himſelf had embattelled the one half in a Phalanx; the other half in the left wing, are they whom Quintus is ready now to charge. The Phalanx having uſually ſixteen in File, muſt, when it conſiſted of ſeven thouſand, have well-near four hundred and forty in rank; but four hundred would ſerve, to make a front long enough; the other forty or ſeven and thirty Files might be cut off, and reckoned in the number of the Targettiers, or light-armed. Allowing therefore, Philip to have ſixteen thouſand in all, to every man of them three foot of ground: this front muſt have occupied twelve hundred foot, or two hundred and forty paces; that is, very near a quarter of a mile in length. Such a ſpace of open Champaign, free from incumbrance of Trees, Ditches, Hills, or the like impediments, that muſt of neceſſity diſjoyn this cloſe battel of the Phalanx; was not anywhere to be found. Here at Cynocephale Philip had ſo much room, as would ſuffice for the one half of his men; the reſt were fain to ſtand ſtill and look about them, being hindered from putting themſelves in order, by the roughneſs of the Dogs heads. But the Romans; to whom all grounds were much alike, were not hindered from coming up unto them; not ſounding any difficulty in maſtering thoſe Enemies, whoſe feet were in a manner bound by the diſcommodity of the place. The very ſtampeding of the Elephants, cauſed them to give back; and the coming on of the Legions, to betake themſelves to flight. A Roman Tribune or Colonel, ſeeing the victory on that part aſſured, left the protection of it unto others; and being followed by twenty Enſignes or Maniples, that is, (as they might fall out) by ſome two thouſand men, took in hand a notable piece of work; and mainly helpful to making of the Victory complete. He conſidered that Philip, in purſuing the right wing of the Romans, was run on ſo far, as that himſelf with his fellows, in mounting the Hill to charge the left wing of the Macedonians, was already gotten above the Kings head. Wherefore he turned to the left hand, and making down the Hill after the Kings Phalanx, fell upon it in the Rere. The hinder moſt ranks of the Phalanx, and all of them indeed ſave the firſt five, were accuſtomed, when the battels came to joyning, to carry their pikes upright; and with the whole weight of their bodies to thruſt on their fore-men: and ſo were they doing at the preſent. This was another great inconvenience in the Macedonian Phalanx. That it ſerved neither for offence nor defence, except only in front. For though it were ſo, that Alexander, when he was to fight with Darius in Meſopotamia, arranged his Phalanx in ſuch order, that all the four ſides of it were as ſo many fronts looking ſundry ways, becauſe he expected that he ſhould be encompassed round: yet it is to be underſtood, that herein he altered the uſual form; as alſo at the ſame time he embattelled his men in looſe order, that ſo with eaſe they might turn their weapons which way need ſhould require. Likewiſe it is to be conſidered; That Alexander men being thus diſpoſed, were fit only to keep their own ground; not being able to follow upon the enemy, unleſs their hindmoſt ranks could have marched backwards. But in this preſent caſe of Philip, there was no ſuch proviſion for reſiſtance. Therefore his men, being otherwiſe unable to help themſelves; threw down their weapons and fled. The King himſelf had thought until now, that the fortune of the battel was every where alike, and the day his own. But hearing the noiſe behind him, and turning a little aſide with a troop of horſe, to ſee how all went; when he beheld his men caſting down their weapons, and the Romans at his back on the higher ground; he preſently betook himſelf to flight. Neither ſtaid he afterwards in any place (except only a ſmall while about Tempe, there to collect ſuch as were diſperſed in this overthrow) until he was gotten into his own Kingdom of Macedon.

There died of the Roman Army in this battel, about ſeven hundred; of the Macedonians about eight thouſand were ſlain; and five thouſand taken priſoners.

§. XV.

T. Quintius fulleth out with the Ætolians; and grants truce unto Philip, with conditions upon which the peace is ratified. Liberty proclaimed unto the Greeks. The Romans quarrel with Antiochus.

THE Ætolians wonderfully vaunted themselves, and desired to have it noised through all Greece, that the Victory at Cynosephale was gotten (in a manner) wholly by their valour. They had gotten indeed the most of the booty by sacking the Macedonian Camp, whilst the Romans were busied in the chase. Titus therefore being offended both at their vain-glory, and at their ravenous condition; purposed to teach them better manners; by regarding them as slightly, as they thought highly of themselves. He also well perceived, That by using them with any extraordinary favour, he should greatly offend the rest of his confederates in Greece; who detested the Ætolians much more vehemently, than ever they had done the Macedonians. But this displeasure brake not forth yet a while.

After the battle, Titus made haste unto Larissa, a City in Thessaly, which he presently took. Before his coming, Philip had sent thither one of his Courtiers to burn all his letters, and passages whatsoever in writing, betwixt him and others; of which many were there kept. It was well done of the King, that among the cares of so much adversity, he forgot not to provide for the safety of his friends. Yet by thus doing, they of Larissa might well perceive, that he gave them as already lost. Wherefore we find not that they, or any of their neighbours, did make delay of opening their gates to Titus. At the same time, the Town of Leucas, bordering upon Arcadiana, was taken by the Roman Fleet, and very soon after, all the Arcanians, a warlike Nation, and in hatred of the Ætolians ever true to Philip; gave up themselves unto the Romans; hearing of the Victory at Cynosephale. The Rhodians also were then in hand with the conquest of Perea, a Region of the Continent over against the Island; whereof they had demanded restitution in the late Treaty of Peace. They did herein more manly, than any other of the Greeks; forasmuch as they awaited not the good pleasure of the Romans; but with an Army of their own, and some help which they borrowed of the Achaans and other their friends gave battle to Diocrates the Kings Lieutenant. wherein they had the Victory, and consequently recovered the whole Province. It angered Philip worse than all this, that the Dardanians gathered courage out of his affliction, to invade his Kingdom; waiting and spoiling, as if all had been abandoned to their discretion. This made him gather an Army in all haste of 6000. Foot, and 500. horse: wherewith coming upon them, he drove them, with little or no loss of his own, and great slaughter of theirs, hastily out of the Kingdom. Which done, he returned to Thessalonica.

In this one enterprise, he had success answerable to his desire; but seeing what fortune accompanied his affairs, in all other parts at the same time, he thought it wisdom to yield unto necessity; and therefore sent in all haste Limanus and Demophilus with Cyclades, the banished Achaan, in whom he reposed much confidence, Embassadors unto Titus. These had conference a long while in private, with Titus and some of his Roman Colonels: by whom they were gently entertained; and in very friendly wise dismissed. It seemed that they had Commission, to refer all unto Titus his own discretion; as Philip himself in few days after did. There was granted unto him a Truce for fifteen days: in which time, the King himself might come, and speak with the Roman General. In the mean season, many suspicious rumours went of Titus, as if he had been corrupted with great rewards from the King, to betray the Greeks his Confederates. Of these bruits the Ætolians were chief authors: who being wont to regard neither friendship, nor honesty, where profit led them a wrong way, judged, alike of all men else. But against the day appointed for the meeting betwixt him and Philip, Titus had sent letters unto his Associates; willing them to have their Agents ready by a time appointed, at the entrance of Tempe, where the treaty should be held. There when they were all assembled, they entred into consultation before the Kings arrival, what should be most expedient for the common benefit of them all, and for every state in particular. The poor King Aminander belought them all, and especially the Romans, that they would think upon him; and, considering his weakness which he confessed, make such provision, that after the Romans had turned their backs, and were gone home, Philip might not wreak his anger upon him who was not able to resist. Then spake Alexander, one of the Ætolians: who commending Titus forasmuch as he had thus assembled the Confederates to advise upon their own good, good, and had willed them to deliver their minds freely: added, That in the main of the purpose, which he had in hand, he was utterly deceived: for that by making peace with Philip, he could neither assure the Romans of their quiet, nor the Greeks of their liberty. There was, he said, none other end to be made of the War, which could agree either with the purpose of the Senate and people of Rome, or with the fair promises made by Titus himself unto the Greeks, than the chasing of Philip quite out of his Kingdom. And to this effect he made a long discourse. But Titus answered, That this Ætolian was ill acquainted, either with the good pleasure of the Senate and people of Rome, or with the laudable customs which they generally held: for that it was not the manner of the Romans, to seek the utter destruction of any King or Nation, at such time as they first made War with them, until by some rebellion they found it a matter of necessity, to take such a rigorous course. And hereof he alledged the Carthaginians as a notable example: adding, That victory, to generous minds, was only an inducement to moderation. As concerning the publick benefit of Greece, it was (he said) expedient, that the Kingdom of Macedon should be greatly weakened and brought low; not that it should be utterly destroyed: forasmuch as it served as a bar to the Thracians, Gauls, and a multitude of other salvage Nations, which would soon overflow the whole continent of Greece, if this Kingdom were not interposed. Wherefore he concluded, that if Philip would yield unto those demands, wherewith he had pressed him in the former Treaty; then was there no reason to deny him peace. As for the Ætolians: if they thought otherwise, it should be at their own pleasure, to take Counsel apart for themselves as they thought good. Then began Phœneas, another of the Ætolians, to say, that all was come to nothing: for that ere long, Philip would trouble all the Greeks, no less than he had done in time before. But Titus interrupted him, and bade him leave his babblings, saying, That himself would take such order, as that Philip, were he never so desirous, should thenceforth not have it in his power to molest the Greeks.

The next day King Philip came thither: whom Titus used friendly: and suffering him to repose himself that night, held a Council the day following: wherein the King yielded unto all that had been required at his hands; offering yet further to stand to the good pleasure of the Senate, if they would have more added to the Conditions.

Phœneas the Ætolian, insulting over him, said it was to be hoped, that he would then at length give up to the Ætolians a many of Towns, (which he there named) bidding him speak whether he would or no. His answer was, that they might take them all. But Titus interposing himself, said it should be otherwise. These were Thessalian Towns, and should be all free; one of them only excepted, which not long ago had refused to commit it self to the faith of the Romans, and therefore should now be given to the Ætolians. Hereat Phœneas cried out, that it was too great an injury, thus to be defrauded of the Towns that had sometimes belonged unto their Common-weal. Rather he willed Titus to consider, that by an ancient Covenant between him and the Romans, all the Towns taken ought to be their own, and the Romans to have nothing save the pillage and captives. It is true, that there had been such a condition in the former War: but it ceased to be of any validity, as soon as the Ætolians made peace with Philip. And thus much Titus gave them to understand; asking them whether they thought it reasonable, that all the Towns in Greece, which had let in the Romans by composition, should be delivered into subjection of the Ætolians. The rest of the Confederates were very much delighted with these angry passages between the Romans and the Ætolians: neither had they great reason to fear any hard measure; since Titus was so earnest in the behalf of those Thessalians, to give them liberty, though they had stood out against him, even till very fear made them open their gates. Wherefore they opposed not themselves; but gave their consent willingly unto a Truce for four Months.

The chief cause that moved Titus to grant peace so readily to the Macedonians, besides that laudable custom by him before alledged, was, the fame of Antiochus his coming with an army from Syria, and drawing near toward Europe. He had also perhaps yet a greater motive; even the consideration that his successor might happen to defraud him of the honour, if the War should happen to be protracted. And he was in the right. For when his letters, together with Embassadors from the Macedonian, and sundry States of Greece, came unto Rome, new Counsels were chosen: who (especially the one of them) stood very earnestly against the peace; alledging frivolous matter of their own suspicion, in hope to get the honour of concluding the War. The Senate began to be doubtfully affected, between the Embassa-

The chief cause that moved Titus to grant peace so readily to the Macedonians, besides that laudable custom by him before alledged; was, the fame of Antiochus his coming with an army from Syria, and drawing near toward Europe. He had also perhaps yet a greater motive; even the consideration that his successor might happen to defraud him of the honour, if the War should happen to be protracted. And he was in the right, For when his letters, together with Embassadors from the Macedonian, and sundry States of Greece, came unto Rome, new Counsels were chosen: who (especially the one of them) stood very earnestly against the peace; alledging frivolous matter of their own suspicion, in hope to get the honour of concluding the War. The Senate began to be doubtfully affected, between the Embassa-dors of Philip, offering to stand to whatever was demanded; and the letters of Titus, pressing them to accept this offer, on the one side, and the importunity of the Consul on the other; who said, that all these goodly shewes were fraudulent, and that the King would rebel, as soon as the Army was called out of Greece. But the matter was taken out of the Senators hands by two of the Tribunes, that referred it to an Assembly of the People; by whose sovereign authority it was concluded, that peace should be granted to the King. So ten Embassadors were sent from Rome, over into Greece: in which number were they that had been Consuls before Titus: and it was ordained by their advice, that Titus should go through with the business of Peace. These would very fain have retained those three important Cities of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias, until the estate of Greece were somewhat better settled. But finally, Titus prevailed so, that Corinth was (though not immediately) rendered unto the Achæans; and all the other Greek Towns which Philip held, as well in Asia as in Greece, restored unto liberty.

The Conditions of Peace granted unto Philip, were, That before the celebration of the next * Isthmian Games, he should withdraw his Garrisons out of all the Greek Towns which he held, and confine them over to the Romans: That he should deliver up unto them all Captives that he had of theirs, and all Renegado's. Likewise all his Ships of War, reserving to himself only five of the lesser sort, and one of extraordinary greatness, wherein sixteen men laboured at every oar: Further, that he should pay a shouland talents, the one half in hand, the other in three years following, by even portions. Hereto * Livie adds, That he was forbidden to make War out of Macedon, without permission of the Senate. But I find not that he observed this Article; or was at any time charged with the breach of it. Four hundred talents he had already delivered to Titus, together with his younger son Demetrius, to remain as hostage for his true dealing in this matter of peace, at such time as he lately sent his Embassadors to Rome: when it was promised, that the money, and his son, should be restored back unto him, if the Senate were not pleased with the agreement. Whither this money were reckoned as part of the thousand talents, I cannot find: and it seemeth otherwise, forasmuch as young Demetrius, who, together with those four hundred talents, was given for hostage, remained still in custody of the Romans, as a part of the bargain which Titus formerly had made. Letters also were then sent by Titus unto Prusias King of Bithynia: giving him to understand, what agreement was made with Philip in behalf of the Greeks; and how the Senate held it reasonable, that the Ciani, most miserably spoiled and oppressed by Philip, to gratifie this Bithynian his son-in-law, should be restored to liberty, and permitted to enjoy the same benefit of the Romans, which other of their Nation did. What effect these letters wrought, it was not greatly material; since the Romans were shortly busied with Antiochus, in such wise, that they had not leisure to examine the conformity of Prusias to their will.

All Greece rejoiced at the good bargain which Titus had made with Philip. Only the Ætolians found themselves grieved that they were utterly neglected: which was to the rest no small part of their contentment. The Ætolians continued to favour the Macedonians; and thereby occasioned much trouble unto themselves. There were some among them well affected to the Romans: who, seeing how things were like to go, made their complaint unto Titus, saying, that they were no better than lost, for the good will which they had born unto him; unless at this time, when he lay close by them with his Army, their Prætor, which was head of the opposite Faction, might be made away. Titus refused to have a hand in the execution, yet nevertheless did animate them in their purpose. So they committed the fact, and hoped to have kept themselves undiscovered. But when the murder came out, and somewhat was confessed by those which were put to torture: the hatred of the people brake out violently against the Romans: in such wise, that howsoever they durst not take Arms against them, yet such of them as they found stragling from their Camp, they murdered in all parts of the Country. This was detested within a while, and many of the dead bodies found. Hereupon Titus requires of the Ætolians, to have the murderers delivered into his hands; and for five hundred Souldiers, which he had lost by them, to have paid unto him five hundred talents. In stead of making any such amends, they paid him with excuses; which he would not take as good satisfaction. He sends Embassadors to the Achæans, and Athinians, informing them what had hapned: and requested them not to take it amiss, though he dealt with these their friends as they had deserved. Herewithal he falls to wailing their Country; and besiegeth two such such Towns of theirs, as did seem to be most culpable of the murders lately done. But the Embassadors of the Achæans and Athinians (especially of the Achæans, who offered, if he needed them, to help him in this War; yet besought him rather to grant peace unto the Achæans) prevailed so far with him, that he was pacified with 30. talents, and the punishments of such as were known offenders.

In like sort, though not so violently, were many States of Greece distracted: some among them rejoicing that they were free from the Macedonians; others greatly doubting, that the Roman would prove a worse neighbour. The Ætolian would have been glad of any Commotion; and therefore published rumours abroad, That it was the purpose of the Romans, to keep in their own hands all those places, wherein Philip lately had his Garrisons. Little did they, or the rest of the Greeks, conceive, that this Macedonian War served as an introduction to the War to be made in Asia against King Antiochus: Where grew the fruit, that was to be reaped of this and many other victories: Wherefore to stay the progress of bad rumours, when the Isthmian games were held, which Intime of peace were never without great solemnity and concourse; Titus in that great assembly of all Greece, caused proclamation to be made by sound of Trumpet to this effect, That the Senate and people of Rome, and Titus Quintius Flaminus the General, having vanquished King Philip and the Macedonians; did will to be at liberty, free from Impositions, free from Garrisons, and living at their own Laws, the Corinthians, Phocians, Locrians, Eubœans, Achæans of Peloponnesus, Magnesiens, Thessalians, and Perrebiens. The suddenness of this Proclamation astonished men: so as though they applauded it with a great shout; yet presently they cried out to hear it again, as if they durst scarce credit their own ears. The Greeks were Crafts-masters in the Art of giving thanks; which they rendered now to T. Quintius with so great affection, as that they had well-near smothered him, by thronging officiously about him.

This good will of the Greeks, was like to be much more available unto the Romans in their War against Antiochus, then could have been the possession of a few Towns, yea, or of all those Provinces which were named in the Proclamation. Upon confidence hereof, no sooner were the Isthmian games at an end, than Titus, with the Romans that were of his Council, gave audience to Hagesianax and Lysim, King Antiochus his Embassadors: whom they willed to signifie unto their Lord, That he should do well to abstain from the free Cities in Asia, and not vex them with War: as also to restore, whatsoever he had occupied, belonging to the Kings, Ptolomy or Philip. Moreover they willed him by these his Embassadors, that he should not pass over his Army, into Europe; adding, That some of them would visit him in person ere it were long, to talk with him further concerning these points. This done, they fell to accomplishing their promises unto the Greeks; to the rest they gave what they had promised. But the Phocians and Locrians they gave unto the Ætolians; whom they thought it no wisdom to offend overmuch, being shortly to take a greater work in hand. The Achæans of Peloponnesus they annexed unto the Thessalians; all save the Town of Thebes in Phthiotia, the fame which had been abandoned by T. Quintius to the Ætolians in the last Treaty with Philip. The Ætolians contended very earnestly about Pharsalus and Lencæ. But they were put off with a dilatory answer, and rejected unto the Senate: for howsoever somewhat the Council might favour them, yet was it not meet that they should have their will, as it were in despite of Titus. So the Achæans were restored Corinth, Triphylia, and Hæroe. So the Corinthians were made free indeed, (though the Romans yet a while kept the Acrocorinthus) for that all which were partakers of the Achæan Common-wealth, enjoyed their liberty in as absolute manner as they could desire. To Pleuratus the Ægeian were given one or two places, taken by the Romans from Philip: and upon Amundæus were bestowed those Castles, which he had gotten from Philip during this Wars, to reign in them, and the grounds which they commanded, as he did among his Albanians. The Rhodians had been their own Carveris Attalus was dead a little before the Victory; and therefore lost his share. Yet many that were with Titus in Council, would have given the Towns of Oremus and Emetia, in the Isle of Eubœa, to his son and successor King Eumenes. But finally it was concluded, that these as well as the rest of the Eubœans, should be suffered to enjoy their liberty. Orestes, a little Province of the Kingdom of Macedon, bordering on Epirus, and lying towards the Ionian Sea, yet yielded unto the Romans long ere this, and since continued true to them: for which cause it was also set at liberty, and made it a free estate by it self.

These businesses being by dispatch, it remained, that all care should be used, not how to avoid the War with King Antiochus, but how how to accomplish it with most ease and prosperity. Wherefore Embassadors were sent, both to Antiochus himself, to pick matter of quarrel; and about unto others, to predispose them unto the assisting of the Romans therein. What ground and matter of War against this King, the Romans now had, or shortly after found: as also how their Embassadors, and Agents, dealt and sped abroad, I refer unto another place.

CHAP. V.

The Wars of the Romans with Antiochus the Great, and his Adherents.

What Kings of the races of Seleucus and Ptolemy reigned in Asia and Egypt before Antiochus the Great.

Seleucus Nicator, the first of his race, King of Asia and Syria, died in the end of the hundred twenty, and fourth Olympiad. He was treacherously slain by Philomy Cerannus, at an Altar, called Agros, having (as is said,) been warned, before by an Oracle, to beware of Agros, as the fatal place of his death. But I never read that any man's life hath been preserved, or any mischief avoided by the predictions of such Disavillish Oracles. Rather I believe, that many such predictions of the Heathen gods, have been ante-dated by their Priests; or by others, which devised them after the event.

Antiochus Soter, the son and heir of this Seleucus, was dearly beloved of his father; who surrendered unto him his own wife Stratonice, when he understood how much the young Prince was enamoured on her. Wherefore Ptolemy Cerannus had great cause to fear, that the death of Seleucus would not be unrevenge'd by this his Successor. But Antiochus was contented to be pacified, either with gifts; or perhaps only with fair words containing himself within Asia; and letting Cerannus enjoy that quietly, which he had purchased in Europe, with the blood of Seleucus. It is said of this Antiochus, that although he married with the Queen Stratonice in his fathers life, yet out of modesty he forbore to embrace her, till his father was dead. So that perhaps his incestuous love was partly, if not chiefly, that cause of his not prosecuting that revenge, whereunto Nature should have urged him. Afterwards he had Wars with Antigonus Gonatus, and with Nicomedes King of Bithynia. Also Lutarius and Leontorius Kings or Captains of the Gauls, were set upon him by the same Nicomedes. With these he fought a great battel:

wherein, though otherwise the Gauls had all advantage against him, yet by the terror of his Elephants, which assailed both their horses and them, he won the Victory. He took in hand an enterprise against Ptolemy Philadelphus; but finding ill success in the beginning, he soon gave it over. To this King Antiochus Soter was, that Berosus the Chaldean dedicated his History of Affrica; the same which hath since been excellently falsified by the Friar Annian. He left behind him one son, called Antiochus Theos; and one daughter, called Apame, that was married unto the King of Cyrene. So he died about the end of the hundred twenty and ninth Olympiad, or the beginning of the Olympiad following, in the fiftieth or one and fiftieth year of the Kingdom of the Greeks, when he had reigned nineteen years.

Antiochus, surnamed Theos, or the god, had this vain and impious title given to him, by flattery of the Asiatics; whom he delivered from Tyrraneus, a Tyrant that oppressed them. He held long and difficult, but fruitless War with Ptolemy Philadelphus King of Egypt; which finally he compounded, by taking to wife Berenice the daughter of Ptolemy.

Of these two Kings, and of this Lady Berenice, S. Hierom and other Interpreters have understood that Prophecy of Daniel: The Daughter of the North shall come to the King of the North to make an agreement; and that which followeth.

Ptolemy Philadelphus was a great lover of Peace and Learning; and (setting apart his incestuous marriage with his own Sister Arfinoe) a very excellent Prince: howsoever, the worst of all that race. It was he that built, and furnished with Books, that famous Library in Alexandria: which to adorn, adorn and to honour the more, he sent unto Eneas, then high Priest of the Jews, for the Books of Moses and other Scriptures. The benefits of this King unto the Jews had formerly been very great; for he had set at liberty as many of them, as his father held in slavery throughout all Egypt; and he had sent unto the Temple of God in Jerusalem very rich Presents. Wherefore Eneas, yielding unto the Kings desire, presented him with an Hebrew copy: which Ptolemy caused to be translated into Greek, by seventy two of the most grave and learned persons that could be found among all the Tribes. In this number of the 72. Interpreters, or (as they are commonly called) the Seventy, Jesus the son of Syrach, is thought by Conrard to have been one; who that he lived in this Age, it seems to me very sufficiently proved by Janinius, in his Preface unto Ecclesiasticus. The whole passage of this business between Philadelphus and the high Priest, was written (as Jo. Josephus affirms) by Aristeus that was employed therein. Forty years Ptolemy Philadelphus was King: reckoning the time whereby he joyntly reigned with his father. He was exceedingly beloved of his people; and highly magnified by Poets, and other Writers. Towards his end he grew more voluptuous, than he had been in his former years; in which time he boasted, that he alone had found out the way how to live for ever. If this had been referred unto his honourable deeds, it might have stood with reason: otherwise the Gout, with which he was often troubled, was enough to reach him his own error. He was the first of the Kings derived from Alexander Successors, that entered into League with the Romans: as also his off-spring was the last among those Royal Families, which by them was rooted up.

(a) Joh. Est. Lib. 1. cap. 2. Concerning that Book, which goes under the name of Antiochus; many learned men, and among the rest, Lodovicus Vivius, hold suspicion that it is counterfeited, and the invention of some late Author. Surely it were to be suspected in the time of Ptolemy; it may be now much more justly suspected: since a new Edition of it is come forth, as yet from Jacobs, (as the Papists term their Books, wherein they have changed what they please) and let forth by Andreas at Coles, An Dom. 1578.

Antiochus Theos had another wife called Ladice, at such time as he married with Berenice the daughter of this Ptolemy. After his second marriage, he used his first wife with no better regard, then if she had been his Conquibine. Ladice hated him for this: yet adventured not to seek revenge, until her own son Seleucus Callinicus was of ability to be King. This was two or three years after the death of Ptolemy Philadelphus: at what time the poisoned her husband Theos; and, by permission of Seleucus her son, murdered Berenice, together with a son that she had born to Antiochus. Justin reports, that Berenice saved her self, together with the young Prince her child, a while in the Sanctuary at Daphne: and that not only some Cities of Asia prepared to succour her, but her brother Ptolemy Evergetes King of Egypt, came to rescue her with an Army; though too late, for she was slain before.

With such cruelties Seleucus Callinicus, succeeding unto his Father, that had fifteen years been King, began his reign. His subjects were highly offended at his wicked nature; which they discovered in his first entrance. Wherefore it was like, that his Estate would have been much endangered; if Ptolemy Evergetes, who came against him, had not been drawn back into his own Country, by some Commotions there in hand. For there were none that would bear arms against Ptolemy, in defence of their own King: but rather they sided with the Egyptians; who took Ladice the Kings mother, and rewarded her with death as she had well deserved. Wherefore Seleucus, being freed from this invasion, by occasion of those domestic troubles which recalled Evergetes home into Egypt; went about a dangerous piece of work, even to make War upon his own subjects, because of their bad affection towards him; when it had been much better, by well deserving to have changed their hatred into love. A great Fleet he prepared: in furnishing and manning whereof he was at such charges, that he scarce left himself any other hope, if that should miscarry. Herein he embarked himself, and putting to Sea, did meet with such a tempest, as devoured all save himself, and a very few of his friends that hardly escaped. This calamity, having left him nothing else in a manner than his naked body, turned nevertheless to his great good; as anon after it seemed. For when his subjects understood in what sort the gods (as they conceived it) had punished him for his offences: they had commiseration of his Estate; and, presuming that he would thenceforth become a new man, offered unto him their service with great alacrity. This revived him, and filled him such a spirit; as thinking himself well enough able to deal with the Egyptians, he made ready a mighty Army for that purpose. But his fortune was no better at Land, that it had been at Sea. He was vanquished by Ptolemy in a great battel: whence he escaped hardly; no better attended, than after his late Shipwreck. Halting therefore back to Antioch, and fearing that the enemy would soon be at his heels;

how to accomplish it with most ease and prosperity. Wherefore Ambassadors were sent, both to Antiochus himself; to pick matter of quarrels; and about unto others, to dispose them unto the assisting of the Romans therein. What ground and matter of War against this King, the Agamemnon had, or shortly after found: as also how their Ambassadors, and Agents dealt and sped abroad, I refer unto another place.

The Wars of the Romans with Antiochus the Great, and his Adherents.

What Kings of the races of Seleucus and Ptolemy reigned in Asia and Egypt before Antiochus the Great.

Seleucus Nicator, the first of his race, King of Asia and Syria, died in the end of the hundred twenty, and fourth Olympiad. Of these two Kings, and of this Lady Berenice, S. Hierom and other Interpreters have understood that Prophecy of Daniel: The Daughter of the King of the South shall come to the King of the North to make an agreement; and that which followeth.

Ptolemy Philadelphus was a great lover of Peace and Learning; and (setting apart his incestuous marriage with his own sister Arsinoe) a very excellent Prince: howsoever, the worst of all that race. It was he that built, and furnished with Books, that famous Library in Alexandria: which to adorn, heels; He wrote unto his brother Antiochus Hierax wholy then in Asia, praying him to bring succour with all speed; and promising, in recompence of his faith and diligence, the Dominion of a great part of Asia. Antiochus was then but fourteen years old, but extremely ambitious; and therefore glad of such an occasion to make himself great. He levied a mighty Army of the Gauls; wherewith he set forward to help his brother, or rather to get what he could for himself. Hereof Ptolomy being advertized: and having no desire to put himself in danger more than he needed; no sooner was with Seleucus for ten years. No sooner was Seleucus freed from this care of the Egyptians, but his brother Antiochus came upon him, and needs would fight with him, as knowing himself to have the better Army. So Seleucus was vanquished again; and saved himself with so few about him, that he was verily supposed to have perished in the battle. Thus did Gods Justice take revenge of those murders by which the Crown was purchased; and settled (as might have been thought) on the head of this bloody King. Antiochus was very glad to hear of his brothers death; as if thereby he had purchased his hearts desire. But the Gauls, his Mercenaries, were gladder then he. For when he led them against Eumenes King of Pergamus, being in hope to get honour by making a Conquest in the beginning of his Reign: the perfidious Barbarians took counsel against him, and devised how to strip him of all that he had. They thought it very likely, that if there were none of the Royal house to make head against them; it would be in their power, to do what should be best pleasing to themselves, in the lower Asia. Wherefore they laid hands on Antiochus; and enforced him to ransom himself with money, as if he had been their lawful Prisoner. Neither were they so contented: but made him enter into such Composition with them, as tended but little to his honour. In the mean while Seleucus had gathered a new Army; and prepared once more to try his fortune against his brother. Eumenes hearing of this, thought the season fit for himself, to make his profit of their discord. Antiochus fought with him, and was beaten: which is no great marvel, since he had great reason to stand in no less fear of the Gauls, his own Souldiers, than of the enemy with whom he had to deal. After this, Eumenes won much in Asia; whilst Antiochus went against his brother. In the second battle, fought between the brethren, Seleucus had the upper hand: and

Antiochus Hierax (or the Hawk) which surname was given him, because he fought his prey upon every one, without care whether he were provoked or not) soared away as far as he could, both from his brother, and from his own Gauls. Having fetched a great compass through Mesopotamia and Armenia, he fell at length in Cappadocia; where his father-in-law King Artabanus took him up. He was entertained very lovingly in his ward shew; but with a meaning to betray him. This he soon perceived; and therefore betook him to his wings again; though he knew not well, which way to bend his flight. At length he resolved to bellow himself upon Ptolomy; his own confidant telling him, what evil he had meant unto Seleucus his brother; and therefore what little good he was reciprocally to expect at his hands. Infidelity can find no sure harbour. Ptolomy well understood the perfidious and turbulent nature of this Hierax. Wherefore he laid him up in close prison; whence though by means of an harlot, he got out; yet flying from his keepers, he fell into the hands of thieves; by whom he was murdered. Near about the same time died Siphacius. The Parthians and Bactrians had rebelled against him, during his Wars with his brother. He therefore made a journey against Asacus founder of the Parthian Kingdom: wherein his evil fortune, or rather Gods vengeance, adhered so closely to him; that he was taken prisoner. Asacus dealt friendly with him, and dismissed him, having every way given him royal entertainment: but in returning home, he brake his neck by a fall from his horse, and so ended his unhappy reign of twenty years. He had to wife Laodice the sister of Andromachus; one of his most trusty Captains: which was father unto that Achæus, who making his advantage of this affinity, became shortly after (as he styled himself) a King; though rather indeed, a great trouble of the world in those parts. By Laodice he had two sons; Seleucus the third, surnamed Cerannus; and Antiochus the third, called afterwards the Great.

Seleucus Cerannus reigned only three years: in which time he made War upon Attalus the first, that was King of Pergamus. Being weak of body through sickness, and in want of money, he could not keep his men of War in good order: and finally he was slain by treason of Nicanor and Apaturus, a Gaul. His death was revenged by Achæus, who slew the Traitors, and took charge of the Army: which he ruled very wisely, and faithfully a while; Antiochus the brother of Seleucus being a Child.

§. II.

The beginning of the Great Antiochus his reign, Of Ptolomy Euergetes, and Philopater, Kings of Egypt. War between Antiochus and Philopater. The rebellion of Molo: an expedition of Antiochus against him. The continuance of Antiochus his Egyptian War: with the passages between the two Kings: the Victory of Ptolomy, and peace concluded. Of Achæus, and his rebellion; his greatness, and his fall. Antiochus his expedition against the Parthians, Bactrians, and Indians. Somewhat of the Kings reigning in India, after the death of the Great Alexander.

Antiochus was scarcely fifteen years old, when he began his reign, which lasted six and thirty years. In his minority he was wholly governed by one Hermias, an ambitious man, and one which malign'd all virtues, that he found in any of the Kings faithful servants. This vile quality in a Counsellor of such great place, how harmful it was unto his Lord, and finally unto himself; the success of things will shortly discover.

Soon after the beginning of Antiochus his reign, Ptolomy Euergetes King of Egypt died, and left his heir Ptolomy Philopater, a young Boy likewise, as hath elsewhere been remembered. This was that Euergetes, who relieved Aratus and the Acheans: and afterwards took part with Cleomenes: and lovingly entertained him, when he was chased out of Greece by Antigonus Gonatus. He annexed unto his Dominion the Kingdom of Cyrene by taking to wife Bernice, the daughter of King Magas. He was the third of the Ptolomies; and the last good King of the race. The name of Euergetes, or the doer of good, was given to him by the Egyptians; not so much for the great spoils which he brought home, after his victories in Syria; as for that he recovered some of those Images or Idols, which Cambyses, when he conquered Egypt, had carried into Persia. He was ready to have made War upon the Jews, for that Onias their high Priest, refused to pay unto him his yearly tribute of 20. talents: but he was pacified by the wisdom of Josephus a Jew, to whom afterwards he let in farm the Tributes and customs that belonged unto him in those parts of Syria, which he held, for Celestria, with Palestina, and all those parts of the Country that lay nearest unto Egypt, were held by the Egyptians; either as having fallen to the share of Ptolomy the first, at such time as the great Antigonus was vanquished and slain in the battle at Ipsus; or as being won by this Euergetes, in the troublesome and unhappy reign of Seleucus Callinicus. The victories of this Euergetes in Syria, with the contentions that lasted for many succeeding ages between the Ptolomies and the Seleucids; were all foretold by Daniel in the Prophecy before cited, which is expounded by S. Hierome. Thus Ptolomy Euergetes reigned six and twenty years; and died towards the end of the hundred thirty and ninth Olympiad. It may seem by that which we find in the Prologue unto Jesus the son of Syrach his book, that he should have reigned a much longer time. For Syrachides there saith that he came into Egypt in the eight and thirtieth year, when Euergetes was King. It may therefore be, That either this King reigned long together with his father: or that those eight and thirty years were the years of Jesus his own age; if not perhaps reckoned (as the Jews did, otherwise reckon) from some notable accident that had befallen them.

Not long after the death of Euergetes, Hermias the Counsellor, and in a manner the Protector of King Antiochus, incited his Lord unto War against the Egyptians; for the recovery of Celestria and the Countries adjoining. This Counsel was very unseasonably given, when Molo, the Kings Lieutenant in Media, was broken out in rebellion, and fought to make himself absolute Lord of that rich Country. Nevertheless Hermias, being more sroward than wise, maintained stiffly, that it was most expedient and agreeable with the Kings honour, to send forth against a rebellious Captain, other Captains that were faithful; whilst he in person made War upon one that was like himself, a King. No man durst gain-say the resolution of Hermias; who therefore sent Xenetas an Achean, with such forces as he thought expedient, against the Rebel; whilst in the mean season an Army was preparing for the Kings expedition into Celestria. The King having marched from Apamea to Laodicea, and so over the Deserts into the Valley of Mastia, between the Mountains of Libanus and Anti-Libanus, found his way there stopped by Theodorus an Ætolian, that served under Ptolomy. So he consumed the time there a while to none effect: and then came news, that Xenetas his Captain, was destroyed with his whole Army; and Molo thereby became Lord of all the Country, as far as unto Babylon.

Xenetas, whilst he was yet on his journey, and

and drew near to the River of Tygris, received many advertisements, by such as fled over unto him from the Enemy, That the followers of Molo were, for the most part, against their wills drawn by their Commander to bear arms against their King. This report was not altogether false; but Molo himself stood in some doubt left his followers would leave him in time of necessity. Xenatas therefore making shew, as if he had prepared to pass the River by Boats in face of his enemy; left in the night time such as he thought meet to defend his Camp: and with all the flower of his Army went over Tygris, in a place ten miles lower than Molo his Camp. Molo heard of this, and sent forth his horse to give impediment: but hearing that Xenatas could not so be stopped, He himself dislodged, and took his journey towards Media; leaving all his baggage behind him in his Camp. Whether he did this, as distrustful the faith of his own Souldiers; or whether thereby to deceive his Enemy, the great folly of Xenatas made his stratagem prosperous. For Xenatas, having born himself proudly before, upon the countenance of Hermias, by whom he was advanced unto this charge; did now presume that all should give way to his authority, without putting him to much trouble of using the sword. Wherefore he suffered his men to feast with the provisions which they found ready in the forsaken Camp: or rather he commanded them so to do, by making Proclamation, That they should cheer up themselves against the journey, which he intended to take the next day, in pursuit of the Rebels that fled. And to the same purpose he busied himself, in transporting the remainder of his Army, which he had left on the other side of Tygris. But Molo went no further that day, than he could easily return the same night. Wherefore understanding what good rule the Kings men kept: he made such haste back unto them, that he came upon them early in the morning; whilst they were yet heavy with the Wine and other good cheer that they had spent at supper. So Xenatas and a very few with him, died fighting in defence of the Camp: the rest were slaughtered without making resistance; and many of them ere they were perfectly awake. Likewise the Camp on the other side of Tygris, was easily taken by Molo: the Captains flying thence, to save their own lives. In the heat of this Victory, the Rebel marched unto Selenia, which he presently took: and, mastering within a little while the Province of Babylonia, and all the Countrey down to the red Sea, or Bay of Persia, He hasted unto Susa; where at his first coming, he won the City: but failing to take the Castle that was exceeding strong, returned back to Selenia, there to give order concerning this business.

The report of these things coming to Antiochus, whilst he lay (as is said before) in the Vale of Mapyas; filled him with great sorrow, and his Camp with trouble. He took Counsel what to do in this needfull case: and was well advised by Epigenes, the best man of War he had about him, to let alone this enterprise of Calosyria, and bend his forces thither, where more need required them. This Counsel was put in execution with all convenient haste. Yet was Epigenes dissuaded by the way, and soon after slain, by the practice of Hermias: who could not endure to hear good Counsel given, contrary to his own good liking and allowance. In the journey against Molo, the name and presence of the King was more available, than any odds which he had of the Rebel in strength. Molo distrusted his own followers; and thought, that neither his late good success, nor any other consideration, would serve to hold them from returning to the Kings obedience, if once they beheld his person. Wherefore he thought it safest for him to assail the Kings Camp in the night time. But going in hand with this, He was discovered by some that fled over from him to the King. This caused him to return back to his Camp: which by some error, took alarm at his return: and was hardly quieted, when Antiochus appeared in sight. The King was thus forward in giving battle to Molo, upon confidence which he had that many would revolt unto him. Neither was he deceived in this his belief. For not a few men or Ensigns: but all the left wing of the enemy which was opposite unto the King, changed side forthwith as soon as ever they had sight of the Kings person; and were ready to do him service against Molo. This was enough to have won the Victory: but Molo shortened the work, by killing himself; as did all divers of his friends, who for fear of torments, prevented the Hang-man with their own swords.

After this Victory, came joyful news, that the Queen Ladice daughter of Mithridates King of Pontus, which was married unto Antiochus a while before, had brought forth a son. Fortune seemed bountiful unto the King: and therefore he purposed to make what use he could of her friendly disposition while it lasted. But now in the Eastern parts of his Kingdom, He judged it convenient to visit his frontiers, were it only only to terrifie the Barbarians, that bordered upon him. Hereunto his Counsellor Hermias gave assent: not so much respecting the Kings honour, as considering what good might thereby happen to himself. For if it should come to pass; that the King were taken out of the World by any casualty: then made he no doubt of becoming Protector to the young Prince; and thereby of lengthning his own Government. Antiochus therefore went against Artabanes, who reigned among the Atropatians; having the greatest part of his Kingdom situate between the Caspian and Euxine Sea. This barbarous King was very old and fearful; and therefore yielded unto whatsoever conditions it pleased Antiochus to lay upon him. So in this journey Antiochus got honour, such as well contented him; and then returned homewards. Upon the way, a Physician of his brake with him as concerning Hermias; informing him truly how odious he was to the people; and how dangerous he would be shortly unto the Kings own life. Antiochus believed this, as having long suspected the same Hermias; but not daring for fear of him to utter his suspicions. It was therefore agreed, that he should be made away on the sudden: which was done, he being trained forth by a sleight, a good way out of the Camp; and there killed without warning or dispute. The King needed not to have used so much art in ridding his hands of a man so much detested. For howsoever he seemed gracious whilst he was alive: yet they that for fear had been most obsequious to him, whilst he was in case to do them hurt, was as ready as the foremost, to speak of him as he had deserved, when once they were free of him: yea, his wife and children, laying then at Apamea, were stoned to death by the wives and children of the Citizens; whose indignation brake forth the more outrageously, the longer that he had been concealed.

About these times, Achæus (of whom we spake before) thinking that Antiochus might happen to perish in some of these expeditions which he took in hand; was bold to set a Daedem upon his own head; and take upon him as a King. His purpose was to have invaded Syria; but the fame of Antiochus his returning thitherwards, made him quit the enterprise, and study to set some handsome colour on his former presumption. It is very strange that Antiochus neither went against Achæus; nor yet dissembled the notice which he had taken of these his traitorous purposes: but wrote unto him, signifying that he knew all, and upbraiding him with such infidelity, as any offender might know to be unpardonable. By these means he emboldened the Traitor: who being already detected, might better hope to maintain his former actions by strong hand, than to excuse them or get pardon by submission. Antiochus had at that time a vehement desire to recover Calosyria, or what else he could, of the Dominions of Ptolomy Philopater in those parts. He began with Selenia, a very strong City near to the mouth of the River Orontes; which ere long he won, partly by force, partly by corrupting with bribes the Captains that lay therein. This was that Selenia, whereto Antigonus the Great, who founded it, gave the name of Antigonia: but Selenus getting it shortly after, called it Selenia; and Ptolomy Evergetes having lately won it, might if it had so pleased him, have changed the name into Ptolomais. Such is the vanity of men, that hope to purchase an endless memorial unto their names, by works proceeding rather from their greatness, than from their virtue; which therefore no longer are their own, than the same greatness hath continuance. Theodorus the Epiroty, he that before had opposed himself to Antiochus, and defended Calosyria in the behalf of Ptolomy, was now grown sorry, that he had used so much faith and diligence, in service of an unthankful and luxurious Prince. Wherefore as a Mercenary, he began to have regard to his own profit: which thinking to find greater, by applying himself unto him that was (questionless) the more worthy of these two Kings; he offered to deliver up unto Antiochus, the Cities of Tyrrus and Ptolomais. Whilst he was devising about this Treason, and had already sent messengers to King Antiochus: his practice was detected, and he besieged in Ptolomais by one of Ptolomies Captains, that was more faithful than himself. But Antiochus halting to his rescue, vanquished this Captain who met him on the way: and afterwards got possession, not only of Tyrrus and Ptolomais, with a good Fleet of the Egyptian Kings that was in those Havens: but of so many other Towns in that Country, as emboldened him to think upon making a journey into Egypt itself. Agathocles and Solibus bore all the sway in Egypt at that time: Ptolomy himself being loath to have his pleasures interrupted, with business of so small importance, as the safety of his Kingdom. Wherefore these two agreed together, to make provision as hastily, and yet as secretly as might be for the War: and nevertheless at the same time, to press Antiochus with daily Embassadors to some good agreement. There came in the heat of this business, Embassadors from Rhodes, Byzantium, and Cyzicus, as likewise from the Asiatians; according to the usual courtesie of the Greeks, desiring to take up the quarrel.

These were all entertained in Memphis, by Agathocles and Sosibius: who intreated them to deal effectually with Antiochus. But whilst this treaty lasted, great preparations were made at Alexandria for the War: wherein these two Counsellors perswaded themselves reasonably; that the victory would be their own; if they could get for money, a sufficient number of the Greeks to take their parts. Antiochus heard only what was done at Memphis, and how desirous the Governours of Egypt were to be at quiet: whereunto he gave the readier belief, not only for that he knew the disposition of Ptolemy, but because the Rhodians, and other Embassadors, coming from Memphis, discoursed unto him all after one manner, as being all deceived by the cunning of Agathocles and his fellow: Antiochus therefore having wearied himself, at the long siege of a Town called Dura, which he could not win; and being desirous to refresh himself, and his Army in Solima, during the winter which then came on, granted to the Egyptian a Truce for four months, with promise that he would be ready to hearken unto equal Conditions, when they should be offered. It was not his meaning to be so courteous, as he would fain have seemed, but only to lull his enemies asleep, whilst he took time to refresh himself; and to bring Achæus to some good order, whose treason daily grew more open and violent. The same negligence which he thought the Egyptian would have used, he used himself, as presuming that when time of the year better served, little force would be needful; for that the Towns would voluntarily yield unto him, since Ptolemy provided not for their defence. Nevertheless, he gave Audience to the Embassadors, and had often conference with those that were sent out of Egypt: pleasing himself well to dispute about the justice of his quarrel which he purposed shortly to make good by the sword, whether it were just or no. He said, that it was agreed between Seleucus his Ancestor, and Ptolemy the Son of Lagi, That all Syria, if they could win it from Antiochus, should be given in possession to Seleucus; and that this bargain was afterward ratified, by general consent of the Confederates, after the battel at Issus. But Ptolemies men would acknowledge no such bargain. They said that Ptolemy the son of Lagi, had won Celestria; and the Provinces adjoining for himself; as also that he had sufficiently gratified Seleucus, by lending him forces to recover his Province of Babylon, and the Countries about the River of Euphrates. Thus whilst neither of them greatly cared for peace, they were in the end, of their disposition, as far from concluding, as at the beginning. Ptolemy demanded restitution; Antiochus thought, that he had not as yet gotten all that was his own: Altho Ptolemy would needs have Achæus comprehended in the league between them, as one of their Confederates; but Antiochus would not endure to hear of this, exclaiming against it as a shameful thing, that a King should offer to do so with another, to take himself into protection, and seek to joyn him in Confederacy with his own Sovereign Lord. When the Truce was expired, and Antiochus prepared to take the field again: contrary to his expectation, he was informed, That Ptolemy, with a very puissant Army, was coming up against him out of Egypt. Setting forward therefore to meet with the Enemy, he was encountered on the way by these Captains of Ptolemy, that had resisted him the year before. They held against him the passages of Libanus, whence nevertheless he drove them: and proceeding onward in his journey, won so many places, that he greatly encreased his reputation; and thereby drew the Arabians, with divers of the bordering people, to become his followers. As the two Kings drew near together: many Captains of Ptolemy forsook his pay, and fled over to Antiochus. This notwithstanding, the Egyptian had the courage to meet his enemy in the field: The battel was fought at Raphia: where it was not to be decided, whether the Egyptians; or the Asiatians were the better Souldiers, (for that the strength of both Armies consisted in Mercenaries, chiefly of the Greeks, Thracians, and Gauls;) but whether of the Kings was the more fortunate. Ptolemy, with Arctæus his Sister and Wife, rode up and down encouraging his men; the like did Antiochus on the other side: each of them rehearsing the brave deeds of his Ancestors; as not having of their own, whereby to value themselves. Antiochus had the more Elephants, as also his being of Asia, had him been sower, would have beaten those of Africa. Wherefore by the advantage of those beasts, He drove the Enemies before him, in that part of the battel wherein he fought himself. But Ptolemy had the better men by whose valour he brake the Groin of his enemies battel, and won the victory: whilst whilst Antiochus was heedlessly following upon those, whom he had compelled to retire. Antiochus had brought into the field above seventy thousand foot, and six thousand horse; whereof though he lost scarce ten thousand foot, and not four hundred horse; yet the fame of his overthrow took from him all those places which he had lately won. When therefore he was returned home to Antioch: He began to stand in fear, lest Ptolemy and Achæus, setting upon him both at once, should put him in danger of his whole Estate. This caused him to send Embassadors to the Egyptian, to treat of peace; which was readily granted; it being much against the nature of Ptolemy to vex himself thus with the tedious business of War. So Ptolemy having staid three months in Syria, returned home into Egypt, clad with the reputation of a Conqueror; to the great admiration of his subjects and all those that were acquainted with his voluptuous and slothful condition.

Achæus was not comprised in the league between these two Kings: or if he had been included therein; yet would not the Egyptian have taken the pains, of making a second expedition for his sake. The best was, that he thought himself strong enough, if fortune were not too much against him, to deal with Antiochus. Neither was he confident without great reason: for besides his many victories, whereby he had gotten all that belonged unto Antiochus on this side of Taurus, he had also good success against Attalus King of Pergamus: that was an able man of War, and commanded a strong Army. Neither was he, as Molo the Rebel had been, one of mean regard otherwise, and carried beyond himself by apprehending the advantage of some opportunity: but Cousin-german to the King, as hath been shewed before; and now lately the Kings brother-in-law, by taking to wife a younger daughter of the same Mithridates King of Pontus, which was also called Ladice, as was her Sister the Queen, Antiochus his wife. These things had added Majesty unto him, and had made his followers greatly to respect him, even as one to whom a Kingdom was belonging. Neither made it a little for him, That King Ptolemy of Egypt held him in the nature of a friend: and that King Antiochus was now lately vanquished in the battel at Raphia: and had thereby lost all his gettings in Syria. But all these hopes and likelihoods came to nothing: for the King of Pontus, if he would meddle in that quarrel between sons-in-law, had no reason to take part against the more honourable. As for the Egyptian, he was not only slothful, but hindered by a rebellion of his own subjects, from helping his friends abroad. For the people of Egypt, of whom Ptolemy, contrary to the manner of his Progenitors, had armed a great number to serve in the late expedition; began to entertain a good opinion of their own valour, thinking it not inferior to the Macedonian. Hereupon they refused to suffer as much as formerly they had done: since they less esteemed, than they had done, the force of the Kings mercenary Greeks: which had hitherto kept them in straight subjection. Thus brake out a War between the King and his subjects: wherein though the ill-guided force of the multitude was finally broken, yet King Ptolemy thereby wasted much of his strength, and much of his time, that might have been spent, as he thought, much better in revelling: or, as others thought, in succouring Achæus. As for Antiochus, He had no sooner made his peace with the Egyptian, than he turned all his care to the preparation of War against Achæus. To this purpose he entred into League with Attalus; that so he might distract the forces of his Rebel, and find him work on all sides. Finally, his diligence and fortune were such, that within a while he had sent up Achæus into the City of Sardis, where he held him about two years besieged. The City was very strong, and well victualled: so as there appeared not, when the second year came, any greater likelihood of taking it, than in the first years siege. In the end, one Lagoras a Cretan found means how to enter the Town. The Castle it self was upon a very high rock, and in a manner impregnable; as also the Town-wall adjoining to the Castle, in that part which was called the Same, was in like manner situate upon steep Rocks, and almost inaccessible; that hanging over a deep bottom, whereinto the dead carcases of Horses, and other beasts, yea, and sometimes of men, used to be thrown. Now it was observed by Lagoras, that the Ravens and other birds of prey, which haunted that place by reason of their food which was there never wanting, used to flye up unto the top of the Rocks, and to pitch upon the walls, where they rested without any disturbance. Observing this often, he reasoned with himself, and concluded that those parts of the wall were left unguarded, as being thought unapproachable. Hereof he informed the King: who approved his judgement, and gave unto him the leading of such men, as he desired for the accomplishing of the enterprize. The success was agreeable to that which

Lagora had afore conceived: and though with much labour, yet without resistance, he scaled those rocks, and whilst a general assault was made, entered the Town in that part, which was at other times unguarded, then nought upon. In the same place had the Persians, under Cyrus, gotten into Sardis; when Cressus thought himself secure on that side. But the Citizens took not warning by the example of a loss of many ages past: and therefore out of memory. Achæus held still the Castle: which not only seemed by nature impregnable, but was very well stored with all necessaries, and manned with a sufficient number of such as were to him well assured. Antiochus therefore was constrained to waste much time about it: having none other hope to prevail, than by smothering the inclosed. Besides the usual tediousness of expectation, his business called him thence away into the higher Asia, where the Bactrians, and Parthians with the Hyrcanians, had erected Kingdoms taken out of his Dominions, upon which they still incroached. But he thought it not safe, to let Achæus break loose again. On the other side there were some Agents of Ptolemy the Egyptian, and good friends unto Achæus; that made it their whole study, how to deliver this besieged Prince. If they could rescue his person, they cared for no more: but presumed that when he should appear in the Country's under Taurus, he would soon have an Army at command, and be strong enough to hold Antiochus as hardly to work as at any time before. Wherefore they dealt with one Bolis a Cretan, that was acquainted well with all the ways in the Country, and particularly with the by-paths and exceeding difficult passages among those Rocks, whereon the Castle of Sardis stood. Him they tempted with great rewards, which he should receive at the hands of Ptolemy; as well as of Achæus; to do his best for performance of their desire. He undertook the business: and gave such likely reasons of bringing all to good effect, that they wrote unto Achæus by one Ariamus, a trusty messenger, whom Bolis found means to convey in to the Castle. The faith of these Negotiators Achæus held most assured. They also wrote unto him in private Characters, or Ciphers, wherewith none save he and they were acquainted: whereby he knew, that it was no fained device of his Enemies, in the name of his friends. As for the messenger, he was a trusty fellow, and one whom Achæus found by examination, heartily affected unto their side. But the Contents of the Epistle, which were that he should be confident in the faith of Bolis, and of one Cambylus whom Bolis had won unto the business, did somewhat trouble him. They were men to him unknown: and Cambylus was a follower of Antiochus: under whom he had the command of those Crestans, which held one of the Forts that blocked up the Castle of Sardis. Nevertheless other way to escape he saw none, than by putting himself to some adventure. When the messenger had therefore passed often to and fro, it was at length concluded; That Bolis himself should come (speak with Achæus; and conduct him forth). There was none other than good high means by any of the rest, save only by Bolis and Cambylus; which were Crestans, and (as all their Countrymen, (some few excepted, have) been, and still are,) false knaves. These two held a consultation together, that was, (as Polybius observes, in rightly Criticized manner concerning the safety of him whose deliverance they undertook, nor touching the discharge of their own faith; but only how to get most with least ado and danger to themselves. Briefly they concluded, That first of all, they would equally share between them ten Talents, which they had already received in hand: and then, That they would reveal the matter to Antiochus; offering to deliver Achæus unto him; if they might be well rewarded both with present money, and with promise of consideration answerable to the greatness of such a service, when it should be dispatched. Antiochus hearing this promise of Cambylus, was no less glad, than were the friends of Achæus well pleased with the comfortable promises of Bolis. At length when all things were in readiness on both sides, and that Bolis with Ariamus was to get up into the Castle, and convey Achæus thence: He first went with Cambylus to speak with the King, who gave him a very private audience; and confirmed unto him by word of mouth the assurance of his liberal promises. And after that, putting on the countenance of an honest man, and of one that was faithful unto Ptolemy, whom he had long served, he accompanied Ariamus up into the Castle. At his coming thither, he was lovingly entertained; yet questioned at large by Achæus, touching all the weight of the business in hand. But he discouraged so well, and with such gravity, that there appeared no reason of distrust: ing either his faith or judgement. He was an old Soldierier, had long been a Captain under Ptolemy, and did not thrust himself into this business; but was invited than he in multiplicity of name is beyond any the Crestans in elder times that were always Lysans, evilbrats, and slow bellies. (2) Polyb. lib. 18.

Among these he had a great many calling himself a Cretan, who were in deed so, but who in the heart were as false as the rest. He took care, who in deed was his friend, to keep him from being taken by the hand of Antiochus, who was a false knave, and who had been a Captain under Ptolemy, and who had long served him.

by honourable and faithful men. He had also taken a safe course, in winning (as it seemed) that other Country-man of his, who kept a Fort that stood in their way; and thereby had already sundry times given safe passage and repassage unto Ariamus. But against all these comfortable hopes, the importance of so great an adventure stirred up some diffidence. Achæus therefore dealt wisely, and said; that he would yet stay in the Castle a little longer: but that he meant to send away with Bolis three or four of his friends; from whom, when he received better advertisement, concerning the likelihood of the enterprise, then would he issue forth himself. Hereby he took order, not to commit himself wholly unto the faith of a man unknown. But as Polybius well notes, he did not consider that he played the Cretan with a man of Crete: which is to say, that he had to do with one, whose knavery could not be avoided by circumspection. Bolis and Cambylus had laid their plots thus. That if Achæus came forth alone, then should he easily be taken by the ambush prepared for him: if he were accompanied with many of his friends, then should Ariamus be appointed to lead the way, as one that of late had trodden it oft: and Bolis following behind, should have an eye upon Achæus to prevent him; not only from escaping to the tumult, but from breaking his own neck, or otherwise killing himself: to the end that being taken alive, he might be sold to Antiochus the more welcome Present. And in such order came they now forth: Ariamus going before as Guide: the rest following as the way served, and Bolis in the Rear. Achæus made none acquainted with his purpose; till the very instant of his departure. Then signified he the matter to his Wife Lysandra; and comforting her with hope as well as he could, appointed four of his special friends to bear him company. They were all disguised: and one of them alone took upon him to have knowledge of the Greek tongues; speaking & answering as need should require for all, as if the rest had been dumb upon his business, and much perplexed. For (saith Polybius) though he were of the midst of another; yet could he not see in the dark, nor know which of them was Achæus; or whether Achæus himself were there. The way was very uneasy, and in some places dangerous; especially to those that knew it not. Wherefore they were fain to stay in divers places, and help one another up or down. But upon every occasion they were all of them very officious towards Achæus; lending him their hands, and taking diligent care of him, as easily gave Bolis to understand that he was the man: and so by their uncarifonable duty, they undid their Lord. When they came to the place where Cambylus lay in wait, Bolis whistled, and presently clasped Achæus about the middle, holding him fast that he could not stir. So they were all taken by the Ambush, and carried forthwith to Antiochus; who sat up watching in his Pavilion, expecting the event. The sight of Achæus, brought in bound unto him, did so astonish the King that he was unable to speak a word, and anon brake out into weeping. Yet was he before informed of the plot, which might have kept him from admiration: as also the next morning betimes, assembling his friends together, he condemned Achæus to a cruel death: which argues, that he was not moved with pity towards this unhappy man. Wherefore it was the general record of calamities, incident unto great fortunes, that wrung from him these tears: as also the rarity of the accident, that made both him and his friends to wonder: though it be so, that such a course as this of his, in employing two mischievous knaves against one Traitor, doth not rarely succeed well according to that Spanish Proverb, A un traydor dos alcaforas. The death of Achæus brought such astonishment upon those which held the Castle, that after a while they gave up the place and themselves unto the King; whereby he got entire possession of all to him belonging in the lesser Asia.

Some years passed after this; ere Antiochus was ready for his expedition against the Parthians and Hyrcanians. The Parthians were a little Nation of obscure beginnings; and commonly subject unto those that ruled in Media. In the great buffing for Provinces, after the death of Alexander, the Government over them was committed by Antipater, to one Philip, a man of small regard: shortly they fell to Eumenes; then to Antiochus: and from him, together with the Medes, to Seleucus; under whose posterity they continued until the Reign of Seleucus Calpurnius, being ruled by Lieutenants of the Syrian Kings. The lustful insolvency of one of these Lieutenants, together with the misfortune of Callinicus, that was vanquished and thought to be slain by the Gauls, did stir up Asaces, a nobleman of the Country, to seek revenge of injuries done, and animate them to rebel. So he slew the Kings Lieutenant; made himself King of the Parthians, and Lord of Hyrcania; fought profperously with those that disturbed him in his beginnings; and took Seleucus Callinicus prisoner in batle, whom he royally entertained and dismissed. Hereby he won reputation as a lawful King: and by good government of his Countrey, procured unto himself such love of his Subjects, that his name was continued unto his successors, like as that of the Ptolomies in Egypt, and that of the Cæsars afterwards in Rome. Much about the same time the Bactrians rebelled: though these at length, and all belonging unto the Seleucide beyond Euphrates, increased the Parthians dominion. Now Antiochus went against them with so strong an army, that they durst not meet him in plain field; but kept themselves in woods or places of strength, and defended the Straights and passages of mountains. The resistances they made availed them not. For Antiochus had with him so great a multitude, and so well sorted, as he needed not to turn out of the way, from those that lay fortified against him, in Woods and Straights between their mountains; it being easie to spare out of so great a number, as many as fetching a compass about, might either get above the enemies heads; or come behind, and charge them on the back. Thus did he often employ against them his light armature: wherewith he caused them to dislodge, and give way unto his Phalanx, upon which they durst not adventure themselves in open ground. Arfaces, the second of the name, (for his father was dead before this) was then King of Parthia: who though he was confident in the fidelity of his own subjects; yet feared to encounter so mighty an Invader. His hope was, that the bad ways and Deserts would have caused Antiochus, when he was at Ecbatane in Media, to give over the journey, without proceeding much further. This not so falling out: He caused the Wells and Springs in the Wilderness, through which his Enemy must pass, to be dammed up and spoiled. By which means, and the resistance before spoken of, when he could not prevail, He withdrew himself out of the way; suffering the Enemy to take his pleasure for a time, in wasting the Countrey: wherein without some Victory obtained, he could make no long abode. Antiochus hereby found, that Arfaces was nothing strongly provided for the War. Wherefore he marched through the heart of Parthia: and then forward into Hyrcania where he won Tambrace, the chief City of that Province. This indignity and many other losses, caused Arfaces at length, when he had gathered an Army that seemed strong enough, to adventure a battel.

The issue thereof was such as gave to neither of the Kings hope of accomplishing his desires, without exceeding difficulty. Wherefore Arfaces craved peace, and at length obtained it: Antiochus, thinking it not amiss, to make him a friend, whom he could not make a subject.

The next expedition of Antiochus, was against Euthydemus King of the Bactrians; one that indeed had not rebelled against him or his Ancestors: but having gotten the Kingdom from those that had rebelled, kept it himself. With Euthydemus he fought a battel by the River Aras, where he had the Victory. But the Victory was not so greatly to his honour, as was the testimony which he gave of his own private valour, in obtaining it. He was thought that day to have demeaned him more courageously, than did any one man in all his Army. His horse was slain under him; and he himself received a wound in his mouth, whereby he lost some of his teeth. As for Euthydemus, He withdrew himself back unto the furthestmost parts of his Kingdom, and afterwards persecuted the War, seeking how to end it by composition. So Embassadors passed between the Kings: Antiochus complaining, That a Countrey of his was unjustly usurped from him: Euthydemus answering, That he had won it from the children of the Usurper; and further, That the Bactrians, a wild Nation, could hardly be retained in order, save by a King of their own; for that they bordered upon the Scythians, with whom if they should join, it would be greatly to the danger of all the Provinces that lay behind them. These allegations, together with his own weariness, pacified Antiochus; and made him willing to grant Peace, upon reasonable Conditions. Demetrius, the son of Euthydemus, being a goodly Gentleman, and employed by his father, as Ambassador in this Treaty of Peace, was not a little available unto a good conclusion: for Antiochus liked him so well, that he promised to give him in marriage, one of his own daughters; and therewithal permitted Euthydemus to retain the Kingdom, causing him nevertheless to deliver up all his Elephants; as also to bind himself by oath, to such Covenants as he thought requisite.

So Antiochus leaving the Bactrian in quiet, made a journey over Caucasus, and came to the borders of India, where he renewed with Sophagennus, King of the Indians, the society that had been between their Ancestors. The Indians had remained subject unto the Macedonians for a little while, after Alexanders death. Emmius in his War against against Antigonus, raised part of his forces out of their Countrey. But when Antigonus (after his victory) turned Westward, and was overbused in a great Civill War: then did one Sandrocoltus, an Indian, stir up his Countrey-men to rebellion; making himself their Captain, and taking upon him, as protector of their liberty. This Office, and Title he soon changed, though not without some contention, into the Name and Majesty of a King. Finally he got unto himself (having an Army of six hundred thousand men) as not all India, yet as much of it as had been Alexanders. In this estate he had well contented himself, ere Seleucus Nicator could find leisure to call him to account. Neither did he faint, or humble himself at the coming of Seleucus; but met him in the field, as ready to defend his own, so strongly and well appointed, that the Macedonians were contented to make both peace and affinity with him, taking only a reward of fifty Elephants. This League, made by the Founders of the Indian and Syrian Kingdoms, was continued by some offices of love between their children, and now renewed by Antiochus: whose number of Elephants were increased thereupon, by the Indian King, to an hundred and fifty: as also he was promised, to have some treasure sent after him; which he left one to receive. Thus paired these two great Kings. Neither had the Indians, from this time forwards in many generations, any business worthy of remembrance with the Western countries. The posterity of Sandrocoltus is thought to have retained that Kingdom unto the dayes of Augustus Cæsar: to whom Pompey, then reigning in India, sent Embassadors with presents, and an Epistle written in Greek, wherein among other things, he said, That he had command over six hundred Kings. There is also found, scattered in sundry Authors, the mention of some which held that Kingdom, in divers Ages, even unto the time of Constantine the Great: being all peradventure of the same race. But Antiochus, who in this Treaty with Sophagennus carried himself as the worthier person, receiving presents, and after marching home through Drangiana and Germania, with such reputation, that all the Potentates, not only in the higher Asia, but on the higher side of Taurus, humbled themselves unto him, and called him The Great: saw an end of his own greatness within few years ensuing, by presuming to stand upon points with the Romans: whose Greatness was the same in deed, that his was only in seeming.

S. III.

The long reign of Ptolomy Philopater in Egypt: with the Tragical end of his favourites, when he was dead. Antiochus prepares to war on the young child Ptolomy Epiphanes, the son of Philopater. His resolution in preparing for divers wars at once. His voyage towards the Hellespont. He seeks to hold amity with the Romans, who make friendly shew to him; intending nevertheless to have war with him. His doings against the Hellespont; which the Romans made the first ground of their quarrel to him.

His expedition being finished, Antiochus had leisure to repose himself a while; and study which way to convert the terror of his puissance, for the enlargement of his Empire. Within two or three years Ptolomy Philopater died: leaving his son Ptolomy Epiphanes, a young Boy, his successor in the Kingdom: unlikely by him to be well defended against a neighbour so mighty and ambitious. This Ptolomy surnamed Philopater, that is to say, a lover of his Father, is thought to have had that surname given him in meer derision; as having made away both his Father and Mother. His young years being newly past, his childhood when he began to reign, may seem to discharge him of so horrible a crime, as his Fathers death: yet the beastliness of all his following life, makes him not unlike to have done any mischief, whereof he could be accused. Having won the battles at Raphiad, He gave himself over to sensuality, and was wholly governed by a Strumpet called Agathoclea. At her instigation He murdered his own wife and sister; which had adventured her self with him, in that only dangerous action by him undertaken and performed with honour. The Lieutenant-ships of his Provinces, with all Commands in his Army, and Offices whatsoever, were wholly referred unto the disposition of this Agathoclea, and her brother Agathocles, and Oenanthes a filthy bawd that was mother unto them both. So these three governed the Realm at their pleasure, to the great grief of all the Countrey, till Philopater died; who having reigned seventeen years, left none other son than Ptolomy Epiphanes, a child of five years old, begotten on Arsono that was his sister and wife. After the Kings death Agathocles began to take upon him, as protector of young Epiphanes, and Governour of the Land. He assembled the Macedons (which were the Kings ordinary forces in pay, not his beginnings; and took Seleucus Callinicus prisoner in battle, whom he royally entertained and dismissed. Hereby he won reputation as a lawful King: and by good government of his Country, procured unto himself such love of his Subjects, that his name was continued unto his successors, like as that of the Ptolomies in Egypt, and that of the Cæsars afterwards in Rome. §. III.

The last reign of Ptolomy Philopater in Egypt: with the tragical end of his favourites, when he was dead. Antiochus prepares to war on the young child Ptolomy Epiphanes, the son of Philopater. His irresolution in preparing for divers wars at once. His voyage towards the Hellespont. He seeks to hold amity with the Romans, who make friendly shew to him; intending nevertheless to have war with him. His doings against the Hellespont; which the Romans made the first ground of their quarrel to him.

THIS expedition being finished, Antiochus had leisure to repose himself a while; and study which way to convert the terror of his puissance, for the enlargement of his Empire. Within two or three years Ptolomy Philopater died: leaving his son Ptolomy Epiphanes, a young Boy, his successor in the Kingdom: unlikely by him to be well defended against a neighbour so mighty and ambitious. This Ptolomy furnished Philopater, that is to say, a lover of his Father, is thought to have had that surname given him in meer derision; as having made away both his Father and Mother. His young years being newly past, his childhood when he began to reign, may seem to discharge him of so horrible a crime, as his Fathers death: yet the beastliness of all his following life, makes him not unlike to have done any mischief, whereof he could be accused. Having won the battles at Raphiah, He gave himself over to sensuality, and was wholly governed by a Strumpet called Agathocles. At her instigation He murdered his own wife and sister; which had adventured her self with him, in that only dangerous action by him undertaken and performed with honour. The Lieutenant-ships of his Provinces, with all Commands in his Army, and Offices whatsoever, were wholly referred unto the disposition of this Agathocles, and her brother Agathocles, and Oenanthe a filthy bawd that was mother unto them both. So these three governed the Realm at their pleasure, to the great grief of all the Country, till Philopater died; who having reigned seventeen years, left none other son than Ptolomy Epiphanes, a child of five years old, begotten on Asione that was his sister and wife. After the Kings death Agathocles began to take upon him, as protector of young Epiphanes, and Governour of the Land. He assembled the Macedonians (which were the Kings ordinary forces in pay, not all born in Macedonia, but the race of those that abode in Egypt with Ptolemy the first, and would not be accounted Egyptians; as neither would the Kings themselves) and bringing forth unto them his sister Agathoclea, with the young King in her arms; began a solemn Oration. He told them, That the deceased Father of this their King, had committed the child into the arms of his sister; but unto the faith of them: on whose valiant right hands, the whole State of the Kingdom did now rely. He besought them therefore that they would be faithful, and as great need was, defend their King against the Treason of one Tlepolemus an ambitious man; who traitorously went about to let the Diadem upon his own head, being a meer stranger to the Royal blood. Herewithall he produced before them a witness, that should justify his accusation against Tlepolemus. Now though it were so, that he delivered all this with a fained passion of sorrow, and counterfeiting tears: yet the Macedons that heard him, regarded not any word that he spake; but stood laughing; and talking one to another, what a shameless dissembler he was to take so much upon him, as if he knew not how greatly he was hated. And so brake up the Assembly: he that had called it, being scarce aware how Agathocles therefore, whom the old Kings favour had made mighty, but neither wife nor well qualified, thought to go to work, as had formerly been his manner; by using his authority, to the suppression of those that he disaffected. He haled out of the Temple the mother-in-law of Tlepolemus; and cast her into prison. This filled Alexandria with rumours, and made the people (though accustomed to suffer greater things, whilst they were committed in the old Kings name) to meet in knots together, and utter one to another their minds, wherein they had conceived extrem hate, against these three pernicious Misgovernours of the old King. Besides their consideration of the present injurie done to Tlepolemus, they were somewhat also moved with fear of harm; which in way of requital, Tlepolemus was likely to do unto the City. For he was thought a man most unfit for Government, afterwards he proved, yet no bad Soldier, and well beloved of the Army. It was also then in his power, to stop the provision of victuals which was to come into Alexandria. As these motives wrought with the people, so by the remedy which Agathocles used, were the Macedons more hastily, and more violently stirred unto uproar. He secretly apprehended one of their number, whom he suspected of conspiracy against him; and delivered him unto a follower of his own, to be examined by torture. This poor Soldier was carried into an inner room of the Palace, and there stripped of all his apparel to be examined. But whilst the whips were brought forth, and all things even in a readiness for that purpose, there was brought unto the minister of Agathocles, a sad report of Tlepolemus being at hand. Hereupon the Braminels and his Torturers, one after another, went out of the room, leaving Markian the Soldier diet alone by himself, and the doors open. He perceiving this, naked as he was, weighed himself out of the Palace, and got unto the Macedons: by whom he found some in a Temple thereby standing. In the Macedons were as before in maintenance of their Privileges; as at the Turkish Carriers. Being assured therefore that some of their fellows had thus been used, they fellow Armes in a great rage, and began to foment the Palace: crying out, That they would sile the King, and not leave him in possession of a dangerous man. The whole multitude in the City, with loud clamours, made no less ado than the Soldiers, thought to less effect. So the old Bawd Oenanthia fled into a Temple: her Son and Daughter stayed in the Court, until the King was taken from them, and they, by his permission which he easily gave, and by appointment of those that now had him in their hands, delivered up to the fury of the people. Agathocles himself was stabbed to death, by some which therein did the Office of friends; though in manner of enemies. His sister was drag'd naked up and down the streets; as was also his mother, with all to them belonging; the enraged multitude committed upon them a barbarous execution of justice: biting them, pulling out their eyes, and tearing them in pieces.

These troubles in Egypt, served well to stir up King Antiochus, who had very good leisure, though he wanted all pretence, to make war upon young Ptolemy. Philip of Macedon had the same desire to get what part he could of the childes estate. But it hapned well, that Ptolemy Philopater in the Turkish War, which was now newly ended, had done many good offices unto the Romans. Unto them therefore the Egyptians addressed themselves, and craved help against these two Kings: who though they secretly malign'd one the other; yet had entered into covenant to divide between them all that belonged unto this Orphan; whose Father had been confederate with them both. So * M. Lepidus was sent from Rome, to protect from all violence the King of Egypt; especially against Antiochus. As for the Macedonian; he was very soon found busied with War at his own Doors. Also Scopas the Aetolian, being a Pensioner to the Egyptian, was sent into Greece to raise an Army of Mercenaries. What Lepidus did in Egypt, I do not find: and therefore think it not improbable, that he was sent thither only one of the three Embassadors, in the beginning of the War with Philip, as hath been shewed before. As for Scopas; he shortly after went up into Syria with his Army; where, winning many places, among the rest of his Acts, he subdued the Jews, who seem to have yielded themselves a little before unto Antiochus, at such time as they saw him prepare for his War, and despair'd of receiving help from Egypt. But it was not long ere all these Victories of Scopas came to nothing. For the very next year following, which was (according to Eusebius) the same year that Philip was beaten at Cyncephale; Antiochus vanquished Scopas in battel, and recovered all that had been lost. Among the rest, the Jews, with great willingness, returned under his obedience; and were therefore by him very gently entreated.

The Land of Egypt, this great King did forbear to invade; and gave it out, that he meant to bestow a Daughter of his own in Marriage unto Ptolemy: either hoping, as may seem, that the Country would willingly submit it self unto him, if this young Child should happen to miscarry; or else that greater purchase might be made in the Western parts of Asia, whilst Philip was held overlaboured by the Romans. It appears that he was very much distracted; hunting (as we say) two Hares at once with one Hound. The quarrels between Attalus, Philip, and the Greeks, promised to afford him great advantage, if he should bring his Army to the Hellespont. On the other side, the State of Egypt being such as hath been declared, seemed easily to be swallowed up at once. One while therefore he took what he could get in Syria: where all were willing (and the Jews, among the rest, though hitherto they had kept faith with the Egyptian) to yield him obedience. Another while, letting Egypt alone, he was about to make invasion upon Attalus his Kingdom; yet suffered himself easily to be persuaded by the Roman Embassadors, and desisted from that enterprise. Having thus far gratified the Romans; he sends Embassadors to the Senate, to conclude a perfect Amity between him and them. It is not lightly to be over-passed,

That these his Embassadors were lovingly entertained at Rome; and dismissed, with a Decree and answer of the Senate, altogether to the honour of King Antiochus. But this answer of the Romans was not sincere; being rather framed according to regard of the Kings good liking, than of their own intent. They had not yet made an end with Philip: neither would they gladly be troubled with two great Wars at once. Wherefore, not standing much upon the nice examination of what belonged unto their honour, they were content to give good words for the present. In the mean time Antiochus fights with Scopas in Syria, and shortly prepares to win some Towns elsewhere, belonging unto Ptolemy; yet whilst he sends an Army Westward, intending to make what profit he can of the distractions in Greece. Likewise it is considerable, as an argument of his much irresolution, how notwithstanding his attempts upon both of their Kingdoms, he offered one of his Daughters to Ptolemy, and another to Eumenes the Son of Attalus, newly King of Pergamus: seeking each of their friendships at one and the same time, when he fought to make of each of them a spoil. Thus was he acting and deliberating at once, being carried with an inexplicable desire of Repugnancies, which is a disease of great and over-swelling fortunes. Howsoever it was, he sent an Army to Sardes by Land, under two of his Sons: willing them there to stay for him; whilst he himself, with a Fleet of an hundred Gallies, and two hundred other Vessels, intended to pass along by the Coasts of Cilicia and Caria, taking in such places as held for the Egyptian. It was a notable act of the Rhodians, that, whilst the War of Philip lay yet upon their hands, they adventured upon this Great Antiochus. They sent unto him a proud Embassage; whereby they gave him to understand, That if he passed forward beyond a certain Promontory in Cilicia, they would meet with him, and fight with him; not for any quarrel of their own; but because he should not joyn with Philip their enemy, and help him against the Romans. It was insolently done of them, neither seemed it otherwise, to prescribe such limits unto the King: yet he tempered himself, and without any shew of indignation, gave a gentle answer; partly himself to their Embassadors; partly unto their whole City, by Embassadors which he thither sent. He shewed his desire to renew the ancient Confederacies between his Ancestors and them: and willed them not to be afraid, lest his coming should tend unto any hurt, either of them, or of their Confederates. As touching the the Romans whom they thought that he would molest: they were (he said) his very good Friends; whereof, he thought there needed no better proof, than the entertainment and answer by them newly given to his Embassadors.

The Rhodians appear to have been a cunning People, and such as could fore-see what weather was like to happen. This answer of the King, and the relation of what had passed between his Embassadors and the Senate, moved them not a whit, when they were informed shortly after, that the Macedonian War was ended at the Battel of Cynoscephale. They knew that Antiochus his turn would be next; and prepared to be forward on the stronger side. Wherefore they would not be contented to sit still, unless the Towns on the South Coast of Asia, belonging to Ptolemy their Friend and Confederate, were suffered to be at quiet. Herein also they did well; for that they had ever been greatly beholding to all the Race of the Ptolemies. They therefore in this time of necessity, gave what aid they could unto all the Subjects of the Egyptian in those parts. In like manner did King Eumenes, the Son of Attalus, prognosticate as concerning the War that followed, between Antiochus and the Romans. For when King Antiochus made a friendly offer, to bestow one of his Daughters upon him in marriage: He excused himself, and would not have her. Attalus and Phileteus his Brethren, wondered at this. But he told them, that the Romans would surely make war upon Antiochus; and therein finally prevail. Wherefore he said, that by abstaining from this affinity, it should be in his power to joyn with the Romans, and strengthen himself greatly with their friendship. Contrariwise, if he leaned to Antiochus, as he must be partaker in his overthrow; so was he sure to be oppressed by him, as by an over-mighty Neighbour, if he happened to win the Victory.

Antiochus himself wintred about Ephesus; where he took such order as he thought convenient for reducing of Smyrna and Lampiscus to obedience; that had usurped their Liberty, and oblatinately strove to maintain it, in hope that the Romans would protect them. In the beginning of the Spring he sailed unto the Hellespont; where, having won some Towns that Philip had gotten not long before this, he passed over into Europe; and in short space mastered the Chersonesus. Thence went he to Lyfymachia: which the Thracians had gotten and destroyed, when Philip withdrew his Garrison thence, to employ it in the Roman War. The Et-lians objected as a crime unto Philip, in the conference between T. Quintius, that he had oppressed Lyfymachia, by thrusting therein a Garrison. Hereupon Philip made answer, That his Garrison did not oppress the Town, but save it from the Barbarians: who took and sack'd it, as soon as the Macedonians were gone. That this answer was good and substantial, though it were not acceptable as such; might appear by the miserable case, in which Antiochus found Lyfymachia at his coming thither. For the Town was utterly rased by the Barbarians; and the people carried away into slavery. Wherefore the King took order to have it re-edified: as also to redeem those that were in bondage; and to recollect as many of the Citizens as were dispersed in the Country thereabout. Likewise he was careful to allure thither, by hopeful promises, new Inhabitants, and to replenish the City with wonted frequency. Now to the end that men should not be terrified from coming thither to dwell, by any fear of the neighbour Thracians: he took a journey in hand against those barbarous people, with the one half of his Army; leaving the other half to repair the City. These pains he took, partly in regard of the convenient situation, and former glory of Lyfymachia; partly for that he thought it highly redounding unto his own honour, to recover and establish the Dominion in those parts which his forefather Seleucus Nicator had won from Lyfymachus, and thereby made his Kingdom of greater extent than it occupied in any following time. But for this ambition he shall dearly pay: and as after that Victory against Lyfymachus, the death of King Seleucus followed shortly; so shall a deadly wound of the Kingdom founded by Seleucus ensue very speedily after the reconquest of the same Country, which was the last of Seleucus his Purchases.

§. IV.

The Romans hold friendly correspondence with Antiochus, during their War with Philip; after which they quarrel with him. The doings of Hannibal at Carthage: whence he is chased by his Enemies, and by the Romans: His flight unto the King Antiochus. The Etolians murmur against the Romans in Greece. The War of the Romans and Achæans, with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon. The departure of the Romans out of Greece. T. Quintius his Triumph. Peace denied to Antiochus by the Romans.

For the Romans, though they were unable to smother their desire of war with with Antiochus, whereof notice was already taken both by their friends and by their enemies: yet was it much against their will to keep the rumour on foot, which they meant shortly to make good, of this intended war, so long as they wanted matter of quarrel; whereof they were furnished, by this enterprise of the Kings about Lyfymachia. It was not long, since King Attalus, a friend and a helper of the Romans in their war with Philip, could obtain of them none other help against Antiochus, than Embassadors to speak for him, because the one of these Kings was held no less a friend than the other. Neither did there afterwards pass between them any other offices, than very friendly. Antiochus at the request of their Embassadors, withdrew his levation from the Kingdom of Pergamus: also very shortly after he sent Embassadors to them, to make a perfect League of amity between them. This was whilst as yet they were busied with Philip, and therefore had reason to answer his good will with good acceptance: as they did in outward shew. But when the Macedonian war was at an end, and all, or most of all the States in Greece, were become little better than Clients unto the Romans: then was all this good correspondence changed into terms of worse, but more plain meaning. For T. Quintius, with his ten Counsellors sent from Rome, required (as hath been shewed before) with a commination of war, this Kings gratulation of their victory; as also his long professed amity, and desire to continue in the same.

These ten Counsellors were able to inform T. Quintius, and acquaint him with the purpose of the Senate: whereof yet it seems that he was not ignorant before; since, in regard of Antiochus, he was the more inclinable unto peace with Philip. It was therefore agreed, when they divided themselves to make progress through divers quarters of Greece for the execution of their late Decree, That two of them should visit King Antiochus; and the rest, where occasion served, use diligence to make a party strong against him. Neither was the Senate at Rome unmindful of the business; wherein left T. Quintius, with his ten Assistants, should happen to forget any thing to their parts belonging; L. Cornelius was sent from Rome, of purpose to deal with the King about those controversies, that were between him and Ptolemy. What other private instructions Cornelius had, we may conjecture by the managing of this his Embassy. For coming to Selymbria: and there understanding that P. Villius and L. Terentius, having been sent by Titus, were at Lyfymachia, He hastened thither; whither also came P. Lentulus (another of the ten Counsellors) from Selymbria, to be present at the Conference. Hegesias and Lyfius were also there; the same, who had lately brought from Titus those peremptory Conditions, which the Embassadors present shall expound unto their Master. After a few daies Antiochus returned from his Thracian Expedition. The meeting and entertainment between them, and these Romans, was in appearance full of love. But when they came to treat of the business in hand; this good mood was quite altered. L. Cornelius, in two or three words, briefly delivered his errand from Rome; which was, That Antiochus had reason to deliver back unto Ptolemy those Towns of his, whereof he had lately gotten possession. Hereunto he added, and that very earnestly, That he must also give up the Towns of late belonging unto Philip; and by him newly occupied. For what could be more absurd, than such folly in the Romans; as to let Antiochus enjoy the profit of that war, whereas they had laboured so much, and he done nothing? Further he warned the King, that he should not molest those Cities that were free: and finally he demanded of him, upon what reason he was come over with so great an Army into Europe; for that, other cause of his journey there was none probable, than a purpose to make war upon the Romans? To this the King made answer, That he wondered why the Romans should so trouble themselves, with thinking upon the matters of Asia: wherewith he prayed them to let him alone; even as he; with such curiosity, suffered them to do, in Italy what they thought good. As for his coming over into Europe; they saw well enough what business had drawn him thither; namely the war against the barbarous Thracians: the rebuilding of Lyfymachia, and the recovery of Towns to him belonging, in Thrace, and Chersonesus. Now concerning his title unto that country, He derived it from Seleucus: who made conquest thereof, by his victory against Lyfymachus. Neither was it so, that any of the places in controversy between him and the other Kings, had been still of old belonging to the Macedonians or Egyptians; but had been seized on by them, or by others from whom they received them, at such time as his Ancestors, being Lords of those Countries, were hindered by multiplicity of business, from looking unto all that was their own. Finally he willed them, neither to stand in fear of him, as if he intended ought against them from Lysimachia; since it was his purpose to bestow this City upon one of his Sons, that should reign therein: nor yet to be grieved with his proceedings in Asia; either against the free Cities, or against the King of Egypt; since it was his meaning to make the free Cities beholden unto himself, and to join ere long with Ptolomy, not only in friendship, but in a bond of near affinity. Cornelius having heard this, and being perhaps unable to refuse it, would needs hear further, what the Embassadors of Smyrna and of Lampsacus, whom he had there with him, could say for themselves. The Embassadors of Lampsacus being called in, began a tale; wherein they seemed to accuse the King before the Romans; as it were before competent Judges. Antiochus therefore interrupted them, and bade them hold their peace, so far as much as he had not chosen the Romans, but would rather take the Citizens of Rhodes; to be Arbitrators between him and them.

Thus the Treaty held some few days, without any likelihood of effect. The Romans, having not laid their complaints in such sort, as they might be a convenient foundation of the war by them intended: nor yet having purpose to depart well satisfied, and thereby to corroborate the present peace, were doubtful how to order the matter, in such wise as they might neither too rudely, like boisterous Gallo-Greeks, pretend only the goodness of their words: nor yet over-moderately, to retain among the Greeks an opinion of their justice; forbear the occasion of making themselves great. The King on the other side was weary of these tedious guests, that would take none answer, and yet scarce knew what to say. At length came news, without any certain author, That Ptolomy was dead: Hereof neither the King, nor the Romans, would take notice, though each of them were desirous to hasten into Egypt: Antiochus to take possession of the Kingdom, and L. Cornelius, to prevent him thereof, and set the Country in good order. Cornelius was sent from Rome Ambassador both to Antiochus and to Ptolomy: which gave him occasion to take leave, and prepare for his Egyptian voyage. Both he, and his fellow Embassadors, had good leave to depart all together: and the King forthwith made ready, to be in Egypt with the first. To his Son Seleucus he committed his Army, and left him to oversee the building of Lysimachia: but all his Sea-forces he took along with him, and sailed unto Ephefus. Thence he sent Embassadors to T. Quintius: whom he requested to deal with him in this matter of peace, after such sort as might stand with honesty and good faith. But as he was further proceeding on his voyage, he was perfectly informed that Ptolomy was alive. This made him bear another way from Egypt: and afterwards a tempest, with a grievous shipwreck, made him without any further attempt on the way, glad to have safely recovered his Port of Schela. Thence went he to Antiochia, where he wintered: secure as might appear, of the Roman war.

But the Romans had not so done with him. During the Treaty at Lysimachia, (at least, not long before or after it) one of their Embassadors that had been sent unto the Macedonian, gave him counsel, as in a point highly tending to his good; not to rest contented with the peace, which was granted unto him by the Romans, but to desire society with them, whereby they should be bound to have the same friends and enemies. And this he advised him to do quickly, before the War brake out with Antiochus: lest otherwise he might seem, to have awaited some fit occasion of taking Arms again. They who dealt thus plainly, did not mean to be satisfied with weak excuses. In like manner some of the Greeks, were solicited; and particularly the Asians, That constantly and faithfully they should abide in the friendship of the people of Rome. It was needful to say plainly whereto this treaty tended: the froward answer made by the Asians, declares them to have well understood the purpose. They complained, that they were not alike honoured by the Romans after the victory, as they had been during the War. They that so complained were the most moderate of them. Others cried out that they had been wronged, and defrauded of what was promised unto them: upbraiding withal the Romans, as men to them beholding: not only for their victory over Philip, but even for helping them to set foot in Greece, which else they never could have done. Hereto the Roman gave gentle answers: telling them that there was no more to do, than to send Embassadors to the Senate, and utter their griefs: and then should all be well.

Such care took the Romans in Greece, for their War intended against Antiochus. The same hereof arriving at Carthage, gave matter unto the enemies of Hannibal, wherewith both to pick a thank of the Roman Senate, and to chase out of their City this honourable man, whom they so greatly hated. He had of late exercised his virtue against them in the Civil administration: and given them an overthrow, or two, in the long Robe. The Judges at that time bore all the sway in Carthage: holding their places during life; and having subject unto them, the lives, goods, and fame of all the rest. Neither did they use this their power with moderation; but conspired in such wise together, that who so offended any of them, should have them all to be his enemies: which being once known, He was sure to be soon accused and condemned. In this their impotent rule of the City, Hannibal was chosen Prætor. By virtue of which Office, though he was superior unto them during that year: yet had it not been their manner to bear much regard unto such an annual Magistracy, as at the years end must be accountable to them, if ought were laid unto his charge. Hannibal therefore sending for one of the Questors, or Officers of the Treasury, to come and speak with him: the proud Questor set lightly thereby, and would not come: For he was of the adverse Faction to Hannibal: and men of his place were to be chosen into the Order of Judges: in contemplation whereof, he was filled already with the spirit of future Greatness. But he had not to do with such a tame Prætor, as were they that had occupied the place before. Hannibal sent for him by a Purveyor; and having thus apprehended him, brought him into judgement before a publick assembly of the people. There he not only shewed what the undutiful stubbornness of this Questor had been; but how unsufferable the insolency of all the Judges at the present was: whose unbridled power made them to regard neither Laws nor Magistrates. To this Oration when he perceived that all the Citizens were attentive and favourable; He forthwith propounded a Law, which passed with the general good liking: That the Judges should be chosen from year to year, and no one man be continued in that Office two years together. If this Law had been passed, before he passed over Iberus: it would not perhaps have been in the power of Hanno, to have brought him unto necessity of reforming another grievance, concerning the Roman Tribute. This Tribute the Carthaginians were fain to levie by Taxation laid upon the whole Commonalty, as wanting money in their publick Treasury, wherewith to defray either that, or divers other needful charges. Hannibal considering this, began to examine the publick Revenues; and to take a perfect note, both how much came into the Treasury, by waies and means whatsoever: and in what sort it was thence laid out. So he found, That the ordinary charges of the Common wealth did not exhaust the Treasury: but that wicked Magistrates, and corrupt Officers, turning the greatest part of the moneys to their own use, were thereby fain to load the people with needles burdens. Hereof he made such plain demonstration, That these Robbers of the common Treasure were compelled to restore, with shame, what they had gotten by knavery: and so the Carthaginians were freed from the necessity of making such poor shifts, as formerly they had used, when they knew not the value of their own Estate. But as the virtue of Hannibal was highly commended by all that were good Citizens: so they of the Roman Faction, which had, since the making of the peace until now, little regarded him, began to rage extremely: as being by him strip of their ill-gotten goods and ill-employed authority, both at once, even when they thought themselves to have been in full possession of the vanquished Carthage. Wherefore they sent letters to their friends at Rome: wherein they complained, as if the Barchine Faction grew strong again, and Hannibal would shortly be in arms. Questionless, if oppressing the City by injustice, and robbing the Treasury, were the only way to hold Carthage in peace with Rome: these Enemies to the Barchines might well cry out, That having done their best already to keep all in quiet, they saw none other likelihood than of War. But having no other matter to alledge, than their own inventions: they said, That Hannibal was like unto a wild beast, which would never be tamed; That secret messages past between him, and King Antiochus: and that he was wont to complain of idleness, as if it were harmful to Carthage; with what else like else they could imagine. These accusations they directed not unto the Senate: but addressing their letters craftily, every one to the best of his own friends at Rome, and such as were Senators; they wrought so well, that neither publick notice of their Conspiracy was taken at Carthage; nor the authority of the Roman Senate, wanting to the furtherance of their malicious purpose. Only P. Scipio is said to have admonished the Fathers, that they should not thus dishonourably subscribe, and become seconds to the accusers of Hannibal: as if they would oppress, by suborning or countenancing false witnesses against him; the man, against whom in war they had not of long time prevailed, nor used their victory in such base manner, when they obtained it. But the Romans were not not all so great minded as Scipio : they wished for some such advantage against Hannibal, and were glad to have found it. Three Embassadors they sent over to Carthage, C. Serrilius, Q. Terentius, and M. Claudius Marcellus : whose very names imports sufficient cause of bad affection to Hannibal. These having pass'd the Sea, were entertained by those that had procur'd their coming : and being by them instructed how to carry themselves, gave out, That they were sent to end some controversies, between the Carthaginians and Masaniissa. But Hannibal had kept such good eipial upon the Romans, that he knew their meaning well enough : against which he was never unprepared. It were enough to say, That he escap'd them by flight : but in the actions of so famous a man, I hold it not impertinent to rehearse the particularities. Having openly shew'd himself, as was his manner, in the place of Assembly, He went forth of the Town when it began to wax dark, accompanied with two which were ignorant of his determination : though such as he might well trust. He had appointed Horfes to be in a readiness at a certain place : whence riding all night, He came to a Tower of his own by the Sea-side. There had he a ship furnished withall things needful : as having long expected the necessity of some such journey. So he bade Affick farewell ; lamenting the misfortune of his Country, more than his own. Passing over to the Isle of Cercina ; He found there in the Haven some Merchants ships of Carthage. They saluted him respectively : and the chief among them began to enquire, whither he was bound. He said He went Embassadors to Tyre : and that he intended there in the Island to make a Sacrifice ; whereto he invited all the Merchants, and Masters of the Ships. It was hot weather : and therefore he would needs hold his Feast upon the shore ; where, because there wanted covert, He made them bring thither all their Sails and Yards to be used instead of Tents. They did so ; and feasted with him till it was late at night : at which time he left them there asleep : and putting to Sea, held on his course to Tyre. All that night, and the day following, He was sure not to be pursued. For the Merchants did neither make halt to send any news of him to Carthage, as thinking him to be gone Embassadors : neither could they, without some loss of time, such of them as made most speed homeward, get away from Cercina ; being busied a while in fitting their tackle. At Carthage, the mis of so great a person was diversely construed. Some guessed aright, that he was fled. But the more common opinion was, That the Romans had made him away. At length came news where he had been seen ; and then the Roman Embassadors, having none other errand thither, accus'd him (with an evil grace) as a troubler of the Peace ; whereby they only discover'd the mischief by them intended against him, and the malice of the Senate : missing the while their purpose, and causing men to understand, that he fled not thus without great reason.

Hannibal coming to Tyre, the Mother-City of Carthage, was there entertained Royally : as one, in whose great worth and honour the Tyrians, by reason of affinity between their Cities, thought themselves to have interest. Thence went he to Antioch ; and, finding the King departed, visited his Son in Daphne : who friendly welcomed him, and sent him unto his Father at Ephesus, that exceedingly rejoiced at his coming.

As Antiochus had cause to be glad in that he had gotten Hannibal : so had the Romans no great cause to be therefore sorry : otherwise than as they had much disgrac'd themselves, by discovery of their impotent malice, in chasing him thus out of his Country. For it would not prove like easie unto this great Commander to make stout Soldiers of base Affatques ; as it had been by his training and discipline, to make very serviceable and skilful men of War of the Spaniards, Africans, Gauls, and other Nations ; that were hardy, though unexperienced. Or were it supposed, that one mans worth, especially being so extraordinary, could alter the nature of a cowardly people : yet was it therewithal considerable, that the vanities of Antiochus, the pride of his Court, the baseness of his Flatterers, and thousand other such vexations, would be far more powerful in making unprofitable the virtue of Hannibal, now a desolate and banished man, than had been the villany of Hanno and his Complices, hindering him in those actions, wherein he had the high Command, and was seconded by his warlike brethren. Wherefore the name of this Great Carthaginian, would only help to ennoble the Roman Victory : or if it further served to hearten Antiochus, and make him less careful to avoid the war ; then should it further serve, to justify the Romans in their quarrel. And it seems indeed that it was no little part of their care, to get a fair pretence of making war. For Antiochus, as is said before, having newly sent Embassadors to T. Quintius, requiring that the Peace might faithfully be kept : it was not probable, that he had any meaning to take Arms, unless by meer violence he were thereto enforced. Only the Atolians were greatly suspected, as a turbulent people, delirious of innovation, and therefore practising with this Great King ; whom they wished to see among them in Greece. In this regard, and to appease them ; they had of late been answered with gentle words by one of the ten Counsellors, That the Senate would grant them whatsoever with reason they should ask. But this promise was too large, and unadvised. For when their Embassadors came to Rome, the Senate would grant them nothing : but wholly referred them to T. Quintius, who favoured them least. Hereat they murmured, but knew not how to right themselves, otherwise than by speaking such words, as might hasten the Romans out of Greece for very shame, who had no desire to be thence gone.

The daily talk at Rome, was, of War with Antiochus ; but in Greece, when the Romans would leave the Country. For the Atolians were wont to upbraid the rest of the Greeks with the vain liberty which the Romans had proclaimed, saying, That these their Deliverers had lain heavier Fetters upon them, than formerly they did wear ; but yet brighter and fairer than those of the Macedonian : likewise, that it was a gracious act of Titus, to take from the Legs of the Greeks their chain, & tie it about their Necks. There was indeed no cause of tarrying longer in Greece, if the Romans had no other meaning than what they pretended. For Philip had made no delay, in accomplishment of that which was laid upon him : all the Towns of Greece were at liberty, and the whole Country at peace, both with the Romans, and within itself. As for Antiochus, He made it his daily suit, That the Peace between him and Rome, such as it was, might be confirmed and strengthened by a League of more assurance. Nevertheless, T. Quintius would needs fear that Antiochus meant forthwith to seize upon Greece, as soon as he and his Army were thence departed. And in this regard, he retained still in his own hands Chalcis, Demetrius, and the Acrocorinthus : by benefit of which Towns he might the better withstand the dangerous Invasion like to be made by Antiochus. Suitable unto the doings of Quintius, were the reports of the ten Embassadors, that had been sent over to assist him : when they returned back into the City. Antiochus, they said, would questionless fall upon Greece : wherein he should find not only the Atolians, but Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedemon, ready to give him entertainment. Wherefore there was none other way, than to do somewhat against these their suspected Enemies : especially against Nabis, who could worst make resistance : whilst Antiochus was far away in Syria, and not intensitive to his business. These reports went not only current through the City among the Vulgar ; but found such credit with the chief of the Senate, that in the following year, against which time it was expected that Antiochus should be ready to take his great enterprise in hand : P. Cornelius Scipio the African, desired, and obtained, a second Consulship, with intention to be General in the War, against the King and his Hannibal. For the present, the business with Nabis was referred unto Titus, to deal with him as he thought good. This would be a fair colour of his longer tarryance in Greece. Therefore he was glad of the employment : whereof also he knew that many of the Greeks would not be sorry : though for his own part, he wanted all good pretence of taking it in hand. For Nabis had entered into friendship with him, two or three years before this, as is already shewed, whilst he had War with Philip : and had further been contented for the Romans sake to be at peace with the Acheans : neither since that time had he done any thing, whereby he should draw upon himself this War. He was indeed a detestable Tyrant, and hated of the Acheans : as one, that besides his own wicked Conditions, had formerly done to them great mischief. Titus therefore had a plausible Theme whereon to discourse before the Embassadors of all the Confederate Cities, which he caused to meet for that purpose at Corinth. He told them that in the War with Philip, not only the Greeks, but the Romans themselves had each their motives apart (which he there briefly rehearsed) that should stir them up, and cause them to be earnest. But in this which he now propounded to them concerning Nabis, the Romans had none other Interest, than only the making perfect of their Honour, in setting all Greece at Liberty : which Noble Action was in some sort maimed, or incomplete, whilst the Noble City of Argos was left in subjection to a Tyrant that had lately occupied it. It therefore belonged unto them, the Greeks, duly to consider, whether they thought the deliverance of Argos a matter worthy to be undertaken : or whether otherwise to avoid all further trouble, they could be well contented to leave it as it was. This concerned them, and not the Romans : who in taking this work in hand, or letting it alone, would wholly be ruled by the Greeks themselves.

themselves. The Athenian Ambassador made answer hereunto very eloquently, and as pleasing as he could devise. He gave thanks to the Romans for what was past; extolled their Virtues at large; and magnified them highly in regard of this their proposition: wherein unrequested they freely made offer to continue that Bounty, which at the vehement request of their poor Associates they had already of late extended unto the Greeks. To this he added, That great pity it was to hear such notable Vertue and high Deserts ill spoken of by some: which took upon them, out of their own imagination, to foretell what harm these their Benefactors meant to do hereafter: when as Thankfulness would rather have required an Acknowledgement of the Benefits and Pleasures already received. Every one found the meaning of this last clause, which was directly against the Ætoliens. Wherefore Alexander the Ætolian rose up, and told the Athenians their own: putting them in mind of their ancient glory, in those times when their City had been the Leader of all Greece, for defence and recovery of the Liberty general: from which Honour they were now so far fallen, that they became Parasites unto those whom they thought most mighty; and by their base assentation, would lead all the rest into servitude. Then spake he against the Acheans, Clients that had been a long time unto the Macedonian; and Souldiers of Philip, until they ran away from his adversity. These, he said, had gotten Corinth, and meant now have War be made for their sakes, to the end that they might also be Lords of Argos: whereas the Ætoliens, that had first made War with Philip, and always been Friends unto the Romans, were now defrauded of some places, antiently to them belonging. Neither did he thus contain himself, but objected unto the Romans, fraudulent dealing: so far as much as they kept their Garrisons in Demetrias, Chalcis, and the Acrocorinth; having been always wont to profess, That Greece could never be at Liberty, whilst those places were not free. Also now at last, what else did they seek by this discourse of War with Nabis, than businesses wherewith to find themselves occupied, that so they might have some seeming cause of abiding longer in the Country? But they should do well, if they meant as they spake, to carry their Legions home out of Greece, which could not indeed be free, till their departure. As for Nabis, the Ætoliens themselves did promise, and would undertake, That they would either cause him to yield to reason, and relinquish Argos freely, withdrawing thence his Garrison; or else compell him by force of Arms, to submit himself to the good pleasure of all Greece, that was now at unity. These words had been reasonable, if they had proceeded from better men. But it was apparent, that no regard of the common Liberty wrought so much with these Ætoliens, as did their own ravenous desire of oppressing others, and getting unto themselves, that worse would use it, the whole Dominion in Greece, which Philip had lost. Neither could they well dissemble this; making it no small part of their Grievance, That the old League was forgotten: wherein it had been covenanted, That the Romans should enjoy the Spoil of all, but leave the Towns and Lands in possession of the Ætoliens. This, and the remembrance of a thousand mischiefs by them done in former times, made the whole Assembly, especially the Acheans, cry out upon them: entreating the Romans to take such order before they went, that not only Nabis might be compelled to do right; but the Ætolian thieves be enforced to keep home, and leave their neighbours in quiet. All this was highly to the pleasure of Titus: who saw, that by discountenancing the Ætoliens, He was become the more gracious with all the rest. But whether it pleased him so well that Antiochus his Embassadors did presently after lie hard upon him, to draw the peace to some good conclusion, it may be greatly doubted. He cast them off with a slight answer: telling them, That the ten Embassadors or Counsellors which had been sent unto him from Rome, to be his Assistants in these matters of weight, were now returned home; and that without them it was not in his power to conclude upon any thing.

Now concerning the Lacedemonians, War, it was very soon ended. For Titus used the help of all his Confederates; and made as great preparation against Nabis, both by Land and Sea, as if he should have had to do with Philip. Besides the Roman Forces, King Emmenes with a Navy, and the Rhodian Fleet, were invited to the Service: as also Philip of Macedon sent aid by Land; doing therein poorly, whether it were to get favour of the Romans; or whether to make one among the number, in seeking Revenge upon Nabis, that had done him injury. But the most forward in this Expedition were the Acheans, who set out ten thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse. As for the Ætoliens, rather to hold good fashion, and found their dispositions, than in hope to speed, their help was required; whereof they excused themselves as well as they thought best. Thus are the

the Acheans now become the prime friends of the Romans in Greece; having removed the Ætoliens from that degree of favour: like as they themselves hereafter (though not in all haste) shall be supplanted of the same Lacedemonians, against whom they are now marching.

Some of the Argives, more bold than wife, began a conspiracy against the Lacedemonians that held their Town; meaning to open their gates unto the Roman. But ere Titus drew near, they were all detected and slain: excepting a very few, that escaped out of the Town. The fame of this Commotion, caused the Army to march apace toward Argos; with hope to be there, before things were quiet. But there was no stir within the Walls: the execution done upon the first movers, having terrified all the rest of the Citizens. Titus then thought it better, to assail Nabis in the head of his strength at Lacedemon, than to consume time about other places; especially at Argos: for the freedom whereof since the War was made, pity it were, that the calamities of the War should thereon fall most heavily.

Nabis had in readiness an Army of fifteen thousand, wherewith to defend himself against these Invaders. Five thousand of them were Mercenaries: the rest, of his own Country; but such as were of all others the worst, as manumitted slaves, malefactors and base Peasants, unto whom his Tyranny was beneficial. Of the good and worthy Citizens he stood in doubt; and since he could not hope to win their love, his meaning was to hold them quiet by fear. He called them all to an assembly, and compassing them round in with his Army, told them of the danger that was toward him and them. If they could agree within themselves; they might, he said, hope the better to withstand the common Enemy. But so far as much as turbulent heads were invited by light occasions, to raise tumults, and work dangerous treasons: it seemed unto him the safest, and (withal) the mildest course, to arrest before hand, and put in ward, all those whom he found most reason to suspect. So should he keep them innocent perforce; and thereby preserve not only the City and his own person from danger, but them also from the punishment, which else they might have incurred. Hereupon he cites and apprehends about fourscore of them; whom he leads away to prison, and the next night putteth them all to death. Thus was he sure that they neither should offend, nor yet break loose. As for the death of them, if it should happen to be noised abroad: what could it else do than terrify the people; who must thereby understand, that it was a mortal crime to be suspected? And to the same purpose his cruelty extended it self unto some poor wretches: whom he accused of a meaning to flee to the Enemy. These were openly whipt through all the streets, and slain. Having thus affrighted the Citizens: He returned the more freely, all his thoughts toward the Enemy, that came on apace. He welcomed them with a rally: wherein, as commonly happens, the Souldiers of the Town had the better at first; but were at length repelled with loss. Titus abode not many days before Sparta; but over-ran the Country; hoping belike to provoke the Tyrant forth to battail. The Roman Fleet at the same time with King Emmenes and the Rhodians, laid siege unto Gythium, the only or principal Town that Nabis had. Likely they were to have taken it by force, when there appeared hope of getting it by treason. There were two Governours within the Town equal in authority: whereof the one, either for fear, or desire of reward, had a purpose to let in the Romans. But the other finding what was in hand, and being somewhat more faithful, slew the Traitors: after whose death, he himself alone made the better defence. Yet when T. Quintius with part of his Army came thither to Gythium: this Captain of the Town had not the heart to abide the uttermost, and await what either Time or his Master might do for him, but was contented to give up the place, yet upon Condition, to depart in safety to Sparta with his Garrison. Pythagoras, the Son-in-law of Nabis, and brother unto his Wife, was come from Argos, whereof he had the Government; with a thousand Souldiers Mercenaries, and two thousand Argives: it being (as may seem) the Tyrants purpose, to relieve Gythium: which he thought would have held longer out. But when they heard that it was lost, then began they to think upon finishing the War, by some reasonable Composition. Pythagoras therefore was sent his Embassador to Titus: requesting only that he would appoint a time and place for Nabis to meet and speak with him. This was granted. In that Parlee the Tyrant spake very reasonable for himself: proving, that he suffered wrong, and had done none, and that by many good arguments: whereof the sum was, That whatsoever they now did, or could object unto him, was of older date than the League which they had made with him. Whereupon the inferred, That neither for his keeping the Town of Argos, nor for any other cause by them

alleged, they ought to make war upon him, since Argos, and all other their allegations whatsoever, had not hindered them, in time of their own need of him, from entering into that League with him: which was never broken on his part, nor ought to be on theirs. But Quintius was not herewith satisfied. He charged him with tyranny: and gave instance, as easily he might, of divers barbarous cruelties by him committed. In all which points so far as they knew this Nabis to be guilty, before they made Peace and Confederacy with him; it was expedient, that some other cause of this Invasion should be alleged. Whereto he said further, That this Tyrant had occupied Messene, a Town Confederate with the Romans: That he had bargained to join with Philip; when he was their enemy, not only in League, but also in affinity: and that his Fleet had robbed many of their ships, about the Cape of Malea. Now touching this Piracy, since in the Articles by Titus propounded unto Nabis, there was no restitution mentioned, other than of ships, by him taken from the Greeks his neighbours, with home he had long held war: it may seem to have been objected, only by way of Complement, and to enlarge the volume of those complaints, that were otherwise very frivolous. As for Messene, and the bargain of Alliance made with Philip: they were matters foregoing the League, that was made between the Romans and this Tyrant: and therefore not to have been mentioned. All this it seems that Ariflanus, the Prætor of the Acheans, very well perceived: who therefore doubting lest the Romans (that were wont to talk to much of their own justice, honour, and faithfull dealing) should now relent, and forbear to molest him, who, though a wicked man, was yet their Confederate, and had never done them wrong: framed his discourse to another end. He entreated Nabis to consider well of his own estate: and to settle his fortunes, whilst he might do it without hazard: alledging the examples of many Tyrants that had ruled in the neighbourhoods, and therein committed great outrages; yet were afterwards contented to surrender their Estates, and lived in great security, honour, and happiness, as private men. Thus they discoursed until night. The next day Nabis was contented to relinquish Argos; and requested them, to deliver unto him in writing their other commands, that he might take counsel with his friends. The issue of all was, that, in regard of the charges, wherewith the Confederates must be, for maintenance of an Army to lie in Leaguer all that Winter (as there was no hope of making short work) before the City of Sparta: they were contented to make peace with the Tyrant, upon such Conditions as Titus should think meet. Besides the restitution of Argos, and all the places thereon depending; Titus propounded many other Conditions to Nabis, and some of them very grievous. He would not suffer the Lacedæmonians to have ought to do in the Isle of Crete; no, nor to make any Confederacies, nor war, either in that Island or elsewhere; nor to build any Town or Castle upon his own Lands: not to keep any other shipping, than two small Barks; besides many other troublesome injunctions; with imposition of an hundred talents in silver to be paid out of hand, and fifty talents yearly, for eight years next ensuing. For observance of these Covenants he demanded five hostages, (such as he himself should name; and one of them to be the Tyrant's own Son. If it had been the meaning of Titus, to withdraw the war from Nabis, because it was not grounded upon justice: then had it been enough, if not more than enough, to take Argos from him; which he himself did offer, though it were for fear, to deliver up. But if it were thought reasonable, to dispense a little with the Roman faith, in regard of the great benefit which thereby might redound unto the state of their best friends in Greece, by the extirpation of this Tyranny: then should this enterprise, when once it was taken in hand, have been prosecuted unto the very utmost. As for this middle course which the Romans held: as it was not honourable unto them, to enrich themselves by the spoil of one that had not offended them; nor pleasing to the Acheans, who judged it ever after a great blemish to the noble acts of Titus: so did it minister unto the Ætolians, and to such as curiously pried into the faults of those which took upon them to be Patrons of Greece, no barren subject of malicious discourse. For since Philip, a King, and descended of many famous Kings, might not be suffered by these Masterly Romans, to hold any one of those Countreys or Towns in Greece, that had belonged unto his Ancestors: it was thought very strange, that Lacedæmon, once the most famous City among all the Greeks, was by the same Romans left in possession of a Tyrant, that had usurped it but yesterday; and he therein rooted by their authority, as their friend and Confederate. Nabis on the other side thought himself unmercifully dealt withall, by the self-same Romans, whose amity he had preferred in time of a doubtful war, before the love and affinity affinity of the Macedonian King, that had committed the City of Argos into his hands. But finally had he dealt with the Macedonian; and finally was he dealt with by those, to whom he did betake himself. Among these Articles propounded, there was nothing that pleased him, save only that for the banished Lacedæmonians, (of whom a great number were in the Roman Camp; having among them Agæstolis the natural King of Sparta, that being a young child was driven out by Lycorgus the first of the Tyrants) there was made no provision, to have them restored unto their City and Estates; but only leave required for as many of their wives, as would be so contented, to live abroad with them in banishment. Wherefore he forbore to give consent unto these demands; and sustained an assault or two; hoping belike that the enemies would soon be weary. But his fearful nature shortly overcame the resolution, which the sense of these injuries had put into him. So yielding unto all that had been propounded, He delivered the hostages; and thereupon obtained peace, that was confirmed afterwards at Rome by the Senate and People. From this time forward, He thought the Romans far more wicked than himself; and was ready upon the first advantage, to do them all the mischief that he could.

The Argives had heard news that Lacedæmon was even at point of being taken. This excited them, and gave them heart to think upon their own good. So they adventured to set upon the Garrison; which was much weakened, by the remove of the three thousand carried thence by Pylægoras to help the Tyrant at Sparta. There needed upon their liberty no more, than that all of them jointly should set their hands to the getting of it, which no sooner they did than they obtained it. Presently after this came Z. Quintus to Argos, where he was joyfully welcomed. He was deservedly acknowledged as author of that benefit, wherewith the Citizens had laid hold without staying fighting; and that he might the better entitle himself thereto, he caused the liberty of the Argives to be proclaimed at the Neumean games; as ratifying by his authority. The City was annexed again to the Council of Acheans, wherewith the Acheans were not more strengthened, than the Argives themselves were secured from danger of relapse, into the same extremities out of which they had newly escaped.

After this, Titus found little business or none wherewith to set on work his Army in Greece. Antiochus was about to send another Embassage to Rome, desiring peace and friendship of the Senate. Things being therefore in appearance wholly disposed unto quiet, Scipio the African, that was chosen Consul at Rome, could not have his desire, of being sent Commander into Greece. The unsincere meaning of Antiochus, and the tumultuous disposition of the Ætolians, were held as considerations worthy of regard: yet not sufficient causes of making war. Neither appeared there any more honest way, of confounding the Ætolians, and of thoroughly persuading all the Greeks (which was not to be neglected, by those that meant to assure unto themselves the patronage of Greece) that the good of the Country was their sole intent: than by withdrawing thence their Legions, and leaving the Nation unto itself till occasion should be ripe, and call them over again. Wherefore after Titus had spent a Winter there, without any matter of employment, either found, or at any near distance appearing, he called an Assembly of Delegates, from all parts of Greece to Corinth: where he meant to bid them farewell. There he recounted unto them all that passed since his coming into those parts; and willed them to value the Roman friendship, according to the difference of estate, wherein the Romans found and left them. Hereto he added some wholesome counsel; touching the moderate use of their liberty, and the care which they ought to have of living peaceably and without faction. Lastly he gave up Acrocorinthus to the Acheans; withdrawing thence the Roman Garrison, and promising to do the like (which very soon he did) at Chalcis and Demetrias; that so it might be known, what years the Ætolians were, who had accused the Romans, of a purpose to retain those places. With joyful acclamations did the Greeks testify their good liking of that which Titus had said and done: as also at his request they agreed, to ransom and enlarge all Romans, that had been sold into their Country by Hannibal.

Thus Titus Crowned his actions in Greece with an happy end: and by leaving the Country before his departure was urged, left therein behind him the memory of his virtue and benefits, untainted by jealousy and suspicion of any evil meaning. At his coming to the City, He had the honour of a Triumph; which was the goodliest of all that Rome had until that day beheld. Three daies together the show of the pomp continued: as being set out with the spoils of a Country, more abundant in things worthy of such a spectacle, than any wherein the Romans had before made War. All sorts of Arms, with Statues and curious pieces of Brass or Marble, taken from the Enemy, were carried in the first daies Pageant. The second day, was brought in all the treasure of Gold and Silver: Some in the rude Masses unwrought; some in divers sorts of Coin; and some in Vessels of sundry kinds, that were the more highly prized by the workmanship. Among these were ten Shields, all of Silver; and one of pure Gold. The third day Titus himself entered the City in his Triumphant Chariot. Before him were carried an hundred and fourteen Crowns of Gold, bestowed upon him by divers Cities. There were also led the beasts for Sacrifice, the Prisoners, and the hostages: among which, Demetrius the Son of King Philip, and Armenius the Son of Nabiz, were principal. After him followed his Army; and (which added much grace, and good liking to the show) the Roman Captives, by his procurement redeemed from slavery in Greece.

Not long after this triumph, He procured audience of the Senate for many Embassadors, that were come out of Greece and Asia. They had all very favourable answers, excepting those of King Antiochus: whom the Senate would not hear, but referred over to Q. Quintius, and the ten that had been his Counsellors; because their business was said to be somewhat intricate. Hereat the Kings Embassadors wondered. They said unto Titus and his Associates, that they could not discern wherein consisted any perplexity of their message. For all treaties of peace and friendship, were either between the Victor and the vanquished; between those, that having warred together, were upon equal terms of advantage; or between those that had lived alwaies in good agreement, without any quarrel. Unto the Victor, they said, that the vanquished must yield; and patiently endure the imposition of some Covenants, that else might seem unreasonable. Where War had been made, and no advantage gotten: there was it usual to demand and make restitution of things and places claimed, gotten or lost; accordingly as both parts could agree. But between those which had never fallen out, there ought no Conditions of establishing friendship to be proposed: since it was reasonable, that each part should hold their own; and neither carry it felt as superior to the other, in prescribing ought that might be troublesome. Now of this last kind, was the league and friendship that had been so long in conclusion, betwixt Antiochus and the Romans. Which being so: they held it strange, that the Romans should thus insist on points no way concerning them, and take upon them to prescribe unto the King, what Cities of Asia he should set at liberty; from what Cities they would give him leave to exact his wonted Tributes; either putting or not putting his Garrisons into them, as the Senate should think fit. Hereto Quintius answered, that since they went so distinctly to work, He would also do the like. Wherefore he propounded unto them two Conditions, and gave them their choice whether to except: Either that it should be lawful for the Romans to take part in Asia with any that would seek their friendship; Or if King Antiochus misliked this, and would have them forbear to meddle in Asia, that then he should abandon whatsoever he had gotten in Europe. This was plain dealing, but no reasonable nor pertinent answer, to that which the Kings Embassadors had propounded. For if the Romans might be hired to abstain from Asia, by the gift of all that Antiochus had lately won in Europe: then did not the affairs of Smyrna, Lampascus, or any other Asiatick, whom they were pleased to reckon as their Confederates, bind them in honour to make War with a King that fought their love; and had never done them injury. But they knew very well, that Antiochus could not without great shame be so base, as to deliver up unto them the City of Lysimachia, whereon he had of late been at so much cost; in building it up even from the foundation, and repopling it with Inhabitants, that had all been dispersed, or captive to the Barbarians: And so much the Embassadors with great indignation alleged: saying, That Antiochus debited friendship of the Romans; but so, as it might stand with his honour. Now in point of honour the Romans took upon them as if their cause were far the superior. For it was they said, their purpose to set at liberty those Towns which the King would oppress and hold in subjection: especially since those Towns were of Greekish blood and language; and fell, in that regard under the patronage which Rome had afforded unto all Greeks besides. By this colour they might soon have left Antiochus King of not many Subjects on the hidden side of Euphrates. Neither did they forbear to say, That unless he would quit what he held in Europe, it was their meaning not only to protect those which relied upon them in Asia, but therein to make new Alliances: namely (as might be understood) with such as were his Subjects. Wherefore they urged his Embassadors to come to a point, and tell them plainly which of these two Conditions their King would accept. For lack of a pleasing pleasing answer, which the Embassadors could not hereto make, little wanted of giving presently defiance to the King. But they suffered themselves to be intreated, and were contented once again to send over P. Villius, and others that had been already with the King at Lysimachia; by whom they might receive a final answer, whether these demands made by Quintius and his Associates would be accepted, yea, or no. By this respite of time, and the fruitless Treaties ensuing, Antiochus got the leisure of two years; or thereabouts, to prepare for War; finding in the Romans all that while, no disposition to let him live in peace.

S. V.

Of the long Wars which the Romans had with the Gauls, Ligurians, and Spaniards. Of M. Porcius Cato, Injuries done by Masaniissa to the Carthaginians, that sue to the Romans for justice in vain.

THE Insubrians, Bojians, and other of the Cisalpine Gauls, together with the Ligurians; made often and (in a manner) continual war upon the Romans in Italy, even from such time as Hannibal and his brother Alago departed thence, until such time as they themselves were utterly subdued: which was not, before the Romans were almost at the very height of the Empire. These Nations, having served under Mago for wages, and afterwards having gotten Anilcar a Carthaginian; to be Leader unto them all, as hath already been shewed; by this their fellowship in Arms, grew to be such willing partakers each of others fortune, that seldom afterwards either the Gauls or Ligurians did stir alone: but that their Companions, hearing it, were ready to second them. How the Romans first prevailed, and got large possession in Gallia Cisalpina, now called Lumbardie: it hath been long since rehearsed between the first and second Punic Wars. As also it hath since appeared, how they lost the greatest part of their hold in that Country, by means of Hannibal his passage there through. Neither is it likely that the re-conquest would have been more difficult or tedious unto the Romans, than was the first purchase: if, besides the greater employments which they had of their Armies abroad, their forces appointed unto this war, had not been distracted by the Ligurians: that alwaies made them to proceed warily, having an eye to the danger at their backs. The Ligurians were a stout Nation, light and swift of body; well practised in laying ambushes, and not discouraged with any overthrow, but forthwith ready to fight again. Their Country was mountainous, rough, woody, and full of straight and dangerous passages. Few good Towns they had: but many Castles, exceedingly well fortified by nature: so as without much labour, they could neither be taken or besieged. They were also very poor; and had little or nothing that might give contentment unto a victorious Army that should spoil their Land. In these respects, they served excellently well to train up the Roman Soldiers to hardness and military patience: teaching them (besides other exercises of War) to endure much, and live contented with a little. Their quarrel to Rome, grew partly from their love unto the Gauls, their neighbours and companions: partly from their delight in robbing and spoiling the Territory of their borderers, that were subject unto Rome. But their obstinate continuance in the War which they had begun, seems to have been grounded upon the Condition of all Salvages: To be friends or foes, by custome, rather than by Judgement: and to acknowledge no such virtue in Leagues, or formal conclusions of peace, as ought to hinder them from using their advantage; or taking revenge of injuries when they return to mind. This quality is found in all, or most of the West-Indians: who, if they be demanded a reason of the Wars between them and any of their neighbours, do use commonly this answer, It hath still been the custome for us and them, to fight one against the other.

Divers overthrows, though none that were great, these Ligurians gave unto the Romans: but many more, and greater, they received. Often they sought peace, when they found themselves in distress, and brake it again as often, when they thought it profitable so to do. The best was, that as their Country was a good place of exercise unto the Romans, so out of their own Country they did little harm: not sending any great Armies far from home; perhaps, because they knew not how to make War, save on their own ground.

The Country of Spain, as it was the first part of the Continent out of Italy that became subject unto the Romans: so was it the last of all their Provinces, which was wholly and thoroughly by them subdued. It is likened in figure by some Geographers unto an Ox-hide: and the Romans found in it the property of that Ox-hide which Calanus the Indian shewed unto the Great Alexander, as an Embleme of his large Dominions. For treading upon any side of it; the further parts would rise from the ground. And thus was it with Spain. Seldom did it happen that those parts from which the Roman Armies lay farthest, were not up in rebellion. The Spaniards were a very hard Nation, and easily stirred up to arms; but had not much knowledge in the art of war, nor any good Captains. They wanted also (which was their principal hinderance) good intelligence among themselves: and being divided into many small Signiories, that had little other communion than of language, they seldom or never provided in general for the common good of their Country; but made it their chief care, each of them to look unto their own Territory. Such private respects made them often to fall asunder, when many had united themselves together, for chasing out of the Romans. And these were the causes of their often overthrows: as desire of liberty, rather than complaint of any wrong done to them, was the cause of their often taking arms.

The Carthaginians had been accustomed, to make exasperation of this Cholerick Spanish humour; by employing, as Mercenaries in their wars abroad, those that were most likely to be unquiet at home. They had also taken Souldiers from one part of the Country, and used them in another: finding means to pay them all, out of the profits which they raised upon the whole Country; as being far better husbands, and of more dexterity than were the Romans, in that kind. But contrariwise, the Romans, using the service of their own Legions, and of their friends the Latins, had little business for the Spaniards; and therefore were fain to have much business with them. Spain was too far distant, and withall too great for them to send over Colonies thither, whereby to hold it in good order, according to the course that they took in Italy. Wherefore it remained, that they should always maintain such Armies in the Country, as might serve to hold in obedience perforce; and such heedful Captains as might be still ready to oppose the Barbarians in their first Commotion. This they did, and thereby held the Country; though seldom in peace.

Very soon after the departure of Scipio, there was raised War in Spain against the Romans, even upon the same general ground that was the foundation of all the Spanish Wars following. It was thought unreasonable, that the Spaniards should one while help the Carthaginians against the Romans, and another while the Romans against the

Carthaginians; barely forgetting to help themselves against those that were strangers, yet usurped the Dominion over them. But the forces which Scipio had left behind him in that Country, being well acquainted with the manner of War in those parts, suppressed this rebellion by many Victories: and, together with subjection, brought peace upon the Country; which lasted five years. This Victory of the Carthaginians, though it happily ended the War: yet left it still remaining the cause of the War; which after five years brake out again. The Spaniards fought a battel with the Roman Praetor, whom they slew; and had a great Victory, that filled them with greater hopes. Yet the happy success of their Wars in Greece, made the Romans think it enough to send thither two Praetors, and with each of them some two Legions. These did somewhat: yet not so much, but that M. Porcius Cato, who was Consul the year following, and sent into that Province; found at his coming little left to do, than the reconquering of all Spain. But it fell out happily, that all the Spaniards were not of one mind: some were faithful to Rome, and some were idle beholders of the pains that others took. Yet when Cato had won a great Victory upon the chieftest of them; they rose against him in many parts of the Country, and put him unto much new trouble. Whilst he was about to make a journey against those that were yet unsubdued: some of the lately vanquished, were even ready to rebel. He therefore disarmed them; which they took so heavily, that many of them slew themselves for grief. Hearing of this, and well understanding that such desperation might work dangerous effects: He called unto him the principal among them: and commending unto them peace and quietness, which they never had disturbed but unto their own great loss, He prayed them to devise what course might be taken for holding them assured unto Rome, without further trouble. None of them could, or would give counsel in a matter of this nature. Having therefore talked with them once or twice, and finding their invention barren in this kind of Subject; He gave express charge, That upon a day appointed they should throw down the walls of all their Towns. Afterwards he carried the war about from place to place; and with singular industry finished it in a short time. Neither thought he it any disgrace to him or to Rome, in this time of danger, to imitate the Carthaginians, and hire an Army of the Celtiberians, against other of their

Countrymen:

Countrymen: excusing the indignity, such as it seemed, with a jest, That if he were vanquished and slain, then should he need to pay them nothing; whereas if he had the Victory, He could pay them with the enemies money. Finally, He brought the War to so good end, that in long time after, though Spain were often troublesome, yet was it in no danger of being lost. He increased also the publick Revenues in that Province, by causing some Mines of Iron and Silver to be wrought, that had before lain unregarded. Herein he did benefit the Common-wealth by a virtue much agreeable to his own peculiar disposition.

For this M. Cato was not only very notable in the Art of war, which might well be thence termed the occupation of the Romans; but so well furnished with all other usefull qualities, that very little was wanting in him which might seem requisite to the accomplishment of a perfect man. He was very skilful in the Roman Laws, a man of great Eloquence, and not unprofitable in any business either private or publick. Many books he wrote; whereof the principal were, of the Roman Antiquities, and of Husbandry. In matter of Husbandry he was notable, and thereby most increased his substance; being of mean birth, and the first of his house. Strong of body he was, and exceeding temperate: so as he lived in perfect health to very old age. But that which most commended him unto the better sort of the Romans, was his great sincerity of life, abstinence from bribes, and fashioning himself to the ancient laudable Customs of the City: Herein he had merited singular commendations, if the vehemency of his nature had not caused him to malign the virtue of that noble Scipio the African, and some other worthy men; that were no less honest than himself, though far less rigid, and more gallant in behaviour. Otherwise, He was a very good Citizen, and one of such temper, that he could fashion himself to all occasions; as if he were never out of his Element. He loved business so well, or rather hated vice so earnestly; that even unto the end of his life, He was exercised in defending himself or accusing others. For at the age of fourscore and six years, he pleaded in his own defence: and four years after, he accused sergius Galba unto the people. So began the Nobility of Cato his family; which ended in his great grand-child M. Cato the Utican: one that his good virtues and fervency, had all his good purposes dashed, and was finally wearied out of his life, by men of such nobility and greatness as this his Ancestor had continually vexed.

The Spanish Wars, after Cato his departure out of the Country, though they were not very dangerous, yet were they many: and the Country seldom free from insurrection, in one part or other. The Roman Praetors therefore, of which two every year were sent over Commanders into Spain (that was divided into Governments) did rarely fail of such work, as might afford the honour of Triumph. One flew thirteen thousand Spaniards in a battel: another took fifty Towns: and a third enforced many States of the Country to give peace. Thus every one of them, or most of them, did some laudable service; and yet so, that commonly there were of men, towns, and people, new that rebelled, instead of the old that were slain, taken, or reclaimed. At the causes hereof, I have already pointed; and therefore think it enough to say, That the business in Spain required not the employment of a Roman Consul, from such time as Cato thence departed, untill the Numantian War broke out, which was very long after.

In all other Countries to the West of the Torjan Seas, the Romans had peace; but so had not the Carthaginians. For when Hannibal was gone from them, and that the enemies of the Barchine House promised all felicity which Rome could grant, unto themselves and their obedient City: Masaniissa fell to disputing with the sword, about the title to the best part of their Lands. He began with Emporia, a fruitful Region about the lesser Syrus: wherein, among other Cities, was that of Leptis, which daily paid a Talent unto Carthage for Tribute. This Country the Numidian challenged, and by winning some part of it, seemed to better his claim unto the whole. He had a great advantage: for that the Carthaginians might not make any War, without leave obtained from their Masters the Romans. They had none other way of redress, than by sending to Rome their Complaint of his doings. And surely they wanted not good matter to alledge, if the Judges had been impartial. For besides that Scipio, in limiting out to them their bounds, had left them the possession of this Country: Masaniissa himself, now very lately pursuing a Rebel that fled out of his Kingdom, desired leave of the Carthaginians, for himself to pass through it in his way to Cyrene: thereby acknowledging (had it otherwise been questionable) that the Country was theirs. This notwithstanding, Masaniissa had wherewith to justify his his proceedings, especially unto the Roman Senate. He gave the Fathers to understand by his Embassadours, what faithless people the Carthaginians were, and how ill affected to the State of Rome. There had lately been sent unto them from Hannibal, one that should persuade them to take part with Antiochus. This man they had examined upon some suspicion of his errand; yet neither arresting him nor his ship, had thereby afforded him means to escape: Hence the Numidian concluded, that certainly it was their purpose to rebel; and therefore good policy to keep them down.

As for the Countrey of Emporia: it had always, he said, been theirs that were able to hold it by strong hand: and so belonged sometime unto the Numidian Kings: though now of late it was in possession of the Carthaginians. But if the truth were known, the Citizens of Carthage had not any very warrantable title unto any more ground, than that whereon their City stood: or scarcely to so much. For they were no better than strangers in Africa, that had gotten leave there to build upon so much ground: as they could encompass with an Ox-hide cast into small thongs. Whatsoever they held without such a compass, was purchased by fraud, and wrongful encroachments. This considered, Masimissa requested of the Senate, that they would not adjudge unto such usurpers, the Countrey sometimes appertaining to the Ancestors of him their assured friend. The Romans having heard these allegations on both sides, found the matter so doubtful, that they could not on the sudden tell what to determine. Wherefore, because they would do nothing rashly: they sent over three Embassadours, of whom P. Scipio the African was one and the chief, to decide the controversy: yet secretly giving them instructions, to leave all as they found it, without making any end one way or other. The Embassadours followed their directions, and left all doubtful. So was it likely, that Masimissa with a strong Army should quickly prevail against those that could no more than talk of their right, and exclaim against the wrong. By such Arts were the Carthaginians held; not only from stirring in favour of King Antiochus, if they had thereto any disposition: but were prepared by little and little, unto their final destruction: that came upon them, when the Romans had leisure to express the utmost of their hatred.

S. VI.

The *Ætoli*ans labour to provoke Antiochus, Philip, and Nabis; to War upon the Romans, by whom they hold themselves wronged and disgraced. Nabis beseegeth Gythium, and wasting some part of Achaia. The exact skill of Philopomen in advantage of ground: whereby he utterly vanquisheth Nabis. Antiochus being denied peace of the Romans, joyns with the *Ætoli*ans. The *Ætoli*ans surprize Demetrias; and by killing Nabis, their Confederates, seize upon Sparta. But they are driven out by the Citizens: who at Philopomen his persuasions annex themselves to the Achæans.

ALL Greece being at peace, and the Roman Armies thence departed: it grieved much the *Ætoli*ans to think, that they who had promised unto themselves the whole spoil of Philip, and the highest reputation among the Greeks: were not only disappointed of their covetous hopes, but quite forsaken by their ancient dependants, and of all other the most unregarded. Yet was there made a great access to their Estate; by adding much unto them, of that which had been taken from the Macedonian. This might well have sufficed them; if their desires had not been immoderate; and their indignation more vehement, than their desire. But they were not so pleased with that which they had, since they thought it no more than part of their due: as they were vexed with the denial of that which they claimed, and with finding themselves to be wholly disesteemed, wherein they thought that they had unufferable wrong. Wherefore they devised, in a Parliament which they shortly held, by what means they best might right themselves; and give the Romans a sorrowful knowledge of the difference between their enmity and friendship. To this purpose they soon agreed, as concurring all in one affection; That they would not only persuade Antiochus to make war upon the Romans, as one to whom the Romans had long refused peace; but that they would deal with the King of Macedon their ancient enemy, and with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, to join all together in a new Confederacy: whose joynt forces could not in all likelihood, but far surmount those of the Romans, Achæans, Rhodians, and King Eumenes, with all that were of their Faction. This was a great enterprise, which the *Ætoli*ans took in hand; and well becoming them, for they were great darcers. They sent Em-bassadours to all these Kings, with persuasions, as they thought most forcible. But Philip was irresolute; and Antiochus willing to try first all other courses. Nabis the Lacedæmonian, who neither (as Philip) had lost much, nor (as Antiochus) was in fear of any War; yet shewed himself of all other the most forward: and not staying so much as to seek any good pretence, began immediately to lay siege unto Gythium, that had been lately taken from him by the Romans. The Achæans, to whose care chiefly Titus at his departure had commended the Affairs of Peloponnesus, were not slow to admonish Nabis of his duty: neither would they have staid long from repressing his violence by open war; had not some of them thought it wisdom to ask Counsel of the Romans, and particularly of T. Quintius, before they engaged themselves in a business of such importance. Whilst thus they spent the time in sending Embassadours, and were advised by Quintius, to let all alone, and to wait for the coming of the Roman Forces, that would shortly be amongst them: Nabis was bold to give them juster cause of complaint, by waiting their own Territory.

Philopomen was then the Prætor of the Achæans, who had long been absent in Crete; making War there for his minds sake and recreation. Unto him the Achæans referred themselves, giving him leave to order the War at his pleasure; either staying till the Romans came, or doing otherwise, as he should think best. He made all haste to relieve Gythium by Sea; fearing lest the Town, and the Achaean Garrison within it, should be lost, if he used any delay. But Philopomen was so bad a Sea-man, that he knew not a strong Ship from a rotten. He made a Quadrirème Gally his Admiral, that had fourcore years agoe been counted a gallant Vessel in the Navie of Antigonus Gonatus. Neither was the rest of his Fleet so good, as might encounter with that of the Lacedæmonians. Only it fell out well, that he committed himself to a light Pinnace or Brigandine, that fought better with her Wings, than with her Talons. For his Admiral Gally was stemmed at the first; and being rotten with age, sprang so many leaks, and took in water so fast, that she was faine to yield without further resistance. When the rest of the Fleet saw what was become of their Admiral, all were presently discouraged, and saved themselves with what speed they could. But Philopomen was not herewith daunted. If he had failed in Sea-service, which was none of his Occupation, He said, that he would make amends by Land. The Tyrant withdrew part of his Army from the siege of Gythium, to stop the Achæans, if they should invade his Country. But upon these which were placed in guard of Iaconia, Philopomen came unexpected; fired their Camp, and put all, save a very few of them, to the Sword. Then marched he with all his Army towards Lacedæmon: within ten miles whereof he was, when the Tyrant met him, that had already taken Gythium. It was not expected that Nabis would have been ready for them so soon. Or if he should come from Gythium with any part of his Forces: yet was it thought that he must overtake them, and charge them in Rere. They marched therefore almost securely, in a long troop, reaching some five miles; having their Horle, and the greatest part of their Auxiliaries at their backs, to bear off any sudden impression. But Nabis, who formerly understood, or at least suspected, what course they would take, appeared in the front of them with all his Army; encamped there where they meant to have lodged. It was the custom of Philopomen, when he walked, or travelled abroad with his friends, to mark the situation of the Country about him; and to discourse what might befall an Army marching the same way. He would suppose, that having with him there such a number of Souldiers, ordered and sorted in such manner, and marching towards such a place; he were upon that ground encountered by a greater Army, or better prepared to fight. Then would he put the question, Whether it were fit for him to hold on his way, retire, or make a stand? What piece of Ground it were meet for him to seize upon? And in what manner he might best do it? In what fort he should order his men? Where bestow his Carriages, and under what Guard? In what fort encamp himself? And which way march the day following. By such continual meditation he was grown so perfect, that he did never meet with any difficulty, whence he could not explicate himself and his followers: At this time he made a stand; and having drawn up his Rere, He encamped near unto the place where he was; within half a mile of the Enemy. His baggage with all thereto belonging, he bestowed on a Rock; encompassing them round with his Souldiers. The Ground was rough, the ways bad, and the day almost quite spent; so as Nabis could not at the present greatly molest him. Both Armies were to water at one brook; where to the Achæans lay the nearer. This watering therefore was first to minister the like occasion of skirmish. Philopomen understood this; and laid an

ambush in place convenient; whereinto the Mercenaries of Nabis fell, and were slaughtered in great numbers. Presently after this, he caused one of his own Auxiliaries to go to the Tyrant as a fugitive, and tell him, That the Acheans had a purpose to get between him and Lacedæmon; whereby they would both debar his return into the City, and withal encourage the People to take Arms for the Recovery of their Freedom. The Tyrant hearing this, marched hastily away; and left his Camp, which hardly otherwise would have been forced. Some Companies he made to stay behind, and shew themselves upon the Rampart, thereby to conceal his departure. But Philopæmen was not so to be beguiled. He easily won the Camp, and gave chase to Nabis: whose followers being overtaken, had no courage to turn about and make head. The enemies being thus dispersed, and fled into woods where they lay in covert all that day: Philopæmen conceived aright, that their fear and necessity would teach them to creep homewards, and save themselves when it grew dark. Wherefore in the evening, when he had gathered together all those of his light armature, which had followed the chase whilst it was day, he led forth the rest that had well refreshed themselves, and occupied the two most ordinary passages unto Lacedæmon. So Nabis his men, when it was dark night, perceiving in Philopæmen's Camp great store of lights; thought that all had been at rest; and therefore adventured to make an escape home. But they were so way-laid, that hardly one quarter of them got into Sparta. Thirty days together after this, did Philopæmen waste the Country round about, whilst Nabis durst not issue forth of his Town; and then returned home, leaving the Tyrant in a manner without forces.

The Roman Embassadors were then in Greece, and T. Quintius among them, labouring to make their party strong against Antiochus and Nabis, whom they knew to be solicited by the Atolians. Very fair countenance they also made unto Philip; and with comfortable promises drew him to make shew, whatsoever he thought, of good correspondence. They promised to restore unto him his Son; and were contented to let him hope, that he should receive other favours at their hands; and regain possession of many places, by them taken from him. Thus did the Romans prepare for War against Antiochus in Greece, whilst their Embassadors that were with him in Asia, denied otherwise to grant him Peace, than if he would yield unto one of the Conditions, by them so often propounded. The long absence of this King in Syria, where he had accomplished the marriage between Ptolemy and his Daughter; together with the death of young Antiochus the Kings Son, which happened during the Treaty, and hindered, or seemed to hinder the King from giving audience in person to the Embassadors; caused them to return home to Rome; as uncertain of their answer as at their setting forth. One thing that might have been, and partly was, beneficial unto them, they brought to pass during their abode at Ephesus; either by cunning, or (as Livy rather think) by chance. Finding Hannibal there, they discoursed often with him, and blamed him for having thus fled unto Antiochus upon a causeless suspicion wherein he held the Romans; that honoured his virtue, and intended him no harm. Many have affirmed that P. Scipio was one of these Embassadors; and that he, among other discourses with Hannibal, demanded once, Which of all the famous Captains that had lived, Hannibal judged the most worthy? So Hannibal gave to Alexander of Macedon the first place: to Pyrrhus the second; and the third he challenged unto himself. But Scipio, who thought his own title better than that it ought to be so forgotten, asked yet further, What wouldst thou have said then, Hannibal, if thou hadst vanquished me? To whom the Carthaginian replied, Then would not I have given the first place to Alexander, but have claimed it as due unto my self. Now whether this were so or otherwise, the often and friendly conference of Hannibal with the Roman Embassadors, made him suspected of Antiochus; who therefore did forbear a while to use his counsel. Yet afterwards, when Hannibal perceived this change in the King, and plainly desiring him to tell the cause thereof, heard what it was; he easily recovered his former grace and credit. For he told how his Father had caused him to swear at the Altars, when he was a little Boy, that he never should be friend unto the Romans. Wherefore he willed the King not to regard any vain fumes: but to know thus much, that so long as he thought upon War with Rome, so long would Hannibal do him all good service: whereas contrariwise, if he intended to make peace, then should it behove him to use the counsel of some other man.

The Atolians, and their Friends, were less busied all this while, in making their party strong against the Romans, than were the Romans, in mustering up their friends in Greece. They had so often dealt with Antiochus,

vaunting much of their own forces, and arrogating to themselves the honour of the Victory against Philip, that finally they prevailed with him; especially when the Roman Embassadors had left him without hope of peace, unless he would buy it at too dear a rate. They dealt in like sort with the Macedonian. But in vain. He understood the Romans and himself too well. Wherefore it concerned them to improve their own Forces to the uttermost: as knowing that all the burthen must lie upon Antiochus and themselves, without help from any, save only from some few that were discontented in Greece. Whilst they were about this, and had with them an Embassador of the King Antiochus, that animated them to resolution, the Athenian Embassadors, whom Titus had requested to be at their meeting, stayed their vehemency a little; by exhorting them not to conclude rashly, without first hearing the Romans; that lay near at hand. For want of a ready Answer hereto, they were contented to approve the motion. Titus hearing this, thought the business worthy of his presence. For since Antiochus had now declared himself against the Romans, it would be no small piece of service, to withdraw from his friendship, those by whose encouragement he had made the adventure. Wherefore he came to their Panætolium, or great Assembly of the Nation; where he forgot nothing that might serve to appease them. He willed them to consider the weight of the enterprise which they took in hand; whereby Greece was like to become a Champaign-field, on which to the ruin of the Country, the Romans and King Antiochus, that commanded no small part of the World, should fight for the Mastery: the Atolians, as Masters in that kind of Fence, setting them on, and becoming

* Liv. 35. 4. The Sticklers. As for those grievances which did thus exasperate them, and urge them to such violent courses, he willed them to consider how slight they were, and how much better they might do, to send Embassadors to Rome, that should either plead their Right in the Senate, or (if their Right unto the places which they claimed, were not good) make request to have what they desired: than thus to set the World in an uproar, and be afterwards the first that should repent it. But what he said or could say, it skilled not much. They had already done ill, to make the Embassador of the King, whose help they had sought, wait so long for an answer, and stay doubting what good end they should make with the Romans. Neither was it news unto them to hear those comfortable words; that by sending to Rome, they might happen to obtain what they desired; either as their Right, or else by way of Favour. For with such Terms had they been teased once already: and were by the Senate rejected unto Titus: who having it in his own power, gave them no satisfaction; yet would now again refer them to the Senate. This was only loss of time, and might abate their credit with Antiochus. Wherefore, without more ado they made a Decree, That King Antiochus the Great should be intreated to come over into Greece, as well to set the Country at liberty, as also to decide the Controversies depending between the Romans and the Atolians. Such a Decree they would not have made, had they not understood the Kings mind before. Having made it, they forgot no point of bravery, whereby to vaunt themselves to the Kings Embassadors, and against the Romans. Titus desired of their Prætor to let him see a Copy of this new Decree. The Prætor answered, That when he had other things to do: but that this Decree, and their further answer, they would shortly let him know, if he came to their Camp in Italy upon the River of Tiberis. Gentler words would have done better, as the Atolians are like to understand hereafter. But having thus begun, they meant henceforth to go roundly to work. The care of the War they referred unto the more private Council of their Nation; that no occasion might slip, in waiting for the Authority of a General Assembly. The Apollonians (so were the privy Council of Atolia called) went as hotly to work, as any of the youngest heads could have done. They laid a Plot how to get into their hands at one time the Towns of Chalcis, Demetrias, and Sparta: to each of which they sent men for the purpose. Demetrias they took upon the sudden; entring some of them as friends, to conduct home a principal man of the City: who for speaking words against T. Quintius, had been driven to flee thence; but was by intercession of those that loved him, again recalled. His Atolian Companions that were not many, seized upon a Gate; whereat they let in a Troop which they had left not far behind them: and so fell to murdering the chief of the Roman Faction. At Chalcis they sped not so well. Thither also they had a banished man to bring home: but they came so strong, that their purpose was discovered, and the Town prepared to defend it self against them. Being therefore demanded the cause of this Hostility, they gave a gentle answer, saying, That they came not thither as Enemies, but only to deliver the Town from the Romans; who more insolently

domineered over it, than ever the Macedonians had done. By which Rhetorick they prevailed no more than they could do by plain force. For the Towns-men replied, That they neither found any abridgement of their liberty, nor needed any Garrison to keep them from the Romans, from whom they neither feared any danger, nor received injury. So this business was dashed. The attempt upon Sparta was more strange and desperate. Nabis his good Friend was Lord of the Town, styling himself King, but more truly by all men called Tyrant. He had well-near lost all, by means of the overthrow which Philopemen had lately given him: since he durst not stir abroad; and dayly expected the mischief, that on all sides threatened him. Wherefore he sent Messengers, one after another, to the Ætolians; requesting them, That as he had not been slow to stir in their behalf, but adventured himself upon the utmost of danger, when all others were backward; so they would be pleased to send him what help they might, since his bad fortune had caused him presently to need it. It hath been often said, That the ravenous Ætolians were only true to themselves, and regarded neither faith nor friendship, otherwise, than as it might conduce to their own ends. And so dealt they now. For since Nabis his mercenary forces, which upheld his Tyranny, were in a manner consumed: they thought it expedient for their Estate, to put him out of the way; and by so doing to assure Lacedæmon unto themselves. To this purpose, they sent thither Alexamennus, one whom they thought a man fit for such a work. To him they gave a thousand Foot, and thirty Horse, chosen for the purpose. These thirty were by Democritus the Prætor brought into the Council of the Apoletis, where they were commanded to be no wiser than they should be, nor to think that they were sent to make War with the Acheans, or to do ought else, save only what Alexamennus should command them; which were it never so desperate, and in seeming against all reason; yet must they understand, that unless they performed it, they should have no good welcome home. So Alexamennus came to the Tyrant, whom he encouraged with brave words, telling him that Antiochus was already in Europe, and would be anon in Greece, meaning to cover all the Land and Sea with his mighty Armies; and that the Romans were like to find other manner of work, than of late with Philip: since the Elephants of this Great King, without other help, would suffice to tread them down. As for the Ætolians, he said that if need should so require, they would presently send away to Lacedæmon all the Forces that they could raise: But that they were very desirous at the present, to make as goodly a muster as they could, before the great Kings; which caused them to send him thither afore with no greater company. Hereupon he willed Nabis to take heart; bring forth his men, that had been long pent up in the City; and train them without the Walls: as if shortly he should employ them in work of Conquest, rather than Defence. Nabis was glad of this: and daily exercised his men in the field: riding up and down with this Alexamennus, and no more than three or four Horse about him, from one point to another, to order and behold them. During this time of exercise, Alexamennus made it his fashion, to step aside alone to his Ætolians, and say somewhat as he thought fit: which done, he still returned again to Nabis. But when he saw time for the great work which he had in hand; he then went aside to his thirty Horsemen, and bade them remember the task enjoined them at their setting forth; telling them, That they were all in case of banished men, unless they would anon come up to him, and help him to finish that which they should see him take in hand. Herewithal the Tyrant began to draw near them: and Alexamennus making towards him, charged him on the sudden, and struck him down. The thirty Ætolians never stood to deliberate upon the matter, but all flew in; and, before any succour could arrive, had made an end of this wretched Nabis. Presently upon the fact committed, the Tyrant his Mercenaries ran unto the dead body: where in stead of seeking revenge, they stood foolishly gazing as beholders. Alexamennus with his Ætolians, hasted into the City, and seized on the Palace: where he fell to ransacking the Treasure; and troubled himself with none other care, as though all were already done. Such of his Followers as were dispersed in the Town, did also the like, with the greater indignation of the Citizens: who seeing themselves free by the death of the Tyrant, could not endure to see those that had slain him, begin to tyrannize anew. Wherefore all the Town was shortly in Arms: and for lack of another Captain, they took a little Boy of the Royal Stock, that had been brought up with Nabis his Children, whom they mounted upon a good Horse, and made him their Chief. So they fell upon the Ætolians that were idly straggling about; and put them all to the Sword. Alexamennus with not many of his Company, were slain in keep-keeping the Citadel: and those few that escaped thence into Arcadia, were taken by the Magistrates; who sold them all as bond-slaves. In this doubtful estate of things at Lacedæmon, Philopemen came thither: who calling out the chief of the City, and speaking such words unto them as Alexamennus should have done, after he had slain the Tyrant: easily persuaded them for their own good and safety, to incorporate themselves with the Acheans. Thus by the enterprise, no less dishonourable than difficult, of the Ætolians: and the small, but effectual, travel of Philopemen, the Acheans made a notable purchase: and Lacedæmon, that had hitherto been governed either by Kings, or by Tyrants that called themselves Kings, became the Member of a Commonwealth, whereof the Name had scarce any reputation, when Sparta ruled over all Greece.

Antiochus, persuaded by Thoa the Ætolian, comes over into Greece ill attended. Sundry passages between Him, the Ætolians, Chalcidians, and others. He wins Chalcis, and thereby the whole Isle of Eubœa. The vanity of the Kings Embassadors and the Ætolians, with the civil Answer of Titus to their discourse, before the Achæans. That is concerned the Greeks to have desired Peace between the Romans and Antiochus, as the best assurance of their own Liberty. Of many petty Estates that fell to the King. Of Aminander; and an idle vanity by which King Philip was lost. Hannibal gives good counsel in vain. Some Towns won in Thessaly. The King retires to Chalcis, where he marrieth a young Wife, and revels away the rest of Winter. Upon the coming of the Roman Consul, all forsake Antiochus. He with two thousand Ætolians keeps the straits of Thermopylæ. He is beaten, and flies into Asia: leaving all Greece unto the Victors.

Antiochus was troubled much in Asia, with Smyrna and Lampsacus, that would not hearken to any Composition. He thought it neither safe nor honourable, to leave them Enemies behind him: and to win them by force, was more than hitherto he was able. Yet was he desirous with all speed convenient, to shew himself in Greece: where he had been told, that his presence would effect wonders. It was said, that in all the Country there was a very small number, which bore hearty affection unto the Romans: That Nabis was already up in arms:

That Philip was like a Bandog in a chain, desiring nothing more, than to break loose: and that the Ætolians, without whom the Romans had done nothing, nor nothing could have done, were ready to conter upon him the greatness, which they had unworthily belittled upon insolent Barbarians. Of all this, the least part was true. Yet that which was true, made such a noise, as added credit unto all the rest. Whilst therefore the King was thinking to lend Hannibal into Asiæ, there to molest the Romans, and so give him the better leisure of using his own opportunities in Greece: Thoa the Ætolian came over to him, and bade him lay all other care aside; for that his Countrymen had already taken Demetrias, a Town of main importance, that should give him entertainment, whence he might proceed as became the greatness of his virtue and fortune. This did serve to cut off all deliberation. As for Hannibal, Thoa was bold to tell the King, first, that it was not expedient for him to divide his forces at such a time, when the very reputation of his numbers, brought into Greece, might serve to lay open unto him all places, without need of using violence: and secondly, That in any such great enterprise there could not be chosen a more useful man to be employed in the Kings service, than was that famous Hannibal the Carthaginian. For he said that the King should as greatly feel the loss of a Fleet or Army, perishing under such a notable Commander, if his fortune were bad, as if the same had miscarried under one of meaner quality: whereas nevertheless if Hannibal prevailed, Hannibal alone should have all the honour, and not Antiochus. In this regard he was of opinion that such a renowned Warriour should be always near unto the Kings Person, to give advice: which being followed, as often as it was found commodious, the good success would wholly redound unto the honour of him that had the sovereign Command, even of the King himself. Antiochus gladly hearkened unto this admonition; being jealous of the Virtue, that shined brighter than the Majesty of his own fortune. And thereupon he laid aside the determination, which tended more to the advancement of his desires, than did any thing else by him then or after thought upon.

Presently after this, He made ready for Greece. Before his setting forth, in a frivolous pomp of ceremony, he went up from the Sea-side to Ilion; there to do sacrifice to Minerva of Troy. Thence passing over the Ægean Sea, he came to Demetrias. Eurylochus the Magnesian; the same whom the Ætolians had lately waited on home, when by that pretext pretext they won Demetrius; was now the chief man, and ruler of his Nation. He therefore with his Countrymen, in great frequency, came to do their duties to the King Antiochus, and bled him welcome. The King was glad of this, and took it as a sign of good luck, to be so entertained at the beginning. But it may be suspected, That the Magnetics found not the like cause of joy. For whereas they had expected a Fleet and Army somewhat like to that of Xerxes: they saw three hundred ships; of which no more than forty were serviceable for the Wars, with an Army of ten thousand Foot, five hundred Horses and six Elephants. The *Ætoli*ans no sooner heard of his coming, than they called a Parliament, and made a Decree whereby they invited him into their Country. He knew before that they would so do; and was therefore well onward on his way towards them, when they met with him that brought the Decree. At his coming to Lamia, the *Ætoli*ans gave him as joyful entertainment as they could devise. Being brought in to their Council, he made an Oration: wherein he desired them to hold him excused, that he came not followed with a greater Army. This, was he said, in true estimation, a sign of his good will: in that he staid not to make all things ready, but hastened unto their aid, even whilst the season was unfit for Navigation. Yet it should not be longer, ere the hope of all those which had expected him, would be satisfied unto the full. For it was his meaning to fill all Greece with Armies, and all the Sea-Coast with his Fleets. Neither would he spare for any Charge, Travel, or Danger, to follow the business which he had undertaken: even to drive the Romans and their Authority out of Greece; leaving the Country free indeed, and the *Ætoli*ans therein the Chief. Now as the Armies that were following him, should be very great; so was it his meaning, that all Provisions to them belonging should be correspondent; because he would not be any way burdensome unto his Confederates. But at the present he must needs intreat them, having thus hastily come over unto their aid, unprovided of many necessities, that they would help him with Corn and other Victuals, whereof he stood in need. So he left them to their consultation: the conclusion whereof was, after a little dispute, (or a vain motion was made by some, that the differences between the Romans and them, should be put by Compromise to the decision of Antiochus) that they would yield unto the Kings desire, and assist him with all their Forces. Here we may observe how vain a thing it is for an absolute Prince to engage himself, as did Antiochus, in a business of dangerous importance upon the promised assurance of a State that is merely popular. For if the vehemency of Thoon, and some other of that Faction, had not prevailed in this Council; the *Ætoli*ans, for gain of two or three Towns, yea, for hope of such gain that might have deceived them, were like to have abandoned this King their Friend, unto the discretion of the Romans. And what remedy had there been, if this had so fallen out? He could have bemoaned himself to Thoon, and complained of the wrong; but he must have been contented with this answer, That the fault was in those of the opposite side, whom Thoon would therefore have pronounced to be very wicked men. It happened much better for the present, though in the future it proved much worse, both for him, and for the *Ætoli*ans. He was chosen General of all their Forces: and thirty Commissioners were appointed to be about him, as a Council of War for the Nation. These armed such as readily they could, whilst it was in dispute where they should begin the War. Chalcis was thought the meetest place to be first undertaken: whether if they came suddenly, they should not peradventure need to use much force. The King had brought with him into Ætolia but a thousand Foot, leaving the rest behind him at Demetrias. With these he halted away directly toward Chalcis; being overtaken by no great number of the *Ætoli*ans, which accompanied him thither. At his coming, the Magistrates, and some of the Chief Citizens, issued forth to parle with him. There the *Ætoli*ans began, as they had lately done before, to tell, how the Romans had only in words and false semblance, set Greece at liberty. But such liberty as might be true and useful, they said, would never be obtained; until by removing the necessity of obeying their pleasure that were most mighty, every several estate had where to find redress, of any pressure. And to this end was the great Antiochus come thither; a King well able to counterpoise, yea to overweigh the Romans: who nevertheless desired them only, so to join with him in League, as that if either the Romans or He should offer them wrong, they might keep it in their power, to seek redress at the others hands. The Chalcidians made hereto the same answer, which, to the like allegations, they had made not long before: That their freedom was not imaginary, but absolute; for which they were to thank the Romans; without whose good liking they would enter into no new confederacy.

confederacy. That which they spake of themselves, they could likewise affirm of all the Greeks: forasmuch as none of them paid any tribute, was kept under by any Garrison, or lived otherwise than by their own Laws, and without being tied unto conditions which displeased them. Wherefore they wondered why the King should thus trouble himself to deliver Cities that were already free. But since he and the *Ætoli*ans requested their friendship; they besought both him and the *Ætoli*ans, to do a friendly Office, in departing from them quietly, and leaving them in such good case as they were. With this answer the King departed: for he was not as then, strong enough to force them. But very soon after, he brought thither a greater power, which terrified them, and made them yield: before all the succours could arrive, which Titus had sent for their defence.

The chief City of Enbea being thus gotten, all the rest of the Island shortly yielded to Antiochus. Four or five hundred Roman Soldiers, that came over late to have defended Chalcis, repented themselves at Delium, a little Town of Ætolia, lying over against the Island; where was a Temple and Grove, consecrated unto Apollo, that had the privilege of an inviolable Sanctuary. In this place were some of them walking, and beholding the things there to be seen, whilst others were busied as they found cause, without fear of any danger; as being in such a place, and no War hitherto proclaimed. But Menippus, one of Antiochus his Captains, that had wearied himself in many vain Treaties of peace, took advantage of their carelessness, and used them with all extremity of War. Very few of them escaped; fifty were taken, and the rest slain. Hereat Quintus was grieved: yet so, as it pleased him well to consider that his Romans had now more just cause than before, to make War upon the King.

Antiochus liked well these beginnings, and sent Embassadors into all quarters of Greece; in hope, that his reputation should persuade very many to take his part. The wisest sort returned such answer, as the Chalcidians had done. Some reserved themselves until he should come among them: knowing that either if he came not, he must hold them excused for not daring to stir: or if he came, the Romans must pardon their just fear, in yielding to the stronger. None of those that lay far off, joyined with him in true meaning, save the Eleans, that always favoured the *Ætoli*ans, and now feared the *Acha*eans. Little reason there was, that he should think to draw the *Acha*eans to his party. Nevertheless he assayed them, upon a vain hope, that the envy which Titus was said to bear unto Philopomenus virtue, had bred a secret dislike between that Nation and the Romans. Wherefore both he and the *Ætoli*ans sent Embassadors to the Council at Aegina, that spured not brave words, if the *Acha*eans would have been so taken. The Kings Embassador told of great Armies and Fleets that were coming; reckoning up the Dalians, Medians, Elmians, and Caducians: names that were not every day heard of, and therefore as he thought the more terrible. Then told he them what notable men at Sea, the Sydontians, Tyrians, Aradians, and Pamphilians were; such indeed as could not be resisted. Now concerning money, and all warlike furniture: it was, he said, well known, that the Kingdoms of Asia had always thereof great plenty. So as they were much deceived: who considering the late War made against Philip, did think that this with Antiochus would prove the like: the case was too far different. Yet this most powerful King, that for the liberty of Greece was come from the utmost parts of the East; requested no more of the *Acha*eans, than that they would hold themselves as neutral, and quietly look on, whilst he took order with the Romans. To the same effect spake the *Ætoli*an Embassador, and further added, That in the Battle at Cyncephale, neither Titus had done the part of a General, nor the Romans of good Soldiers: but that both he and his Army had been there destroyed, had they not been protected by virtue of the *Ætoli*ans, which carried the day. Titus was present at the Council, and heard all this: to which he made as fit answer, as could have been desired. He told the *Acha*eans, That neither the Kings Embassador, nor the *Ætoli*an, did so greatly labour to persuade those unto whom they addressed their Orations; as to vaunt themselves the one unto the other. So as a man might well discern what good correspondence in vanity it was, that had thus linked the King and the *Ætoli*ans together. For even such brags as here they made before the *Acha*eans, who knew them to be Lyars, had the *Ætoli*ans also made unto King Antiochus: Proclaiming the victory over Philip to be merely their Act: and the whole Country of Greece to be dependent on them. Interchangeably had they been flattered by the King, with such tales as his Embassador told even now; of Lathians, and Aradians, and Elmians, and many others: that were all but a company of Syrians, such as were wont to be sold about for bond-slaves, and good for little else. These divers names of rascals People, were he said, like to the diversity of Venison, wherewith a friend of his at Chalcis, (no such Vauter as were these Embassadors) had sometime feasted him. For all that variety, wherewith he wondered, was none other, as his Host then merrily told him; than (so many pieces of one tame Swine, dressed after several fashions, with variety of sauces. Setting therefore aside this vanity of idle pomp: it were good to make judgement of the Great King by his present doing. He had notwithstanding all this great noise, no more than ten thousand men about him: for which little Army he was slain in a manner to beg Victuals of the Etolians: and take up money at usury to defray his charges. And thus he ran up and down the Country; from Demetrias to Lamis; thence back to Chalcis; and being there shut out, to Demetrias again. These were the fruits of lies: wherewith, since both Antiochus and the Etolians had each deluded others: meet it was that they should, as perhaps already they did, repent, whilst wiser men took heed by their example. To a favourable Auditory much persuasion is needless. The Acheans did not love so well the Etolians, as to desire that they should become Princes of Greece: but rather wished to see them, of all other, made the veriest objects. Wherefore they stood not to hearken after news, what Antiochus did, how he sped in Euboea, or what other Cities were like to take his part: but readily proclaimed War against him, and against the Etolians.

How the hatred between these two Nations grew inveterate; sufficiently appears in the story fore-going. Now have they gotten each their Patrons: the one, the Romans; the other King Antiochus. Herein did each of them unwisely: though far the greater blame ought to be laid on the turbulent spirits of the Etolians. For when the Romans departed out of Greece, and left the Country at rest: there was nothing more greatly to have been desired, than that they might never find occasion to return with an Army thither again. And in this respect ought the Greeks to have fought, not how Smyrna and Lampsacus might recover their Liberty, (which had never been held a matter worth regarding, until now of late) but how the powers of the East and West, divided and kept asunder by their Country, as two Seas by an Isthmus, or neck of Land, might be kept from overflowing the Bar that parted them. Neither had the Romans any better pretence for their seeking to make free those base Asiatiques, who originally were Greeks; than the general applause, wherewith all the Nation entertained this their loving offer. Yet were Lysimachia, and the Towns in Thrace, lately gotten by Antiochus, pretended as a very great cause of fear, that should move them to take arms even in their own defence. But if all Greece would have made intercession, and requested that things might continue as they were, promising jointly to assist the Romans with their whole Forces both by Land and Sea, whensoever King Antiochus should make the least offer to stir against them: then had not only this quarrel been at an end; but the Roman Patronage over the Country, had been far from growing, as soon after it did, into a Lordly rule.

The Acheans were at this time, in a manner the only Nation of Greece, that freely and generously declared themselves altogether for the Romans, their friends and benefactors. All the rest gave doubtful answers of hope unto both sides: or if some few, as did the Thessalians, were firm against Antiochus; yet helped they not one another in the quarrel, nor shewed themselves his Enemies, till he pressed them with open force. The Beotians willingly received him, as soon as he entered upon their borders, not so much for fear of his power, as in hatred of Thus and the Romans, by whom they had been somewhat hardly used. Amintander the Atthamian, besides his old friendship with the Etolians, was caught with a bait, which may be doubted whether he did more foolishly swallow, or Antiochus cast out. He had married the Daughter of an Arcadian, that was an idle-headed man, and vaunted himself to be descended from Alexander the Great: naming his two sons, in that regard, Philip and Alexander. Philip, the elder of these Brethren, accompanied his sister to the poor Court of Atthamania: where having made his folly known, by talking of his Pedegree; He was judged by Antiochus and the Etolians, a man fit for their turns. They made him believe, that in regard of his high Parentage, and the famous memory of Alexander his forefather; it was their purpose, to do their best for the conquest of Macedon to his behoof: since no man had thereto good title as he. But for the enabling them hereunto; it behoved him to draw Amintander to their party, that so they might the sooner have done with the Romans. Philip was highly pleased herewith; and by persuasions of himself or of his Sister, effected as much as they desired. But the first piece of service done by this imaginary King (whether it proceeded from his own phrenzie in hope to get love of the Macedonians that should be his Subjects: or whether whether from some vanity in King Antiochus that employed him) wrought more harm to his friends, than he and Amintander were able to do good. There were two thousand men committed to his leading: with which he marched unto Cynosephale, there to gather up the bones of the slaughtered Macedonians; whom their King had offered all this while to lie unburied. The Macedons troubled not themselves to think on this charitable act, as if it were to them any benefit at all: but King Philip took it in high indignation; as intended merely unto his despite. Wherefore he presently sent unto the Romans; and gave them to understand, that he was ready with all his power to aid them whereinsoever they should be pleased to use him.

The Etolians, Magnetians, Enbeans, Beotians, and Atthamians, having now all joined with him: Antiochus took counsel of them about the prosecution of the War in hand. The chief question was, Whether it were meet for him to invade Thessaly, that would not hearken to his persuasions: or whether to let all alone until the Spring; because it was now mid-winter. Some thought one thing, and some another; confirming each his own sentence, with the weightiest reasons which he could alledge: as in a matter of great importance. Hannibal was at this meeting: who had long been cast aside, as a vessel of no use, but was now required to deliver his opinion. He freely told the King, That what he should now utter, was even the same which he would have spoken, had his counsel at any time before been asked since their coming into Greece. For the Magnetians, Beotians, and other their good friends, which now so willingly took their parts: what were they else than so many poor citizens, that wanting force of their own, did adjoin themselves for fear unto him, that was strongest for the present: and would afterwards, when they saw it expedient, be as ready to fall to the contrary side, alledging the same fear for their excuse? Wherefore he thought it most behoofeful to win King Philip of Macedon unto their party: who (besides that being once engaged, he should not afterwards have power to re-coyle and forsake them at his pleasure) was a mighty Prince; and one that had means to sustain the Roman War with his proper forces. Now that Philip might be easily perwaded to join with them, the benefit likely to redound unto himself, by their society, was a very strong Argument: though indeed, what need was there, of proving by inference the likelihood of this hope: For,

[said He, These Etolians here present; and namely, this Thoas being lately Embassador from them into Asia, among other mooves which he then used to excite the King unto this Expedition, insisted mainly on the same point. He told us that Philip was moved beyond all patience, with the Lordly insolence of the Romans: likened that King to some wild beast, that was chained or locked up within some grate, and would fain break loose. If this be so: let us break his chain, and pull down the grate, that he may regain his liberty, and satisfy his angry stomach, upon those that are common enemies to us and him. But if it prove otherwise, and that his fear be greater than his indignation: then shall it behoove us to look unto him; that he may not seek to please his good masters the Romans, by offending us. Your son Seleucus is now at Lysimachia, with part of your Army: if Philip will not hearken to our Embassy; let Seleucus be in readiness to fall upon Macedon, and find him work to defend his own on the other side, without putting us here to trouble. Thus much concerning Philip, and the present war in Greece. But more generally for the managing of this great enterprise, wherein you are now embarked against the Romans, I told you my opinion at the beginning: wherein to had you then given ear, the Romans by this time should have heard otherwise, than that Chalcis in Euboea was become ours. Italy and Gaul should have been on fire with war; and little to their comfort, they should have understood, that Hannibal was again come into Italy. Neither do I see what should hinder us even now from taking the same course. Send for all your Fleet and Army hither (but in any case let ships of burden come along with them, laden with store of victuals: For, as the cyle now stands, we have here too few hands and too many mouths.) Wherefore let the one half be employed against Italy; whilst you in person with the other half, carrying on this side the Ionian Sea, may both take order for the affairs of Greece, and therewithal wake countenance; as if you were even ready to follow us into Italy: yea, and be ready to follow us indeed, if it should be requisite. This is my advice; who though perhaps I am not very skilful in all sorts of war; yet how to war with the Romans, I have been instructed by long experience, both to their cost and mine own. Of this Counsel will I give, I promise you my faithful and unaltered service for the execution: but what Counsel never you please to follow, I wish it may be prosperous. Many were pleased with the great spirit of the man, and said, he had spoken gravely: but of all this was nothing done; save only that one was sent into Asia; to make all things ready there. In the mean while

they went in hand with Thessaly; about which they had before disputed. There when they had won one Town by force, many other places, doubting their own strength, were glad to make submission. But Larissa that was chief of the Country, stood out: not regarding any terrible threats of the King; that lay before the walls with his whole Army. This their faith and courage was rewarded by good fortune. For M. Eubius, a Roman Proprietor, did send help thither. Likewise Philip of Macedon professed himself enemy unto Antiochus, whereby the fame of the succour coming to Larissa, grew such, as wrought more than the succour could have done, had it arrived. For Antiochus perceiving many fires on the Mountain tops afar off; thought that a great Army of Romans and Macedonians had been coming upon him. Therefore excusing himself by the time of the year; He brake up his siege, and marched away to Chalcis. At Chalcis he fell in love with a young Maiden; daughter unto a Citizen of the Town; whom, without regard of the much disproportion that was between them, both in years and fortune, He shortly married; and so spent the winter following as delightfully as he could, without thinking upon the war in hand. His great men and Captains followed his example; & the Souldiers as readily imitated their Captains: in such wise, that when he took the field, he might evidently perceive in what loose manner of discipline his army had passed the winter. But M. Acilius Glabrio, the Roman Consul, shall meet him very shortly, and help him to reclaim them from this looseness of nuptial Revels by setting them to harder exercise.

M. Acilius was chosen Consul with P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica. The war against Antiochus fell to him by lot; whereas otherwise, He was no way so honourable, as Nasica, his Colleague: unto whom tell a charge, of far less credit and importance. Nasica, besides the great Nobility of his Family, had been long since, in time of the Punic War, Crowned with the title of The best man in Rome: when the Senate for very fear and superstition, durst not have so pronounced him, had they not so thought him, as being commanded by Oracle, that none other man than the very best, should entertain on old stone, which the Devil then taught them to call The Mother of the Gods. But no prerogative of Birth, Virtue or good opinion, gave such advantage to the better man, as to make choice of his own Province: or arrogate more unto himself; than his lot should afford him. This impartial distribution of employments, helped well to maintain peace and concord.

Scipio was therefore appointed to make war against the Bogians; wherein he purchased the honour of a Triumph, nothing so glorious as was that of his Colleague; though purchased with harder service, requiring the more ability in matter of War. But M. Acilius went over into Greece, with ten thousand foot, two thousand horse, and fifteen Elephants. Ptolemy King of Egypt, notwithstanding his late Alliance with King Antiochus; and Philip King of Macedon; had lately sent Embassadors to Rome, making offer to come each of them in person with all his forces into Italia; there to assist the Consul in this War. Ptolemy sent also gold and silver, toward the defraying of charges; as one, that meant none other than good earnest. But he was too young and dwelt too far off: So his money was returned unto him with thanks; and his loving offer as lovingly refused. Unto Philip's Embassadors, answer was made; that this his friendly offer was gratefully accepted: and that the Senate and People of Rome would think themselves beholden to him, for the assistance that he should give to Acilius the Consul. Masaniissa likewise, and the Carthaginians, did strive, which of them should be most forward in gratifying the Romans. Each of them promised a great quantity of grain; which they would send partly to Rome, partly to the Army in Greece. And herein Masaniissa far out-went the poor City of Carthage; as also in that he offered to lend the Consul five hundred horse, and twenty Elephants. On the other side, the Carthaginians undertook to set out a Fleet at their own charges: and to bring in at one payment, all the Tribute-money which was behind, and ought to be discharged by many yearly pensions. But the Romans did neither think it good, to let them arm a Fleet: nor would let them redeem themselves out of Tribute, by paying all at once. As for the Corn, it was accepted, with condition that they should be contented to receive the price of it.

The hasty and ridiculous issue of this War, that began with such noise and preparations, were hardly credible: were not the difference exceeding great between the Roman and the Asiatic Souldier. Antiochus had gotten this Spring a few Towns of Acarnania, after the same manner as he had prevailed in other parts of Greece; partly by fair words, and treason of the rulers; partly by terrour, that was like to prove his excuse when they should again forsake him. But King Philip and Babins having recovered many places; & the Roman Consul being arrived, against whom none made resistance; he was glad to withdraw himself. Aminander fled out of his Atthamania: which the Macedonian took and enjoyed; as in recompence of his good service to the Romans. Philip the brother of Aminander's wife, was taken by the Consul; made a mocking-stock, and sent away prisoner to Rome. The Thessalians used much more diligence in returning to their old friends, than they had done in yielding to the King. All their Cities one after another, gave up themselves: the Garrisons of Antiochus, compounding only for their own lives, and departing unarmed: yet so, that a thousand of them stayed behind, and took pay of the Romans. This did wonderfully perplex Antiochus; who having withdrawn himself to Chalcis, and hearing how things went, cried out upon his friends: and said, That they had betrayed him. He had taken a great deal of toyl during one half of a winter, and spent the other half in such Nuptials, as were little to his honour: after which, in time of need, he found all the promises of the Asiatics merely verbal: and himself reduced into terms of great extremity. He therefore admired Hannibal as a wise man, yea, a very Prophet, that had foreseen all this long before. Nevertheless, he sent word to the Asiatics, that they should now make ready all their forces: as considering their own need to be no less than his. But the Asiatics had cause to think, that they themselves were shamefull disappointed by Antiochus; who having promised to do great wonders, was in all this while seconded by no greater numbers out of Asia, than so many as would fill up the same ten thousand which he first brought over. Yet came there some of them, though fewer than at any time before, which joyed with him. Hereat the King was angry: and could get no better satisfaction, than that Thoon and his fellows had done their best in vain, to have made all the Nation take Arms. Since therefore neither his own men came over to him out of Asia, nor his friends of Greece would appear in this time of danger: He seized upon the Straights of Thermopylae; as meaning to defend them against the Romans, until more help should come. Of the Straights of Thermopylae, there hath been spoken enough * before, upon many occasions: and then chiefly, when they were defended by Leonidas against the huge Army of Xerxes. Wherefore it may easily be conceived, how the Romans, that landed about Apollonia, and so came onwards into Thessaly, were unable to pass that Ledge of Mountains, dividing the one half of Greece; unless they could win this difficult entrance.

But there was great difference between Leonidas and Antiochus. The former of these, with an handful of men, defended this passage two or three daies together, against a world of men coming to invade the Country. The latter, having taken upon him to do great miracles, and effect what he listed himself in Greece: did commit himself unto the safety of this place, when he was charged by not many more than he had in his own Army. There whilst he lay, He sent earnest messengers one after another to the Asiatics, entreating them not to forsake him thus: but at least wise now to help, and keep the tops of the mountains, lest the Romans, finding any by-path, should come down upon him. By this opportunity, he got of them two thousand, that undertook to make good the two passages: by which only, and not without extreme difficulty, it was possible for the Enemy to ascend. The Roman Consul in like sort prepared to force the Straights; without staying to expect King Philip: that was hindered by sickness from accompanying him. He had with him M. Porcius Cato, and L. Valerius Flaccus, that had both of them been Consuls. These he sent forth by night with two thousand men, to try whether by any means they could get up to the Asiatics. He himself encouraged his Army; not only by telling them with what base conditioned enemies they had to deal: but what rich Kingdoms Antiochus held, that should bountifully reward them if they were victors. This was on the day before the battle. All that night Cato had a sore journey (for what happened unto L. Valerius it is uncertain, save only that he failed in his intent) and so much the worse, for that he had no skilful guide. Seeing therefore his men exceedingly tired, with climbing up steepy Rocks, and crooked waies: He commanded them to repose themselves; whilst he, being a very able man of body, took in hand the discovery, accompanied with no more than one of like metal to himself. After a great deal of trouble, he found at length a path: which he took to be, as indeed it was, the best way leading unto the Enemies. So thither he brought his men; and held on the same path till toward break of day. It was a place not haunted, because in time of peace, there was a fair way thow the Straights below, that required no such trouble of climbing; neither had this entrance of the Thermopylae been so often the Seat of War, as might cause any travellers to search out the passages of those desolate Mountains. Wherefore the way that Cato followed, though it were the best; yet did it lead him to a bog at the end, which would suffer him to pass no further. So he staid there until day-light : by which he discovered both the Camp of the Greeks underneath him ; and some of the Ætolians very near unto him, that were keeping watch. He therefore sent forth a lusty Crew of his men, whom he thought fittest for that service ; and willed them by any means to get him some prisoners. This was effected : and he thereby understood, that these Ætolians were no more than six hundred ; as also that King Antiochus lay beneath in the Valley. So he presently set upon the Ætolians, overthrew them, slew a great part of them, and chased the rest, that by flying to their Camp, guided him unto it. The fight was already begun between the Armies below : and the Romans, that had easily repelled the Kings men, and driven them into their Camp, found it, in a manner, a desperate piece of work to assault the Camp itself, which occupied the wide breadth of the Straights, was notably fortified ; and not only defended by Antiochus his long Pikes, which were best at that kind of service ; but by Archers and Slingers that were placed over them on the Hill-side, and poured down a shower of weapons on their heads. But Cato his approach determined the matter. It was thought, at first, that the Ætolians had been coming to help the Kings men : but when the Roman Arms and Ensigns were discovered, such was the terror, that none made offer of resistance ; but all of them forsook the Camp, and fled. The slaughter was not great : for that the badness of the way did hinder the Roman Army from making pursuit. Yet this daies loss drove Antiochus out of Greece, who directly fled to Chalcis ; and from thence with the first opportunity, got him back into Asia.

All the Cities that had embraced the friendship of Antiochus, prepared forthwith to entertain the Romans, and entreat for pardon : setting open their gates ; and presenting themselves unto the Consul, in manner of suppliants. Briefly, in few daies all was recovered that Antiochus had gained : the Ætolians only standing out, because they knew not what else to do. Neither did the Consul give them any respite. At his return from Chalcis, he met with King Philip, that having recovered health, came to join with him against Antiochus : over whom, since the victory was already gotten, He did gratulate unto the Romans their good success ; and offered to take part with them in the Ætolian War. So it was agreed, That the Consul should besiege Heraclæa ; and Philip Lamia ;

at the same time. Each of them plied his work hard ; especially Philip, who said would have taken Lamia before the Consul should come to help him. But it could not be. For his Macedonians that used to work by Myne, were over-much hindered by the stony ground. Yet was Lamia even ready to be taken, when the Consul, having won Heraclæa, came thither, and told Philip, that the spoil of these Towns was a reward unto those that had fought at Thermopylæ. Herewith Philip must be contented ; and therefore went his way quietly. But Antiochus, that could so ill endure to see Philip in likelihood of thriving by the Romans victory, got not Lamia himself : until such time as another Consul was ready to ease him of his charge.

The loss of Heraclæa did so affright the Ætolians, that they thought no way safer than to desire peace. Yet had they sent unto King Antiochus presently after his flight : intreating him not to forsake them utterly, but either to return with all those forces which he had purposed to bring into Greece ; or if any thing with-held him from coming in person, at leastwise to help them with money and other aid. They prayed him to consider, that this did not only concern him in honour ; but appertained unto his own safety : since it would be much to his hurt if the Ætolians being wholly subdued, the Romans, without any enemies at their backs, might set upon him in Asia. He considered well of this, and found their words true. Therefore he delivered unto Nicanor, one of their Embassadors, a sum of money, that might serve to defray the charges of the War : promising that ere long he would send them strong aid, both by Land and Sea. Thom, another of their Embassadors, He retained with him ; who willingly stayed, that he might urge the King to make his word good. But when Heraclæa was taken from them ; then did the Ætolians lay aside all hope of amending their fortune by the help of Antiochus ; and made suit unto the Consul to obtain peace, upon any reasonable condition. The Consul would scarce vouchsafe to give them audience, but said, He had other business in hand ; only he granted them ten daies of Truce, and sent L. Valerius Flaccus with them to Hypata, willing them to make him acquainted with as much as they would have delivered unto himself. At their coming to Hypata, they began, as men favouring their own cause, to alledge how well they had deserved of the Romans. Whereto Flaccus would not hearken. He told them plainly, That the memory of such good offices past, was quite obliterated by the the malice which they had shewed of late. Wherefore he willed them to acknowledge their fault, and to entreat pardon. Better they thought to do so even betimes, than to stay till they were reduced unto terms of more extremity. Hereupon they agreed to commit themselves unto the faith of the Romans ; and to that effect sent Embassadors to the Consul. This phrase of committing unto the faith, signified, in their use of it, little else than the acknowledgement of a fault done, and the craving of pardon. But the Romans used those words in another sense ; and counted them all one, as * yielding to discretion. Wherefore when the Consul heard them speak in this manner : He asked them whether their meaning were agreeable to their words. They answered that it was : and shewed him the decree of their Nation, lately made to this purpose. Then, said he, I command you first of all, That none of you presume to go into Asia, upon any business, private or publick : then, That ye deliver up unto me Dicæarchus the Ætolian, Mentor the Epirot, Amisander the Asiatic, and such of his Countreymen as have followed him in revolting from us. While he was yet speaking ; Phœmeus the Embassador interrupted him ; and prayed him not to mistake the custom of the Greeks, who had yielded themselves unto his faith, not unto slavery. What ? (said the Consul) Do ye stand to plead Custom with me, being now in my discretion ? Bring hither a chain. With that, chains were brought ; and an Iron collar, by his appointment, fitted unto every one of their necks. This did so affright them, that they stood dumb, and knew not what to say. But Valerius and some others entreated the Consul, not to deal thus hardly with them, since they came as Embassadors ; though since, their condition was altered. Phœmeus also spake for himself ; and said, That neither he, nor yet the Apocleti or ordinary Council for the Nation, were able to fulfill these Injunctions ; without approbation of the general Assembly. For which cause he entreated yet further ten daies respite ; and had granted unto him Truce for so long.

This surcease of War, during ten, and other ten daies together, began presently after the taking of Heraclæa ; when Philip had been commanded away from Lamia, that else he might have won. Now because of the indignity herein offered unto that King, and to the end that he might not return home with his Army, like one that could not be trusted in employment : especially the Romans being like hereafter to have further need of him in the continuance of this War ; He was desired to set upon the Asiatic, and some other petty Nations their borderers, whilst the Consul was busied with the Ætolians : taking for his reward, all that he could get. And he got in that space all Attamania, Perrebeia, Aperantia, and Dolopia. For the Ætolians hearing what had befallen their Embassadors, were so enraged, That although they were very ill provided for War, yet they could not endure to hear more talk of Peace. And it happened, that Nicanor about the same time was come back from Antiochus, with money and hopeful promises : the Romans abiding still about Heraclæa, and Philip having lately risen from before Lamia, yet not being far gone thence. His money Nicanor conveyed into Lamia, by very unusual dexterity. But he himself being to pass further to the Assembly of the Ætolians, there to make report of his Embassy ; was very much perplexed about this his journey, which lay between the Roman and Macedonian Camps. Yet he made the adventure : and keeping as far as he could from the Roman side, fell upon a Station of Macedonians ; by whom he was taken, and led unto their King. He expected no good : but either to be delivered unto the Romans, or used ill enough by Philip. But it seems, that the King had not hitherto considered well the indignity of his being sent away from Lamia. For he commanded his servants to entreat Nicanor friendly ; and he himself being then at supper, did visit him ; soon as he rose up : giving him to understand, That the Ætolians did now reap the fruits of their own madness ; forasmuch as they could never hold themselves contented, but would needs be calling Strangers into Greece. They had pleased themselves well, in their acquaintance first with the Romans, and then with King Antiochus ; but himself, being their neighbour, they could never well endure. It was now therefore, he said, high time for them to have regard unto his friendship, whereof hitherto they never made any trial : for surely their good affection, one unto the other, would be much more available unto each of them, than their mutual catching of advantages ; whereby they had wrought themselves much displeasure. Thus much the King willed Nicanor to signify unto his Countreymen ; and privately to hold in mind the courtesy which he then did him, in sending him safe home. So giving him a Convoy to guard him to Hypata, he lovingly dismissed him. For this benefit, Nicanor was always after dutifully affected to the Crown of Macedon : so as in the war of Perseus he made himself suspected unto the Romans, and therefore was had away to Rome, where he ended his life.

When the Consul understood, that the Ætolians refused to make their submission, in such a way as he required it: he forthwith meant to prosecute the war against them, without any longer forbearance. They were preparing to make head against him at Naupactus: whither he therefore directly marched, to try what they could or durst. The siege of Naupactus was of greater length, than the Romans had preconceived it: for it was a strong City, and well manned. But Scipio stood upon point of honour; wherein he thought that he should have been a loser by rising from before it without Victory. So he layd there well-near all the following time of his Consulship; whilst the Macedonian King and the Acheans, made far better use of the Roman Victory. Philip, as is said before, being allowed to take in such places as had revolted unto Antiochus, and were not hitherto reclaimed, won the strong City of Demetrius, and with an hasty course of Victory, subdued the Atamanians and others. The Acheans called to account the Eleans and Messenians: which had long been addicted to the Ætolian side; and followed it, in taking part with Antiochus. The Eleans gave good words; whereby they saved themselves from trouble a while. The Messenians being more stout, before they were invaded, had none other help when the Achean Prætor wasted their Country, than to offer themselves unto the Romans. Titus was then at Corinth: to whom they sent word, That at his Commandment their gates should be opened; but that unto the Acheans it was not their meaning to yield. A message from Titus to the Achean Prætor, did suffice to call home the Army, and finish the War: as also the peremptory Command of the same Titus, caused the Messenians to annex themselves unto the Acheans, and become part of their Common-weal. Such was now the Majesty of a Roman Embassador. Titus did favour the Acheans; yet could not like it well, that either they or any other should take too much upon them. He thought it enough, that they oad their liberty, and were strong enough to defend it against any of their neighbours. That they should make themselves great Lords, and able to dispute with the Romans upon even terms, it was no part of his desire. They had lately bought the Isle of Zacynthus; which had once been Philip's, and was afterward given by him to Aminander, who sent a Governour thither. But when Aminander in this present war, was driven out of his own Kingdom by Philip, then did the Governour of Zacynthus offer to sell the Island to the Acheans; whom he found ready Chapman. Titus liked not of this: but plainly told them, That the Romans would be their own Carvers, and take what they thought good, of the Lands belonging to their Enemies; as a reward of the victory which they had obtained. It was bootless to dispute. Wherefore the Acheans referred themselves unto his discretion. So he told them, that their Commonweal was like a Tortoise, whereof Peloponnesus was the shell: and that, holding themselves within that compass, they were out of danger; but if they would needs be looking abroad, they should lie open to blows, which might greatly hurt them. Having settled things thus in Peloponnesus, he went over to Naupactus: where Glabrio the Consul had lain two months, that might have been far better spent. There, whether out of compassion which he had upon the Ætolians, or out of dislike of King Philip, thriving so fast: he persuaded the Consul to grant unto the besieged, and to the whole Nation, so long truce, that they might send Embassadors to Rome; and submitted themselves, crave pardon of the Senate. Most like it is, that Naupactus was in great danger: else would not the Ætolians have made such earnest suit as they did unto Titus, for procuring of this favour. But if Glabrio had been sure to carry it in any short space, it may well be thought he would not have gone away without it; since the winning of that Town, wherein was then the whole flower of the Nation, would have made the promised submission much more humble and sincere. When they came unto Rome, no entreaty could help them to better Condition, than one of these two; That either they should wholly submit themselves to the good pleasure of the Senate; Or else pay a thousand talents, and make neither peace nor war with any; further than the Romans should give approbation. They had not so much money: neither could they well hope to be gently dealt withal, if they should give themselves away unto discretion; which, what it signified, they now understood. Wherefore they desired to have it set down, in what points, and how far forth they should yield unto the good pleasure of the Senate. But hereof they could get no certain answer: so that they were dismissed as enemies, after long and vain attendance.

Whilst the Ætolians were pursuing their hopes of peace, the Consul had little to do in Greece, and therefore took upon him gravely to set things in order among the tractable Acheans.

Acheans. He would have had them to restore the banished Lacedæmonians home into their Country; and to take the Eleans into the fellowship of their Commonweal. This the Acheans liked well enough: but they did not like it, that the Romans should be meddling in all occurrences. Wherefore they deferred the restitution of the banished Lacedæmonians: intending to make it an Act of their own meer grace. As for the Eleans, they were loth to be beholding to the Romans, and thereby to disparage the Acheans into whose Corporation they were desirous to be admitted, and saw that they should have their desire, without such compulsive mediation.

The Roman Admiral C. Livius, much about the same time, fought a battel at Sea with Polyxenidas, Admiral to the King Antiochus. King Eumenes brought help to the Romans, thought it was not great: and five and twenty sail of Rhodians came after the battel, when they were following the Chase. The Kings Fleet was the better of fail, but that of the Romans the better manned. Wherefore Polyxenidas being vanquished in fight, was yet out of danger; as soon as he took himself to a speedy retreat.

And such end had the first years war between King Antiochus and the Romans. After this, as many of the Greeks as had followed the vain hopes of the Ætolians were glad to excuse themselves by fear; thinking themselves happy when by Embassadours they had obtained pardon. On the contrary side, Philip of Macedon, Arch-enemy of late unto the Romans, did now send to congratulate their victory: and, in recompence of his good affection, had restored unto him Demetrius his younger Son; whom some few years they had kept as an hostage. Also King Ptolomy of Egypt, gratulating the Roman Victory, sent word how greatly all Asia and Syria were thereby terrified. In which regard he desired the Senate not to foretell time; but to send an Army, as soon as might be, into Asia: promising, that his assistance, whereinsoever it pleased them to use it, should not be wanting. This Ptolomy was the Son-in-law of King Antiochus: but he was the friend of fortune. He understood long before, as did all that were indifferent beholders of the contention, that the Romans were like to have the upper hand. The same did Antiochus now begin to suspect, who had thought himself a while as safe at Ephesus, as if he had been in another world: but was told by Hannibal, That it was not so far out of Greece into Asia, as out of Italy into Greece, and that there was no doubt but the Romans would soon be there, and make him try the chance of a battel for his Kingdom.

6. VIII.

Lucius Scipio, having with him Publius the African his elder Brother, for his Lieutenant, is sent into Greece. He grants long truce to the Ætolians, that so he might at leisure pass into Asia. Antiochus troubles some business by Sea, and divers fights. An invitation upon Eumenes his Kingdom, with the siege of Pergamus, raised by an handful of the Acheans. L. Scipio the Consul comes into Asia: where Antiochus most earnestly desires peace, and is denied it. The battel of Magnesia, wherein Antiochus being vanquished, yieldseth to the Romans good pleasure. The conditions of the peace. In what sort the Romans spoiled their enemy. L. Cornelius Scipio, after a most sumptuous triumph over Antiochus, is banished the African.

Lucius Cornelius Scipio, the brother of L. Scipio the African, was chosen Consul at Rome with C. Lælius. Lælius was very gracious in the Senate: and therefore being desirous (as generally all Consuls were) of the more honourable employment, offered to refer to the arbitrement of the Senate, if L. Cornelius would be so pleased, the disposition of their Provinces; without putting it to the hazard of a Lottery. Lucius having talked with his brother Publius, approved well of the motion. Such a question had not of long time been put unto the Fathers; who therefore were the more desirous to make an unblameable Decree. But the matter, hearing otherwise somewhat indifferent, L. Scipio the African said openly thus much, That if the Senate would appoint his brother to the war against Antiochus, He himself would follow his brother in that war, as his Lieutenant. These words were heard with such approbation, that the Controversie was forthwith at an end. For it Antiochus relied upon Hannibal, and would happen to be directed wholly by that great Captain, what better man could they oppose than Scipio: that had been victorious against that same great Worthy? But indeed a worse man might have served well enough the turn. For Hannibal had no absolute command, nor scarce any trust of great importance: excepting now and then in consultation; where his wisdom was much approved, but his liberty and high spirit as much disliked. It is worthy thy of remembrance, as a sign of the freedom that he used in his censures, even whilst he lived in such a Court. Antiochus mused his Army in presence of this famous Captain: thinking, as may seem, to have made him wish, that he had been served by such brave men in Italy. For they were gallantly decked, Both Men, Horses, and Elephants, with such costly furniture of gold, silver, and purple, as glittered with a terrible bravery on a Sunshine day. Whereupon the King, well pleasing him'self with that goodly spectacle, asked Hannibal what he thought; and whether all this were not enough for the Romans. Enough (said Hannibal) were the Romans the most covetous men in all the world: meaning that all this cost upon the backs of cowardly Africans, was no better than a spoil to animate good Souldiers. How little this answer pleased the King, it is easie to guess. The little use that he made of this Carthaginian, testifies that his dislike of the man, caused him to lose the use of his service, when he stood in greatest necessity thereof.

The Scipio's made all haste away from Rome as soon as they could. They carried with them, besides other Souldiers newly prest to the war, about five thousand Voluntaries, that had served under P. Africanus. There was also a Fleet of thirty Quinquerems, Gallies, and twenty Triremes newly built, appointed unto L. Emilio Regillus, that was chosen Admiral the same year for that voyage. At their coming into Greece, they found the old Consul Glaborio besieging Amphissa a City of the Ætolians. The Ætolians after that they were denied peace, had expected him once again at Nanpæus. Wherefore they not only fortified that Town, but kept all the passages thereto leading; which heedlessly, as in a time of confusion, they had left unregarded the last year. Glaborio knowing this, deceived their expectation, and fell upon Lamis: which being not long since much weakened by Philip, and now by him attempted on the sudden; was carried at the second assault. Thence went he to Amphissa: which he had almost gotten, when L. Scipio, his successor, came with thirteen thousand Foot, and five hundred Horses, and took charge of the Army. The Town of Amphissa was presently forsaken by the Inhabitants: but they had a Castle, or high Town, that was impregnable; whereinto they all retired. The Athenian Embassadors had dealt with P. Scipio, in behalf of the Ætolians: entreating him to stand their friend, and help them in obtaining some tolerable condition of peace. He gave them gentle words, and willed them to persuade the Ætolians, that they should faithfully, and with true meaning desiré it. This was gladly taken. But many messengers passing to and fro: though Publius continued to put them in good hope; yet the Consul made still the same answer, with which they had been chafed from Rome. The Conclusion was, That they should sue for a longer time of respite from war: whereby at more leisure they might attend some better disposition of the Senate; or any helpful commodity which time should afford. So they obtained halfe a years truce: after which, the winter was like to afford them another half years leisure of breathing. Hereof were they not more glad, than was P. Scipio: who thought all time lost, which with-held the War from passing over into Asia.

The business of Atolla being thus laid aside, and the old Consul Glaborio sent home into Italy, the Scipio's marched into Thessaly; intending thence to take their way by Land, through Macedon and Thrace unto the Hellepont. Yet they considered, that hereby they must commit themselves unto the loyalty of King Philip: who might either do them some mischief by the way, if he were disposed to watch a notable advantage: or at the least, would he be unfaithful though he were not so courageous, yet might he take such order with the Thracians, that even for want of victuals, if by no greater inconvenience, they should be disgracefully forced to return. He had promised them the utmost of his furtherance: wherein, whether he meant sincerely, they thought to make some tryal; by causing a Gentleman to ride Post unto him, and observe his doings as he should take him on the sudden. The King was merry at a fest, and drinking when the Messenger came: whom he lovingly bade welcome; and shewed him the next day, not only what provision of victuals he had made for the Army, but how he had made bridges over the Rivers, and mended the bad ways by which they were to pass. With these good news Gracchus returned back in haste unto the Scipio's: who entering into Macedon, found all things in a readiness, that might help to advance their journey. The King entertained them royally, and brought them on their way, even to the Hellepont: where they stayed a good while, until their Navy was in readiness to transport them into Asia.

Much was done at Sea in the beginning of this year; though, for the most part, little of importance. Polyxenidas, the Admiral of Antiochus, was a banished Rhodian: true to the King, and desirous of revenge upon his Country-

Country men, that had expelled him. He, hearing that the Rhodian Fleet was at Samos, the Romans and Emmenes having notes yet put to Sea, thought to do somewhat upon those that were so early in their diligence, before their fellows should arrive to help them. Yet went he craftily to work, and sent word, as in great secrecy, to the Rhodian Admiral, That if the sentence of his banishment might be repealed, He would, in requital thereof, betray all the Kings Fleet. After many passages to and fro, this was believed: and the Rhodian Admiral grew so careless, expecting still when he should receive a watch-word from Polyxenidas that he himself was taken by Polyxenidas in his own Haven. The Kings Fleet setting forth from Ephesus by night; and for fear of being discovered, resting one day in harbour by the way, came the second night to Samos: where, by morning it was ready to enter the Haven. Pausistratus the Rhodian Admiral seeing this, thought it his best way of resistance to bestow his men on the two headlands or points of the Haven; so to guard the mouth of it: for that he saw no likelihood of defending himself by Sea. But Polyxenidas had already landed some Companies in another part of the Island: which falling upon the back of Pausistratus, compelled him to alter his directions, and command his men aboard. This could not be without great confusion: so as the enemies took him out of all order, and sunk or boarded all his Navy, five excepted, that by a sudden device made shift to escape. Each of them hung out a burning Crescent upon two poles, at the Beak-head; and then rowed forwards directly upon the enemy: who having not bethought himself what shift to make against such unexpected danger of firing, was content to fly away unto these desperate Gallies; for fear lest they should burn together with themselves, a part of the Kings Fleet.

Not long after this, the Romans had some loss by tempest: whereof Polyxenidas could not take such advantage as he had hoped; because, putting to Sea for that purpose, he was driven back again by the like foul weather. But the Rhodians, to shew that they were not discouraged, set forth twenty other Gallies: the Romans also with King Emmenes, repaired their fleet; and all of them together, in great bravery presented battle to Polyxenidas before the Haven of Ephesus. When he durst not accept it: they went from place to place, attempting many things, as either they were entreated by the Rhodians, or persuaded by some appearing hopes of doing good. Yet performed they little or nothing: for that one while they were hindered by storms at Sea; and another while by strong resistance made against them at Land.

Emmenes with his Fleet was compelled to forsake them; and return home to the defence of his own Kingdom. For Antiochus waited all the grounds about Elaa and Pergamus: and leaving his Son Selenus to besiege the royal City of Pergamus, did with the rest of his Army spoil the whole Country thereabout. Attalus the brother of King Emmenes, was then in Pergamus; having with him no better men to defend the City, than were they that lay against it. Wherefore he had reason to stand in fear; being too much inferior in number. There came to his aid a thousand foot, and an hundred horse of the Acheans: old souldiers all, and trained up under Philopamen, whose Scholar, in the art of war, Diophanes their commander was. This Diophanes beholding from the walls of Pergamus, which was an high Town, the demeanour of the enemy; began to disdain that such men as they should hold them besieged. For Selenus his Army which was encamped at the hill-foot, seeing that none durst fall forth upon them, grew so careless: as otherwise than by spoiling all behind their backs, they seemed to forget that they were in an enemies Country. Diophanes therefore spake with Attalus: and told him that he would go forth to visit them. Attalus had no liking to this adventure; for he said, that the match was nothing equal. But the Achean would needs have his will: & issuing forth, encamped not far from the enemy. They of Pergamus thought him little better than mad. As for the besiegers; they wondered at first what his meaning was: but when they saw that he held himself quiet, they made a jest of his boldness; and laughed to see with what an handful of men he looked so stoutly. So they returned unto their former negligence and disorders. Which Diophanes perceiving, He commanded all his men to follow him, even as fast as they well might: and he himself, with the hundred horse, brake out on the sudden upon the station that was next at hand. Very few of the enemies had their horses ready saddled, but more few, or none had the hearts to make resistance: so as he drave them all out of their Camps; & chased them as far as he might safely adventure with great slaughter of them, and no loss to his own. Hereat all the Citizens of Pergamus (who had covered the walls of the Town, men and women, to behold this spectacle) were very joyful; and highly magnified the virtue of their Acheans. Yet

would they not therefore issue forth of their gates, to help the Acheans in doing what remained to be done. The next day Selencus encamped half a mile further from the Town, than he had done before: and against him went forth Diophanes the second time; who quietly rested a while in his old Station. When they had stayed many hours, looking who should begin: Selencus in fair order as he came, withdrew himself toward his lodging that was further off. Diophanes moved not whilst the enemy was in sight: but as soon as the ground between them hindered the prospect, he followed them in all haste, and soon overtaking them with his Horse, charged them in the Rere; so as he brake them, and with all his forces pursued them at the heels, to their very Trenches. This boldness of the Acheans, and the baseness of his own men, caused Selencus to quit the siege, little to his honour. Such being the quality of these Asiatiques, Philopamen had cause to tell the Romans, That he envied their victory. For when Antiochus lay feasting at Chalcis after his marriage, and his souldiers betook themselves to Riot, as it had been in a time of great security: a good man of war might have cut all their throats, even as they were tipling in their viualling houses; which Philopamen said that he would have done, had he been General of the Acheans, and not as he then was, a private man.

Antiochus was full of business: and turning his care from one thing to another, with a great deal of travel, brought almost nothing to pass. He had been at Pergamus: into which Enmenes, leaving the Romans, did put himself with a few of his Horse and light armature. Before Pergamus he left his son, as before hath been shewed, and went to Elaa: whither he heard that Emylius the Roman Admiral was come to bring succour to Enmenes. There he made an Overture of peace: about which to consult, Enmenes was sent for by Emylius, and came from Pergamus. But when it was considered, that no conclusion could be made without the Consul: this Treaty brake off. Then followed the overthrow newly mentioned, which caused Selencus to give over the siege of Pergamus. Afterwards, four or five Towns of scarce any worth or note were taken by the King: and the Syrian Fleet, being of seven and thirty Sail, was beaten by the Rhodian which was of like number. But of this victory the Rhodians had no great cause to rejoice: for that Hannibal the Carthaginian, who, together with Apollonius a Courtier of Antiochus, was Admiral of the Syrians, did them in a manner as great hurt as they could do to Apollonius; and having the victory taken out of his hands by Apollonius his flight, yet made such a retreat, that the Rhodians durst not far adventure upon him. Now of these Actions which were but as Prefaces unto the war, the last and greatest was a victory of the Romans by Sea, against Polixenidas the Kings Admiral. The battel was fought by Myonnesus a Promontory in Asia: where Polixenidas had with him fourscore and nine Gallies; and five of them greater than any of the Romans. This being all the strength which he could make by Sea: we may note the vanity of those brags, whereof Antiochus vaunted the last year, That his Armada should cover all the shores of Greece. The Romans had eight and fifty Gallies; the Rhodians two and twenty: the Roman being the stronger built, and more stoutly manned; the Rhodian more light-timbered and thin plankt, having all advantage of speed, and good Sea-men. Neither forgot they to help themselves by the same device, with which five of their Gallies had lately escaped from Samos. For with fire in their Prows they ran upon the enemy: who declining them for fear, laid open his side: and was thereby in greater danger of being stemmed. After no long fight, the Kings Navy hoisted sail: and, having a fair wind, bore away toward Ephesus as fast as they could. Yet forty of their Gallies they left behind them: whereof thirteen were taken, all the rest burnt or sunk. The Romans and their fellows lost only two or three ships: but got hereby the absolute Mastery of the Sea.

The report of this misadventure, may seem to have taken from Antiochus all use of reason. For as if no hope had been remaining to defend those places that he held in Europe, he presently with-drew his Garrisons from Lysimachia: which might easily have been kept even till the end of Winter following, & having reduced the besiegers (if the siege had been continued obstinately) unto terms of great extremity. He also gave over the siege of Colophon: and laying aside all thought save only of defence, drew together all his Army; and sent for help to his Father-in-law, King Ariarathes the Cappadocian.

Thus the Roman Consul, without impediment, not only came to the Hellepont, but had yielded unto him all places there, belonging to Antiochus on Europe side. The Fleet was also then in a readiness to transport him over into Asia: where Enmenes had taken such care before, that he landed quietly at his own good ease; even as if the Country had had been his already. The first news that he heard of the Enemy, was by an Ambassador that came to sue for peace. This Ambassador declared in his Masters name, That the same things which had hindered him from obtaining peace of the Romans heretofore, did now persuade him, that he should easily come to good agreement with them. For in all disputes heretofore, Smyrna, Lampascus, and Lysimachia, had been the places about which they varied. Seeing therefore the King had now already given over Lysimachia, and was further purposed not to strive with the Romans about Lampascus and Smyrna: what reason was there, why they should need to trouble him with War? If it was their desire that any other Towns upon the Coast of Asia, not mentioned by them in any former Treaties, should be also set at liberty, or otherwise delivered into their hands: the King would not refuse to gratify them therein. Briefly, let them take some part of Asia, so as the bounds dividing them from the King, might not be uncertain, and it should be quietly put into their hands. If all this were not enough, the King would likewise bear half the Charges wherewith they had been in this War. So praying the Romans to hold themselves contented with these good offers, and not to be too insolent upon confidence of their fortune, he expected their answer. These offers which to the Ambassador seemed so great, were judged by the Romans to be very little. For they thought it reasonable, that the King should bear all the Charges of the War, since it began through his own fault: and that he should not only depart out of those few Towns which he held in Asia and Ionis; but quite out of Asia the less, and keep himself on the other side of Mount Taurus. When the Ambassador therefore saw that no better bargain could be made, He dealt with P. Scipio in private: and to him he promised a great quantity of Gold, together with the free restitution of his Son, who (it is uncertain by what mischance) was taken prisoner, and most honourably entertained by the King. Scipio would not hearken to the offer of Gold: nor otherwise to the Restitution of his Son, than upon condition, That it might be with making such amends for the benefit, as became a private man. As him. About a thousand of the Kings Horse, for the publick business: He only said thus much, That since Antiochus had already forsaken Lysimachia, and suffered the War to they flew some; and were anon, with take hold on his own Kingdom; there was some loss, driven back over the River: now none other way for him, than either to Two days were quietly spent, whilst neither the King nor the Romans would pass the at his hands. Wherefore, said he, tell your water. The third day the Romans made

King in my name, That I would advise him to refuse no Condition wherby he may have Peace.

The King was not any whit moved with his advice. For seeing that the Consul demanded of him no less than if he had been already subdued: little reason there was, that he should fear to come to battel, wherein he could lose, as he thought, no more, than by seeking to avoid it he must give away. He had with him three score and ten thousand Foot, and twelve thousand Horse; besides two and fifty Indian Elephants; and many Chariots armed with Hooks or Sythes, according to the manner of the Eastern Country. Yet was he nothing pleased to hear that the Consul drew near him apace, as one hastening to fight. But howsoever he was affected: He made so little shew of fear, that hearing P. Scipio to lie sick at Elaa, He sent thither unto him his Son without ransom: as one both desirous to comfort this noble Warriour in his sickness, and withal not desirous to retain the young Gentleman for a pledge of his own safety. Thus ought his bounty to be constant. Otherwise it might be suspected that herein he dealt craftily. For since he could have none other ransom of Scipio, than such an honourable man, that had no great store of wealth, might pay: better it was to do such a courtesy before the battel, as would afterwards have been little worth, than to stay until the Romans, perhaps victorious, should exact it at his hands. P. Scipio was greatly comforted with the Recovery of his Son; so as the joy thereof was thought to have been much available unto his health. In recompence of the Kings humanity, He said only thus much unto those that brought him this acceptable Present, I am now able to make your King none other amends, than by advising him not to fight until he shall hear that I am in the Camp. What he meant by this, it is hard to conjecture. Antiochus resolved to follow his Counsel: and therefore withdrew himself from about Thyatira, beyond the River of Phrygius or Hyllus, unto Magnesia by Sypilus: where encamping, he fortified himself as strongly as he could. Thither followed him L. Scipio the Consul, and sat down within four miles of the River. About a thousand of the Kings Horse, most of them Gallo-Greeks, came to bid the Romans welcome: of whom at first taken hold on his own Kingdom; there was some loss, driven back over the River: now none other way for him, than either to Two days were quietly spent, whilst neither the King nor the Romans would pass the at his hands. Wherefore, said he, tell your water. The third day the Romans made the adventure : wherein they found no disturbance ; nor were at all opposed, until they came within two miles and an half of Antiochus his Camp. There as they were taking up their lodging, they were charged by three thousand Horse and Foot : whom the ordinary Corps de garde repelled. Four dayes together after this, each of them brought forth their Armies ; and set them in order before the Trenches, without advancing any further. The fifth day the Romans came half way forward, and presented battle ; which the King would not accept. Thereupon the Consul took advice what was to be done. For either they must fight upon whatsoever disadvantage, or else resolve to abide by it all Winter, far from any Country of their friends, and therefore subject unto many difficulties : unless they would stain their honour by returning far back, to Winter in a more convenient place ; and so defer the War until the next Spring. The Roman Soldier was thoroughly periwaded of that Enemies base temper. Wherefore it was the general Cry, That this great Army should be assailed, even in the Camp where it lay : as if rather there were so many Beasts to be slaughtered, than men to be fought with. Yet a day or two passed, in discovering the Fortifications of Antiochus, and the safest way to set upon him. All this while P. Scipio came not. Wherefore the King, being loth to dishearten his men, by seeming to stand in fear of the Enemy, resolved to put the matter to trial. So when the Romans took the field again, and ordered their Battels : He also did the like ; and advanced to far, that they might understand his meaning to fight.

The Roman Army consisted of four Legions, two Roman and two Latine : in each of which were five thousand and four hundred men. The Latines, as usually, were in the points ; the Roman, in the mean battle. All of them, according to their wonted form, were divided into Maniples. The Histati had the leading : after them followed the Principes, at such distance as was usual ; and last of all, the Triarii. Now beside these, there were about three thousand Auxiliaries ; partly Acheans, and partly such as belonged to Eumenes : which were placed in an equal Front beyond the Latines in the right wing. Utmost of all (save some five hundred Cretians, and of the Trallians) were almost three thousand Horse : of which, Eumenes had brought thither eight hundred ; the rest being Roman. The left wing was fenced by the bank of the River : yet four troops of Horse were placed there, though such help seemed in a manner needless. Two thousand Voluntaries, Macedonians and Thracians, were left to guard the Camp. The Consul had with him sixteen African Elephants, which he bestowed in his Rear : forasmuch as had they come to fight with those of Antiochus, they only would have served to discourage his men ; as being sure to be beaten : the Indian being far the greater and more courageous Beasts : whereof Antiochus had likewise much advantage in number.

The Kings Army being compounded of many Nations, diversly appointed, and not all accustomed to one manner of fight, was ordered according to the several kinds, in such wise as each might be of most use. The main strength of his Foot consisted in sixteen thousand, armed all Macedonian-like, and called Phalangiers. These he placed in the middle, and divided into ten Battalions ; every one having two and thirty in File, and fifty in Front. Between every Battalion were two Elephants, goodly Beasts, and such as being adorned with Frontals, high Crests, Towers on their Backs, and besides him that governed the Elephant, four men in every Tower, made a gallant and terrible show. On the right hand of these were fifteen hundred Horse of the Gallo-Greeks : then three thousand Barb'd Horse, and a Regiment of almost a thousand Horse, called the Agema, that were all Medians, the choice of the Country, and accompanied by some others. All which Troops of Horse divided in their several kinds, do seem to have followed one another in depth, rather than to have been stretched out in Front. Adjoining unto these, were sixteen Elephants together in one flock. A little further to the right hand, was the Kings own Regiment ; called the Argraspides, or Silver-shielded, by a name borrowed from their furniture, but nothing like so valiant as those of the same name, that had served under Great Alexander : then, twelve hundred Archers on Horse-back, three thousand light-armed Foot, two thousand & five hundred Archers of Myria ; with four thousand Slingers and Archers of the Cretians, and Elymeans. On the left hand of the Phalangiers, were placed the like numbers of Gallo-Greeks, and Barb'd Horse : as also two thousand Horse that were sent from Ariarabes, with two thousand and seven hundred of divers Nations : and a Regiment of a thousand Horse more lightly armed, that were called the Kings Troop ; being Syrians, Phrygians, and Lydians. In Front of all these Horse were the the Chariots armed with Hooks or Sythes, and the Dromedaries, whereon sat Arabians with long Rapiers, that would serve to reach from those high Camels. Beyond these were, as in the right wing, a rabble of many Nations, Carians, Cicilians, Pamphilians, Pisidians, Cyrtians, Elymeans, and many others, having also with them sixteen Elephants. Antiochus himself commanded in the right wing : Seleucus in the left : and three of his principal Captains commanded over the Phalangiers.

The first onset was given by the Dromedaries and armed Chariots : of which the one, being like to terrifie the Horse ; the other, to break the Squadrons of the Foot ; Eumenes with a few light-armed Cretians, Archers, Darters, and Slingers, easily made frustrate the danger threatened by them both. For with shoutings, and noises, and some wounds, they were driven out of the field ; and running back upon their own men, did the same harm which they had intended to the Enemies. Wherefore the Roman Horse following this advantage, charged upon the left Wing : Whereas they found no resistance ; some being out of order ; others being without courage. It is shameful to rehearse, and so strange, that it may hardly seem credible : that the Phalangiers, with such variety of Auxiliaris, made little or no resistance ; but all of them fled, in a manner as soon as they were charged. Only the King, Antiochus himself, being in the left wing of his own Battle : and seeing the Latines, that stood opposite unto him, weakly flanked with Horse, gave upon them courageously, and forced them to retire. But M. Emilius, that had the Guard of the Roman Camp, issued forth with all his power to help his fellows : and what by persuasion, what by threats, made them renew the fight. Succour also came from the right Wing, where the Romans were already victorious : whereof when Antiochus discovered the approach ; He not only turned his Horse about, but ran away upon the spur without further tardiance. The Camp was defended a little while : and with no great valour ; though by a great multitude that were led into it. Antiochus is said to have lost in this Battle fifty thousand Foot, and four thousand Horse ; besides those that were taken. Of the Romans there were not slain above three hundred Foot, and four and twenty Horse : of Eumenes his followers five and twenty.

custody of Sardis, and the Castle there, to one whom he thought faithful. But the Towns-men and Souldiers were so dismayed with the greatness of the Overthrow ; that one mans faith was worth nothing. All the Towns in those parts ; without expecting summons yielded up themselves by Embassadours : whom they sent to the Romans, whilst they were on the way. Neither were many days spent, ere Antiochus his Embassador came in the Camp : having none other Errand, than to know what it would please the Romans to impose upon the King his Master. P. Scipio was now come to his Brother, who obtained leave to make the answer, because it should be gentle. They required no more than he had lately done : which was, That he should quite abandon his Dominions on this side Taurus. For their Charges in that War ; they required fifteen thousand Talents : five hundred in hand ; two thousand and five hundred, which the Senate and People of Rome should have confirmed the peace ; and the other twelve thousand in twelve years next ensuing, by even portions. Likewise they demanded four hundred Talents for Eumenes ; and some store of Corn that was due to him upon a reckoning. Now besides twenty Hostages which they required, very earnest they were to have Hannibal the Carthaginian, and Thous the Eolian, with some others, who had stirred up the King to this War, delivered into their hands. But any wise man might so easily have perceived that it would be their purpose to make this one of their principal demands ; as no great Art was needed to beguile their malice. The Kings Embassador had full Commission to refuse nothing that should be enjoined. Wherefore there was no more to do, than to send immediately to Rome for the Ratification of the Peace.

There were new Consuls chosen in the mean while at Rome, M. Fulvius, and Cn. Manlius Volsus. The Eolians desired peace, but could not obtain it : because they would accept neither of the two Conditions to them before propounded. So it was decreed, That one of the Consuls should make War upon the Eolians ; the other, upon Antiochus in Asia. Now, though shortly there came news that Antiochus was already vanquished in Battle, and had submitted himself unto all that could be required at his hands : yet since the State of Asia was not like to be so thoroughly settled by one Victory, but that many things might fall out worthy of the Romans care, Cn. Manlius, to whom Asia fell by lot, had not his Province changed.

Soon after this, came the Embassadors of King Antiochus to Rome, accompanied with the Rhodians and some others; yea, by King Eumenes in person; whose presence added a goodly lustre to the business in hand. Concerning the peace to be made with King Antiochus, there was no disputation: it was generally approved. All the trouble was about the distribution of the purchase. King Eumenes reckoned up his own deserts, and comparing himself with Masaniissa, hoped that the Romans would be more bountiful to him, than they had been to the Numidian, since they had found him a King indeed, whereas Masaniissa was only such in title; and since, both he and his Father had always been their friends, even in the worst of the Roman fortunes. Yet was there much ado to make him tell what he would have: He still referring himself to their courtesy; and they desiring him to speak plain. At length he craved that they would bestow upon him, as much of the Country by them taken from Antiochus, as they had no purpose to keep in their own hands. Neither thought he it needful, that they should trouble themselves with the care of giving Liberty to many of the Greek Towns that were on Asia side. For since the most of those Towns had been partakers with the King in his War; it was no reason that they should be Gainers by his overthrow. The Rhodians did not like of this. They desired the Senate to be truly Patrons of the Græcian Liberty; and to call to mind, that no small part of Greece it self had been subject unto Philip, and served him in his War: which was not alleged against them as a cause why they should not be made free, after that Philip was overcome. But the main point whereon they insisted, was this, That the Victory of the Romans against King Antiochus, was so great, as easily might satisfy the desires of all their friends. The Senate was glad to hear of this; and very bountifully gave away so much, that every one had cause to be well-pleased.

Such-end had the War against King Antiochus: after which, L. Cornelius Scipio, returning home, had granted unto him the honour of a Triumph: the Pomp whereof exceeded in Riches, not only that of Titus Quintus Flaminius, but of any ten that Rome had beheld until that day. Now forasmuch as the surname of The African had been given unto P. Scipio, it was thought convenient by some to reward L. Scipio with the title of The Asiaticus: which the fortune of his Victory had no less deserved; though the Virtue requisite to the purchase thereof, was no way correspondent.

The Ætolians, and the Gallo-Greeks, vanquished by the Roman Consuls, Fulvius and Manlius. Manlius hardly obtains a Triumph: being charged (among other objections) with attempting to have passed the bounds appointed as fatal to the Romans by Sibyls. Of Sibyls Prophecies, the Books of Hermes; and that Inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto. The ingratitude of Rome to the two Scipios: and that beginning and faction among the Roman Nobility.

*M*ARC, Fulvius, and Cn. Manlius had the same charge divided between them, which L. Cornelius Scipio, now titled Asiaticus, had lately undergone. It was found more than one mans work, to look at once in Greece and to Asia. And for this reason was it apparent, that L. Scipio had granted so long a Truce to the Ætolians. But since, in this long Interim of Truce, that haughty little Nation had not sought to humble it self to the Roman Majesty, it was now to be brought unto more lowly terms than any other of the Greeks. The best was, that so great a storm fell not unexpected upon the Ætolians. They had foreseen the danger, when their Embassadors were utterly denied peace at Rome; and they had provided the last Remedy; which was to entreat the Rhodians and Athenians to become Intercessors for them. Nether were they so dejected with any terrible apprehensions, that they could not well devise, even upon helping themselves by repurchase of Countries lost, where they spied advantage.

Poor King Aminander lived in exile among them, whilst Philip of Macedon kept, for him, possession of his Lands and Castles. But the Albanians (besides that many of them bore a natural affection to their own Prince) having been long accustomed to serve a Mountain Lord, that conversed with them after an homely manner; could not endure the proud and insolent manner of command, used by the Captains of Philip his Garrisons. They sent therefore some few of them to their King, and offered their service towards his restitution. At the first there were only four of them; neither grew they, at length, to more than two and fifty, which undertook the work. Yet assurance that all the rest would follow, made Aminander willing to try his fortune. He was at the borders with a thousand Ætolians, upon the day appointed: at what time his two and fifty Adventurers, having divided themselves into four parts, occupied, by the ready dy assistance of the multitude, four of the chief Towns in the Country, to his use. The fame of this godd success at the first; with divers Letters running from place to place, whereby men were exhorted to do their best in helping forward the Action, made the Lieutenants of Philip unable to think upon resistance. One of them held the Town of Theium a few daies; giving thereby some leisure unto his King to provide for the rescue. But when he had done his best, he was forced thence, and could only tell Philip, whom he met on the way, that all was lost. Philip had brought from home six thousand men; of whom, when the greater part could not hold out, in such a running march, he left all save two thousand behind him, and so came to Athenæum, a little Albanian Castle, that still was his, as being on the frontier of Macedon. Thence he sent Zeno, who had kept Theium a while, to take a place lying over Argithea, that was chief of the Country. Zeno did as he was appointed: yet neither he, nor the King had the boldness to descend upon Argithea; for that they might perceive the Albanians, all along the hill sides, ready to come down upon them, when they should be busie. Wherefore nothing was thought more honourable than a safe retreat: especially when Aminander came in fight with his thousand Ætolians. The Macedonians were called back from Argithea, and presently withdrawn by their King towards his own borders. But they were not suffered to depart in quiet at their pleasure. The Albanians and Ætolians way-laid them, and pursued them so closely, that their retreat was in manner of a plain flight, with great loss of men and arms, few of those escaping, that were left behind, as to make a countenance of holding somewhat in the Country, until Philip his return.

The Ætolians having found the business of Albania too easy, made an attempt in their own behalf, upon the Amphilochians and Aperantians. These had belonged unto their Nation, and were lately taken by Philip; from whom they diligently revolted, and became Ætolians again. The Dolopians lay next; that had been ever belonging to the Macedonians, and so did still purpose to continue. These took Arms at first: but soon laid them away; seeing their neighbours ready to fight with them in the Ætolian quarrel, and seeing their own King so hastily gone, as he meant not to return.

Of these Victories the joy was the less; for that news came of Antiochus his last overthrow, and of M. Fulvius the new Consul his haunting with an Army into Greece. Aminander sent his excuses to Rome, praying the Senate not to take it in despite, that he had recovered his own from Philip with such help as he could get. Neither seems it that the Romans were much offended to hear of Philip his losses: for of this fault they neither were sharp correctors, nor earnest reprovers. Fulvius went in hand with the business about which he came, and layed siege to Ambracia, a goodly City, that had been the chief seat of Pyrrhus his Kingdom. With this he began, for that it was of too great importance to be abandoned by the Ætolians: yet could not by them be relieved, unless they would adventure to fight upon equal ground. To help the Ambracians, it was not in the Ætolians power: for they were, at the same time, vexed by the Illyrians at Sea, and ready to be driven from their new Conquest, by Perseus the Son of Philip, who invaded the Countries of the Amphilochians and Dolopians. They were unable to deal with so many at once; and therefore earnestly sought peace with the Romans, as they stoutly made head against the rest. In the mean while the Athenian and Rhodian Embassadors came, who besought the Consul to grant them peace. It helped well that Ambracia made strong resistance, and would not be terrified by any violence of the Assailants, or danger that might seem to threaten. The Consul had no desire to spend half his time about one City, and so be driven to leave unto his successor the honour of finishing the War. Wherefore he gladly hearkened unto the Ætolians, and bade them seek peace with faithful intent, without thinking it over-dear, at a reasonable price; considering with how great a part of his Kingdom their friend Antiochus had made the same purchase. He also gave leave to Aminander, offering his service as a Mediatour, to put himself into Ambracia, and try what good his persuasions might do with the Citizens. So after many demands and excuses, the conclusion was such as was grievous to the weaker, but not unsufferable. The same Embassadors of the Athenians and Rhodians, accompanied those of the Ætolians to Rome, for procuring the confirmation of Peace. Their eloquence and credit was the more needful in this intercession, for that Philip had made a very grievous complaint about the loss of those Countries, which they had lately taken from him. Hereof the Senate could not but take notice; though it did not hinder the peace, which those good Mediatours of Rhodes and Athens did earnestly solicit. The Ætolians were were bound to uphold the Majesty of the people of Rome, and to observe divers Articles, which made them the less free, and more obnoxious to the Romans, than any people of Greece; they having been the first that called these their Masters into the Country. The Isle of Cephalonia was taken from them by the Romans: who kept it for themselves (as not long since they had gotten Zacynthus from the Acheans, by stiffly pressing their own right) that so they might have possession along the Coast of Greece, whilst they seemed to forbear the Country. But concerning those places, whereto Philip, or others may lay claim, there was set down an order so perplexed, as would necessarily require to have the Romans Judges of their Controversies, when they should arise. And hereof good use will be shortly made: when want of employment elsewhere, shall cause a more Lordly Inquisition to be held, upon the affairs of Macedon and Greece.

Now, Manlius, the other Consul, had at the same time War in Asia, with the Gallo-Greeks and others. His Army was the same that had followed L. Scipio; of whose victory, his acts were the confirmation. He visited those Countries on the hither side of Taurus, that had scarce heard of the Romans; to whom they were abandoned by Antiochus. Among these there were some petty Lords or Tyrants, some free Cities, and some that were together at wars, without regard of the great alteration that happened in Asia. From every y of these he got somewhat; and by their quarrels found occasion to visit those Provinces, into which he should else have wanted an errand. He was even laden with booty, when, having fetcht a compass about Asia, he came at length upon the Gallo-Greeks. These had long domineered over the Country: though of late times, it was rather the fame and terror of their fore-poll'd acts, than any present virtue of theirs, which held them up in reputation. Of the Romans they had lately such trial, when they served under King Antiochus, as made them to acknowledge themselves far the worse men. Wherefore they thought it no small part of their safety, that they dwelt upon the River Halys, in an In-land Country, where those enemies were not very like to search them out. But when such hopes failed; and when some Princes of their own Nation, that had been friends of Eumenes, exhorted the rest to yield: then was no counsel thought so good, as to forsake their houses and Country, and with all that they could carry or drive, to betake themselves unto the high Mountains of Olympus and Margana. These Mountains were exceeding hard of ascent, though none should undertake the custody. Being therefore well manned and victualled for a long time; as also the natural strength being help'd by such fortification as promised greatest assurance: it was thought, that the Consul would either forbear the attempt of forcing them, or easily be repelled; and that finally, when he had stayed there a while, winter, and much want, should force him to dislodge. Yet all this availed not. For whereas the Gallo-Greeks had been careless of furnishing themselves with casting weapons, as if stones would have served well enough for that purpose: the Romans, who came far otherwise appointed, found greater advantage in the difference of arms, than impediment in the disadvantage of ground. Archers and Slingers did easily prevail against casters of stones; especially being such as were these Gallo-Greeks; neither exercised in that manner of fight, nor having prepared their stones before-hand, but catching up what lay next, the too great, and the too little, oftner than those of a fit size. Finally the Barbarians, wanting defensive Arms, could not hold out against the Arrows and weapons of the Roman light armature: but were driven from a piece of ground, which they had undertaken to make good, up into their Camp on the top of the Mountain; and being forced out of their Camp, had none other way left, than to cast themselves headlong down the steep Rocks. Few of the men escaped alive: all their Wives, Children, and goods, became a prey unto the Romans. In the very like manner were the rest of that Nation overcome soon after, at the other Mountain: only more of them saved themselves by flight, as having fairer way at their backs.

These wars being ended: Fulvius and Manlius were appointed by the Senate, each of them to retain as Proconsul, his Province for another year. Fulvius, in his second year, did little or nothing. Manlius gave peace to those whom he had vanquished; as likewise to Ariarathes the Cappadocian, and some others, not by him vanquished, but submitting themselves for fear of the Roman Arms. He drew from them all, what profit he could: and laid upon them such conditions, as he thought expedient. He also did finish the League of peace with Antiochus; whereto he swore, and received the Kings oath by Embassadors, whom he sent for that purpose. Finally, having set in order the matters matters of Asia, he took his way toward the Hellepont, laden with spoil, as carrying with him (besides other treasures) all that the Gallo-Greeks had in so many years extorted from the wealthy Provinces that lay round about them. Neither did this Army of Manlius return home rich in money alone, or cattle, or things of needful use, which the Roman Soldier had been wont to take as the only good purchase; but furnished with sumptuous Household-stuff, and slaves of price, excellent Cooks, and Musicians, for banquets; and in a word, with the seeds of that Luxury which finally over-grew and choked the Roman virtue.

The Country of Thrace lay between Hellepont and the Kingdom of Macedon, which way Manlius was to take his journey homeward. L. Scipio had found no impediment among the Thracians: either for that he passed through them, without any such booty as might provoke them; or perhaps rather, because Philip of Macedon had taken order, that the Barbarians should not stir. But when Manlius came along with a huge train of baggage, the Thracians could not so well contain themselves. Neither was it thought, that Philip took it otherwise than very pleasantly, to have this Roman Army robbed, and well beaten on the way. He had cause to be angry, seeing how little himself was regarded, and what great rewards were given to Eumenes. For he understood, and afterwards gave the Romans to understand, that Eumenes could not have abidden in his own Kingdom, if the people of Rome had not made war in Asia: whereas contrariwise, Antiochus had offered unto himself three thousand Talents, and fifty Ships of War, to take part with him and the Asians; promising moreover to restore unto him all the Greek Cities, that had been taken from him by the Romans. Such being the difference between him and Eumenes, when the War began: He thought it no even dealing of the Romans, after their victory, to give away not only the half of Asia, but Chersonesus, and Lymnacia in Europe, to Eumenes; whereas upon himself they bestowed not any one Town. It agreed not indeed with his Nobility to go to Rome, and beg Provinces in the Senate; as Eumenes and the Rhodiens had lately done. He had entertained lovingly the two Scipios, whom he thought the most honourable men in Rome; and was grown into near acquaintance with Publius, holding correspondence with him by Letters, whereby he made himself acquainted with the Wars in Spain and Africa. This perhaps he deemed sufficient, to breed in the Romans a due respect of him. But Eumenes took a surer way. For the Scipios had not the disposing of that which they won from Antiochus: as neither indeed had Manlius, nor the ten Delegates assisting him; but the Senate of Rome, by which those Delegates were chosen, and instructed how to proceed. When Philip therefore saw these upstart Kings of Persia, whom he accounted as base companions, advanced so highly, and made greater than himself: yea, himself unregarded, contemned, and exposed to many wrongs: then found he great cause to wish, that he had not so hastily declared himself against Antiochus, or rather that he had joined with Antiochus and the Asians, by whom he might have been freed from his insolent Masters. But what great argument of such discontentedness, the Macedonians had, we shall very shortly be urged to discourse more at large. At the present it was believed, that the Thracians were by him set on to assail the Romans, passing through their Country. They knew all advantages, and they fell, unexpected, upon the carriages that were bestowed in the midst of the Army; wherof part had already passed a dangerous wood through which the baggage followed; part was not yet so far advanced. There was enough to get, and enough to leave behind: though both the getting and the saving, did cost many lives, as well of the Barbarians, as of the Romans. They fought until it grew night: and then the Thracians withdrew themselves; not without as much of the booty as was to their full content. And of such trouble there was more, though less dangerous, before the Army could get out of Thrace into Macedon. Through the Kingdom they had a fair march into Epirus; and so to Apollonia, which was their handle of Greece.

To Manlius, and to Fulvius, when each of them returned to the City, was granted the honour of Triumph. Yet not without contradiction: especially to Manlius, whom some of the ten Delegates appointed to assist him, did very bitterly tax as an unworthy Commander. Touching the rest of their accusation, it sufficeth that he made good answer, and was approved by the chief of the Senate. One Clause is worthy of more particular consideration. Reprehending his desire to have hindered the peace with Antiochus; They said, That with much ado he was kept from leading his Army over Taurus, and adventuring upon the Calamity threatened by Sibyl's verses, unto those that should pass the fatal bounds. What calamity or overthrow this was, wherewith Sibyl's Prophecy threatened the Roman Captain or Army, that should pass over Taurus, I do not conceive. Pompey was the first that marched with an Army beyond those limits: though the Victories of Lucullus had opened unto him the way, and had before-hand won, in a fort, the Countries on the other side of the Mount; which Lucullus gave to one of Antiochus his Race, though Pompey occupied them for the Romans. But we find not, that either Lucullus or Pompey suffered any loss, in presuming to neglect the bounds appointed by Sibyl. Indeed the accomplishment of this Prophecy, fell out near about one time, with the restitution of Ptolemy King of Egypt, that was forbidden unto the Romans by the same Sibyl. It may therefore seem to have had reference unto the same things that were denounced as like to happen upon the reduction of the Egyptian King. Whether the Oracles of Sibyl had in them any truth, and were not, as Tully noteth, sowed at random in the large field of Time, there to take root, and get credit by event; I will not here dispute. But I hold this more probable, than that the restitution of Ptolemy to his Kingdom by Cabinus the Roman, should have any way betokened the coming of our Saviour: as some both ancient and modern Christian Writers have been well pleased to interpret Sibyl in that Prophecy. Of the Sibylline Predictions, I have sometimes thought reverently though not knowing what they were (as I think few men know) yet following the common belief and good authority. But observation of the shameful Idolatry, that upon all occasions was advanced in Rome by the Books of Sibyl, had well prevailed upon my credulity, and made me suspect, though not the faith and pious meaning, yet the judgement of Enchirion: when that learned and excellent work of Master Casaubon upon the Annals of Cardinal Baronius, did altogether free me from mine error; making it apparent; That not only those Prophecies of Sibyl, wherein Christ so plainly was shewed, but even the Books of Hermes, which have born such reputation, were no better than counterfeited pieces, and at first entertained (whosoever devised them) by the indiscreet zeal of such as delighted in seeing the Christian Religion strengthened with foreign proofs. And in the same Rank I think, we ought to place that notable History, reported by Enchirion from no mean Authors, Of the honour which was done to Simon Magus in Rome; namely, of an Altar to him erected, with an inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto, that is, To Simon the holy God. For what can be more strange, than that a thing so memorable, and so publick, should have been quite omitted by Tacitus, by Suetonius, by Dion, and by all which wrote of those times? Philosophers and Poets would not have suffered the matter to escape in silence, had it been true; neither can it be thought that Seneca, who then lived and flourished, would have obtained from speaking any word of an argument so famous. Wherefore I am persuaded, that this Inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto, was, by some bad Criticismus, taken amiss in place of Simoni Sango: a title four hundred years older than the time of Simon Magus. For the Goods of one Vitruvius a Rebel, had many Ages before been consecrated Simoni Sango, that is, To the Spirit or Demi-god Sango, in whose Chappel they were bestowed. So as either by the ill shape of the old Roman letters, or by some spoil that time had wrought upon them; it might easily come to pass, that the words should be mis-read, Simoni Sango, and that some Christian who had heard of Simon Magus, but not of Sango, thereupon should frame the conjecture, which now passeth for a true History. Such conjectures, being entertained without examination, find credit by Tradition, whereby also, many times, their fashion is amended, and made more Historical, than was conceived by the Author. But it cannot be safe, to let our faith (which ought to stand firm upon a sure foundation) lean over-hardly on a well-painted, yet rotten post.

Now concerning the Triumph of En. Manlius, it may be numbered among a few of the richest, which ever the City beheld. Out of that which he brought into the Treasury, was made the last payment of those moneys which the Commonwealth had borrowed from private men in the second Punick War. So long was it, that Rome had still some feeling of Hannibal: which being past, there was remaining neither care, nor memory, of any danger. This Triumph of Manlius was deferred by him, even so long as he well could: for that he thought it not safe, to make his entrance into the City, until the heat of an inquisition, then raging therein, should be allayed. The two Scipio's were called one after another, into judgement, by two Tribunes of the People; men, only by this accusation, known to Posterity. P. Scipio the African, with whom they began, could not endure that such unworthy men should question him, of purloining from the Commonwealth, or of being hired with Bribes by Antiochus, to make an ill bargain for his Country. When therefore his day of answer came; he appeared before the Tribunes, Tribunes, not humbly as one accused, but followed by a great Train of his Friends and Clients, with which he passed through the midst of the Assembly, and offered himself to speak. Having audience, he told the People, That upon the same day of the year he had fought a great Battel with Hannibal, and finished the Punick War by a signal Victory. In memory whereof, he thought it no fit season to brabble at the Law; but intended to visit the Capitol, and there give thanks to Jupiter, and the rest of the gods, by whose grace, both on that day and at other times, he had well and happily discharged the most weighty business of the Commonwealth. And hereto he invited with him all the Citizens: requesting them, That if ever since the seventeenth year of his life, until he now grew old, the honourable places by them conferred upon him, had prevented the capacity of his age, and yet his deserts had exceeded the greatness of those honourable places: then would they pray, that the Princes and great ones of their City might still be like to him. These words were heard with great approbation: so as all the people, even the Officers of the court followed Scipio leaving the Tribunes alone, with none about them excepting their own slaves and a Cryer, by whom ridiculously they cited him to judgement, until for very shame, as not knowing what else to do, they granted him, unrequested, a further day. After this, when the African perceived that the Tribunes would not let fall their suit, but enforce him to submit himself to a disgraceful trial: he willingly relinquished the City and his unthankful Romans, that could suffer him to undergo so much indignity. The rest of his time he spent at Liternum: quietly with a few of his inward friends, and without any desire of seeing Rome again. How many years he lived, or whether he lived one whole year, in this voluntary banishment; it is uncertain. The report of his dying in the same year, with Hannibal and Philopomen, as also of his private behaviour at Liternum, render it probable, that he outlived the Tribuneship of his Accusers; who meant to have drawn him back to his answer, if one of their Colleagues (as one of them had power to hinder all the rest from proceeding) had not caused them to desist. Howsoever it was; the same Tribunes went more sharply to work with L. Scipio the Astiatique. They propounded a Decree unto the People, touching money received of Antiochus, and not brought into the common Treasury; that the Senate should give charge unto one of the Prætors, to inquire, and judicially determine thereof. In favour of this Decree, an

Oration was made by Cato, the supposed Author of these contentions, and instigator of the Tribunes. He was a man of great, but not perfect Vertue, temperate, valiant, and of singular industry; frugal also, both of the publick, and of his own; so as in this kind he was even faulty: for though he would not be corrupted with Bribes, yet was he unmerciful and unconscionable, in seeking to increase his own wealth, by such means as the Law did warrant. Ambition was his vice; which being poisoned with envy, troubled both himself and the whole City; whilst he lived. His mean birth caused him to hate the Nobility, especially those that were in chief estimation. Neither did he spare to bite at such as were of his own rank, men raised by desert, if their advancement were like to hinder his: but lately before this, when Glabrion, whose Lieutenant he had been at Thermopylae, was his Competitor for the Censorship, and likely to carry it, he took an Oath against him, which was counted as no better than malicious perjury. That he had not brought into the common Treasury some Vessels of gold and silver, gotten in the Camp of Antiochus. Now the hatred which he bare unto the Scipio's, grew partly, besides his general spite at the Nobility) from his own first rising, wherein he was countenanced by Fabius Maximus, who brooked not the African; partly from some check that was given unto himself, in the African Voyage by P. Scipio, whose Treasurer he then was. For when Cato did utter his dislike of the Consuls bad Husbandry (judging Magnificence to be no better) in some peremptory manner; Scipio plainly told him, That he had no need of such double diligence in his Treasury. Wherefore, either not caring what lies he published, or for want of judgement, thinking unworthy of the vertue that was far above him, Cato filled Rome with untrue Reports against his General; whose noble deeds confuted sufficiently the author of such false Tales. And thus began the hatred: which being not regarded nor thought upon by the Scipio's, whilst it was nourished by their enemy, brake out upon advantage, especially against L. Scipio: his brother being dead, or out of the way. A severe inquiry and judgement being appointed of purpose against Scipio, matters were so carried, that he was soon condemned in a sum of money, far exceeding his ability to pay. For non-payment his body should have been laid up in prison: but from this rigor of the Law, he was freed by Tiberius Gracchus, the same Tribune who had caused the suit against the African to be let fall. In his estate, which was confiscated to the use of the City, when there neither appeared any sign of his having been beholding to Antiochus, nor was found so much as what he had been condemned to pay; than fell his Accusers, and all whose hands had been against him, into the indignation of the People. But for this was L. Scipio no whit the better. His kindred, friends, and Clients, made such a Collection for him, as would have fet him in better Estate than before, if he had accepted it. He took no more than such of his own goods, as were of necessary use, being redeemed for him by his nearest friends.

And thus began the Civil War of the Tongue in the Roman pleadings: which had either not been, or not been much regardable until now, since the Punick War. Security of danger from abroad, and some want of sufficient Employment, were especial helps to the kindling of this fire; which first caught hold upon that Great Worthy, to whose Virtue Rome was indebted, for changing into so great security her extrem danger. But these factious contentions did no long while contain themselves within heat of words, and cunning practice. For when the Art of leading the multitude in such quarrelsome business, grew to perfection, they that found themselves overmatched by their Adversaries at this kind of weapon, began to make opposition first with Clubs and Stones, afterward with Swords; and finally, proceeded from frays and murders in the Streets, unto battel in the openfield. Cornelia, Daughter of Scipio the African, a Lady of rare Virtue, that in honour of her two Sons was more commonly named, Mother of the Gracchi, saw those her two Sons, whilst they were but young, daughtered in Rome, together with some of their friends: by those whom they opposed, and their death not revenged by order of Law, but rather approved by the Senate. At these times the Senators began to take upon them Authority, more than was to them belonging. They conferred upon the Consuls all the whole power of the City, under this form, Let the Consuls provide, that the Commonwealth receive no detriment. By this Decree of theirs, and by their proclaiming any Citizen enemy to the State, they thought to have won a great advantage over the multitude. But after the death of C. Gracchus, and of Saturninus, a popular man; whom by such authority they did put out of the way; it was not long ere Marius a famous Captain of theirs, was so condemned, who by force of arms returned into the City, and murdered all the Principal Senators: whereupon began the Civil Wars; which giving unto Sylla, who prevailed therein, means to make himself absolute Lord of Rome, taught Cesar, a man of higher Spirit, to affect and obtain the like Sovereign Power, when by the like Decree of the Senate, he was provoked. It is true, that never any Consul had finally cause to rejoice, of his having put in execution such Authority to him committed by the Senate. But as the fury of the multitude, in passing their Laws, by hurling of stones, and other violence, made the City stand in need of a Sovereign Lord: so the vehemency of the Senate, in condemning as Enemies, those that would not submit themselves, when they were over-topped by Voices in the House, did compel Cesar, or give him at least pretence, to right himself by Arms: wherewith prevailing against his Adversaries, he took such order, that neither Senate nor People, should thenceforth be able to do him wrong. So by intestine discord, the Romans consuming all or most of their principal Citizens, lost their own freedom, and became subjects unto the arbitrary government of One: suffering this change in three Generations, after this beginning of their insolent Rule, wherein they took upon them as the highest Lords on earth, to do even what they listed. Yet had not Rome indeed attained hitherto unto compleat Greatness, nor believed of her self, as if she had, whilst a King late crowned on the Throne of Alexander, continuing and upholding the Reputation of a former Empire. Wherefore this consummation of her honour was thought upon betimes. How it was effected, the sequel will discover.

CHAP. VI.

The Second Macedonian War.

§. I.

The Condition wherein those Princes and Estates remained, which were Associates of the Romans, when the War with Antiochus was finished. The Romans quarrel with Philip. They deal insolently with the Achæans. The Macedonian, being unready for War, obtains Peace at Rome, by his Son Demetrius: of whom thenceforth he becomes jealous.

After the overthrow of Antiochus, although Philip of Macedon, Eumenes King of Pergamus, the Commonwealth of the Achæans, and all other the States of Greece, were governed by the same Laws and Magistrates as formerly had been, before the arrival of the Romans in those parts: yet in very truth (the publick Declaration excepted) they were none other than absolute Vassals to the People of Rome. For of those five Privileges belonging to a Monarch, or unto Sovereign Power, in whomsoever it rest; namely, To make Laws, To create Magistrates, To arbitrate Peace and War, to best Money, and, To reserve (as the French call it) le dernier Resort, or the last Appeal, the Romans had assumed four; and the greatest of them so absolutely, that this, The Appeal, or last resort, as every petty injury offered to each other by the forenamed Kings or States, was heard and determined either by the Roman Embassadors, or Commissioners, in those places whence the Complaint came, or otherwise by the Senators themselves within Rome; from whose arbitrement, or direction, if either King or Commonwealth declined, he or they were beaten, and enforced to obedience; or had their Estates and Regalities utterly dissolved. Nevertheless it is true, that they had their own Laws, and Officers of their own ordaining: yet so, as neither the Laws were of force, when the Romans interposed their will to the contrary, neither was their election of Magistrates so free, as that they had not therein especial regard unto the good pleasure of their Masters.

And to such degree of servitude the several Estates of Greece did bow very gently: either as being thankful for their deliverance from a Yoke more sensibly grievous; or, as being skilful in the Art of flattery, and therein taking delight, since therein consisted their chief hope of thriving; or, as being more fearful of displeasing the strongest, than mindful of their own honour. But Eumenes living further off, and being most obsequious unto the Romans, was not of long time questioned about any of his doings: his conformity unto them in matter of War and Peace, together with the diversion of their thoughts another way, giving him leave to hold his own even as he listed, until they should otherwise dispose of him. Neither was it a little available to him, that his Kingdom bordered upon the Nations by them not thoroughly subdued. For upon the same reason (as well as upon his own high deserts) were they very loving unto Masaniassa, and to his House, until Caribæus was ruined; and their Dominion settled in Africk: as likewise afterwards to the Kings of Mauritania, Cappadocia, and others, holding people in subjection unto themselves, by the Ministry of Kings; especially of such Kings, as were cruel and obsequious unto them.

Now the Macedonian was of a more noble temper, and shewed himself not forgetful of his own former greatness, the honour of his Race, or the high reputation of his Kingdom. But such Magnanimity was none otherwise contrived by the Romans, than as want of due reverence to their estate, and a valuation of himself against them: which in the pride of their fortune, they could not endure. Wherefore notwithstanding that he had lately given passage to their Armies thorough his Country, prepared the ways for them, and furnished them both with Victuals and other things needful, to transport them over the Hellspoint into Asia, against Antiochus: yet upon the complaint of Eumenes and the States of Thessaly and Thrace, he was commanded to abandon the Cities of Amus and Amonia, with all Pieces and places demanded by any of his Neighbours; whereof many of them he had lately conquered, by direction or licence, even from the Romans themselves.

These Towns of Ænus and Maronea had been part of Lysimachus his Kingdom: who from Thrace Northward, and to the North-west, extended his Dominion very far. He is thought to have made himself Lord of Thraciæ: In which Province it is said, * That innumerable Medals of Gold have been found in the age of our Grand-fathers, each of them weighing two or three Crowns, and stamped with his Image on the one side, on the other side with Victory. Of all these Lordships, the possession, or rather the title (for he lived not to settle his Estate in Europe) fell to Seleucus Nicator by right of War, wherein he vanquished and slew Lysimachus: as also, by the like right Ptolomy Ceranus thought them his own, when he had murdered Seleucus. But the inundation of the Gauls, which the Kingdom of Macedon could not sustain, did shortly and easily wash away from that Crown, together with the more part of Thrace, all those heaps of Land newly thereto annexed. Somewhat of this was afterwards regained by Antigonus the Son of Demetrius and his Successors: though not much; for they were otherwise busied. The fury of the Gauls being over-past, those Countries which lately had been oppressed by them, recovered their Liberty; and not only held it; but learned, some of them, especially the Dardaniæ and wild Thracians, to find their advantages, and make use of them, even upon Macedon. Against the mischiefs commonly done by these, King Philip did provide the most convenient remedies: by shutting up the ways, whereby the Dardaniæ might enter into his Kingdom; and by occupying Lysimachia, with some other Towns in Thrace, which he fortified, as Bulwarks of his own Country, against the Barbarians. Now, although it behoved him thus to do, for the defence of his own estate, yet so far as these Towns were, in a manner, at absolute liberty, his possession of them was thought to partake more of violence than of justice. And in this respect he was formerly accused by the Æthians, of wrongful usurpation and oppression, in his having occupied Lysimachia. Here to he made a good answer. That his Garrison did only save it from the Thracians: who, as soon as he thence withdrew his men, did seize upon the Town, and ruin it. The like perhaps he might have said, touching Ænus and Maronea; That they were places unable to defend themselves, and Gates, by which the Barbarians might have entrance into his Kingdom. But this Plea had not availed him; in the disputation about Lysimachia: and in the present question, the

Romans were not without their own title; since Antiochus had gotten all the Country thereabout, whilst Philip was busied in his former war: and since they, by their Victory, had gotten unto themselves all the title, which Antiochus thereto could pretend. Wherefore he only submitted his right unto the good pleasure of the Senate: referring it unto their disposition, Whether Ænus and Maronea should be set at liberty: whether left in his hand, or whether bestowed upon Ænones; who begged them as an appendix to Lysimachia and Chersonesus, that were already his by their gift. What they would determine, he might easily perceive by the demeanour of their Embassadors towards him: who sitting as Judges between him and all that made complaint upon him, gave sentence against him in every controversy. Nevertheless he sent Embassadors to Rome, there to maintain his Right unto these Towns; wherein he thought, that equity (if it might prevail) was wholly on his side. For he had holpen their Consuls in the War against Antiochus and the Æthians: wherein whatsoever he had gotten for himself, was now taken from him by their Embassadors: and would they now deprive him of those two Towns, lying so fitly for the guard of his Kingdom, which he had gotten to himself out of the ruins of Antiochus, like as out of his own ruins, Antiochus had gotten in those quarters a great deal more? By such allegations either he was likely to prevail, or at least to gain time, wherein he might bethink himself what he had to do. It was not long ere he had word from Rome, That the Senate were no more equal to him, than had been their Embassadors. Wherefore, considering how insolently the Maronites had behaved themselves, in pleading against him for their Liberty, he took counsel of his own passion; and (as by nature he was very cruel) gave order to Onomastus, that was Warden of the Sea-coasts, to handle these Maronites in such sort, as they might have little joy of the liberty by them so earnestly desired. Onomastus employed Cassander, one of the Kings men dwelling in Maronea, and willed him to let in the Thracians by night, that they might sack the Town, and use all cruelties of War. This was done: but so ill taken by the Roman Embassadors who had better notice than could have been feared, of these proceedings; that the King was by them directly charged with the crime, and called more strictly, than became his Majesty, to an account. He would have removed the blame from himself, and laid it even upon the Maronites: affirming, that that they, in heat of their Factions, being some inclinable to him, other some to Ænones, had fallen into such outrage, that they had cut one anothers throats. And hereof he willed the Embassadors to enquire among the Maronites themselves: as well knowing, that they who survived, were either his own friends; or so terrified and amazed by the late execution of his vengeance among them, that they durst not utter an offensive word. But he found the Romans more severe, and more thoroughly informed in the business, than to rest contented with such an answer. He was plainly told, That if he would discharge himself of the Crime objected, he must send Onomastus and Cassander to Rome, there to be examined as the Senate should think fit. This did not a little trouble him. Yet he collected his spirits, and said, That Cassander should be at their disposition: but concerning Onomastus, who had not been at Maronea, nor near to it, he requested them not to press him, since it stood not with his honour so lightly to give away his friends. As for Cassander, because he should tell no tales; He took order to have him poisoned by the way. By this we see, that the Doctrine which Machiavel taught unto Cæsar Borgia, to employ men in mischievous actions, and afterwards to destroy them when they have performed the mischief, was not of his own invention. All Ages have given us examples of this goodly policy, the latter having been apt Scholars in this Lesson to the more ancient: as the Reign of Henry the Eighth, here in England can bear good witness; and therein especially the Lord Cromwell, who perished by the same unjust Law that himself had devised, for the taking away of another mans life.

Such actions of Philip made an unpleasant noise at Rome, and were like to have brought upon him the war which he feared, before he was ready to entertain it. Wherefore he employed his younger Son Demetrius as Embassador unto the Senate: giving him Instructions how to make answer to all Complaints, and willed to deliver his own Grievances in such wise, that if ought were amiss, yet might it appear that he had been strongly urged to take such courses. The sum of his Embassy was, To pacifie the Romans, and make all even for the present. Demetrius himself was known to be very acceptable unto the Senate, as having been well approved by them, when he was Hostage in Rome: and therefore seemed the more likely to prevail somewhat; were it only, in that regard would be born unto his person.

Whilst this business with the Macedonian hung in suspense; and whilst he, by his readiness to make submission, seemed likely to divert from himself some other way the Roman Arms: the same Embassadors, that had been Judges between him and his Neighbours, made their progress thorow the rest of Greece; and took notice of the Controversies, which they found between some Estates in the Country. The greatest cause that was heard before them, was the complaint of the banished Lacedæmonians against the Acheans. It was objected unto the Acheans, That they had committed a grievous slaughter upon many Citizens of Lacedæmon: That unto this cruelty they had added a greater, in throwing down the Walls of the City: as also further, in changing the Laws; and abrogating the famous Institutions of Lycurgus. Hereto Lycortas the Prætor of the Acheans, made answer, That these banished Lacedæmonians, who now took upon them to accuse the Nation that had once protected them, were notoriously known to be the men, who had themselves committed that murder, whereof shamefully they laid the blame upon others: the Acheans having not only called those unto judgment, that were supposed to be chief Authors of a Rebellion against both them and the Romans; and these Plaintiffs having slain them, upon private, though just hatred, as they were coming to make answer for themselves. Concerning their throwing down the walls of Lacedæmon, he said it was most agreeable to Lycurgus his Ordinance: who, having persuaded his Citizens to defend their Town and liberty by their proper virtue, did inhibit unto them all kind of fortifications: as the Retreats and Nests either of Cowards, or (whereof Lacedæmon had woful experience) of Tyrants and Usurpers. Further he shewed, how the same Tyrants that had built these walls, and hemmed in the spartans, had also quite abolished Lycurgus his Ordinances; and governed the City by their own lawless Will. As for the Acheans; they communicated their own Laws, which they held for the best, or else would soon change them, and take better, unto the Lacedæmonians; whom they found without Laws, or any tolerable form of policy. For conclusion, Lycortas plainly told App. Claudius, the chief of the Embassadors, That he and his Countrymen held it strange, being friends and faithful Allies of the Romans, to see themselves thus constrained, to answer and give account of their actions, as vassals and slaves unto the People of Rome. For if they were indeed at Liberty: why might not the Acheans as well require to be satisfied about that which the Romans had done at Capua; as that the Romans did bustle themselves, to take account how things went at Lacedæmon; For if the Romans would stand upon their Greatness; and intimate, as they begun, that the Liberty of their Friends was nothing worth, longer than should please themselves to ratifie it; then must the Acheans have recourse unto those Agreements that were confirmed by Oath, and which, without perjury could not be violated; as reverencing, and indeed fearing the Romans, but much more, the immortal gods. To this bold answer of Lycortas, Appius found little to reply. Yet taking state upon him; he pronounced, more like a Master than a Judge, that if the Acheans would not be ruled by fair means, and earn thanks whilst they might; they should be compelled with a mischief, to do what was required at their hands, whether they would or no. This alteration was in the Parliament of the Acheans, which groaned to hear the Lordly words of Appius. Yet fear prevailed above indignation; and it was permitted unto the Romans to do as they listed. Hereupon the Embassadors restored some banished and condemned men; but the Roman Senate, very soon after, did make void all judgements of death or banishment, that had been laid by the Acheans upon any Citizen of Lacedæmon; as likewise they made it a matter of disparagement, whether or no the City and Territory of Lacedæmon should be suffered to continue a member of the Achean Common-wealth; or, taken from them, and made as it had been an Estate by it self. By bringing such a matter into question, the Romans well declared, that they held it to depend upon their own will, how much or how little any of their Confederates should be suffered to enjoy; though by contributing Sparta to the Council of Achaia, they discovered no less, as to them seemed, the love which they bare unto the Achaïans, than the power which they had over them.

Intro such slavery had the Greeks, and all Kings and Commonweals whatsoever, bordering upon any part of the Mediterranean Seas, reduced themselves, by calling in the Romans to their succour. They wanted not the good counsel and persuasions of many wise and temperate men among them; they had also the examples of the Italians, Spaniards, Gauls, and Africans, all subdued by the Romans; and, by seeking Patronage, made meer Vassals; to instruct them, what in the like case they should expect; yet could not the Acheans reason of Estate and Policy so prevail with them, but their private passions, and neighbouring hatreds, which hath evermore bought Revenge at the price of self-ruine, brought them from the honour which they enjoyed, of being free Princes and Cities, into most base and fearful servility.

All this made well for Philip of Macedon: who, though he saw the Greeks very far from daring to stir against those, by whom both he and they were kept in awe; yet was he not without hope, that (few of them excepted; whom the Romans, by freeing from his subjection, had made his implacable enemies) in hearty affection all the Country would be his, whensoever he should take Arms; as shortly he was like to do. Young Demetrius, coming home from Rome, brought with him the desired Ratification of Peace; though qualified with much indignity soon following. He had been lovingly used at Rome, and heard with great favour in the Senate. There, being surrounded with the multitude of objections; whereto his youth, unskilful in the Art of wrangling, could not readily make answer; it was permitted unto him, to read such brief notes as he had received from his Father; and out of those the Senate were contented to gather satisfaction; more for Demetrius his own sake, as they then said, and wrote into Macedon, than for any goodness in the Defence. Such pride of theirs, in remitting his faults at the intreaty of his Son, together with some insolence of his Son, growing (as appeared) from this favour of the Romans; did increase in Philip his hatred unto Rome; and bred in him a jealousy of his too forward Son. To set him forward in these passions, there came daily new Embassadors from Rome; some bringing one Commandment, some another; and some requiring him to fulfill those things which had been imposed upon him by their fore-goers. Neither were there wanting that observed his countenance: and when he had fulfilled all that was required at his hands; yet laid it to his charge, that he had done things unwillingly, and would be obedient no longer than he needs must. With these Embassadors young Demetrius was conversant: rather perhaps out of simplicity, and for that they made much of him, than for any ambitious respect; yet a great deal more than was pleasing to his Father. So the rumour grew current through all Macedon, that Persius, the Elder Son of the King, should not succeed unto his Father, but that the Diadem should be conferred upon Demetrius, if not by some other pretence, yet by meer favour of the Romans. This offended not only Persius, but Philip himself: who suspected suspected his younger Son, as more Roman than his own; and accordingly misconstrued all his doings. But ere we proceed unto the bitter fruits of this jealousy, it will not be amiss to speak of some memorable accidents that were in the mean time.

§. II.

The death of Philopœmen, Hannibal, and Scipio. That the Military profession is of all other the most unhappy: notwithstanding some examples, which may seem to prove the contrary.

THE Romans wanting other matter of quarrel in the Continent of Greece, had of late been so peremptory with the Acheans; that they seemed not unlikely to take part against them in any controverſie that should be moved. Hereupon the Messenians, who against their will were annexed unto the Achean Common-wealth, having long been of a contrary Faction thereto; grew bold to withdraw themselves from that Society, with purpose to set up again the Estate of their own, severed from communion with any other. This was the device of some that were powerful in their City; who finding the multitude only inclinable to their purpose, and not over-strongly affected in the business, were careful to seek occasion of reducing things to such pass, that all their Citizens might be entangled in a necessity of standing out, and of not returning to the Achean League. And hereupon they began to do some acts of hostility, whereby it was probable that blood should be drawn, and either side so far exasperated, that little hope of agreement would be left. Upon the fame of their commotion and proceedings; Philopœmen, then Prætor of the Acheans, levied such forces as he could in haste, and went against them. Many principal Gentlemen of the Acheans, especially of the Megalopolitans, were soon in a readiness to wait upon him. Besides these, which were all, or for the most part, horse; he had some Auxiliaries out of Thrace and Crete, that usually were kept in pay. Thus accompanied, he met with Dinocrates, Captain of the Messenians; whom he charged, and forced to run. But whilst his horsemen were too earnest in following the chase; there arrived by chance a supply of five hundred from Messene, which gave new courage unto those that fled. So the Enemies began to make head again: and with the help of those, who very seasonably came to their aid, compelled Philopœmen horsemen to turn back. Philopœmen himself had long been sick of an Ague, and was then very weak; yet the greatness of his courage would not suffer him to be negligent of their safety, which had so willingly adventured themselves under his conduct. He took upon him to make the Retreat: and suffering his horsemen to pass along by him in a narrow lane, he often turned about against the Enemies, whose reputation and the knowledge of his great worth, did terrifie from approaching over near to him. But it fell out unhappily, that being cast to ground by a fall off his horse, and being with all in very weak plight of body, he was unable to get up again. So the Enemies came upon him, and took him; yet scarce believed their fortune to be so good, although their eyes were witnesses. The first messenger that brought these news to Messene, was so far from being believed, that he was hardly thought to be in his right wits. But when the truth was affirmed by many reports, all the City ran forth to meet him, and behold the spectacle seeming so incredible! They caused him to be brought into the Theatre, that there they might satisfy themselves with beholding him. The greatest part of them had compassion on his misfortune: and in commemoration both of his virtue, and of the singular benefits by him done unto them, especially in delivering them from Nabis the Tyrant; began to manifest their good will for his delivery. Contrariwise, Dinocrates and his Faction were desirous hastily to take away his life: because they held him a man implacable, and one that would never leave any disgrace, or injury done to him, unrevenge. They durst not one trust another with the keeping of him: but committed him into a strong vault under ground, that had been made for the custody of their Treasure. So thither they let him down fast bound, and with an Engine laid an heavy stone upon the mouth of the Vault. There he had not stayed long, ere his enemies had concluded his present death. The Hangman of the City was let down unto him with a cup of poyson, which Philopœmen took in his hand: and asking no more than whether the Horsemen were escaped, and particularly whether Lycortas was safe; when he heard an answer to his mind, he said it was well: and so with a cheerful countenance, drank his last draught. He was seventy years old, and weakened with long sickness. whereby the poyson wrought the sooner, and easily took away his life. The Acheans, when they mist him in their flight, were marvellously offended with themselves, for that they had been more mindful to preserve their own lives, than to look unto the safety of so excellent a Commander. Whilest they were devising what to do in such a case: they got advertisement of his being taken. All Achaia was by this report vehemently afflicted: so as Embassadors were forthwith dispatched unto Messene, craving his enlargement: and yet preparation made withall, to obtain it by force, in case that fair means would not serve. Lycortas was chosen General of the Army against Messene: who coming thither, and laying siege to the Town, enforced it in short space to yield. Then Dinocrates knowing what he was to expect, laid hands upon himself, and made an end of his own life. The rest of those that had been partakers in the murder: were compelled to wait in bonds upon the ashes of Philopomen that were carried home in solemn pomp to Megalopolis: where they were all of them slain at his funeral, as sacrifices to his Ghost whom they had offended. Q. Martins, a Roman Embassador, was then in Greece: whence, upon one occasion or other, the Roman Embassadors were seldom absent. He would have intermeddled in this business of Messene, had not Lycortas made short work, and left him nothing to do.

About the same time was T. Quintus Flaminius sent Embassador to Prusias King of Bithinia: not so much to withdraw him from prosecuting the war against Enmenes, as to entreat him that he would deliver Hannibal, the most spiteful enemy in all the world unto the Senate and People of Rome, into his hands. Prusias (therein unworthy of the Crown he wore) did readily condescend: or rather (as Livie thinks) to gratifie the Romans, he determined either to kill Hannibal, or to deliver him alive to Flaminius. For upon the first conference between the King and Flaminius, a troop of souldiers were directed to guard and environ the lodging where Hannibal lay. That famous Captain having found cause before this to suspect the faith of Prusias, had devised some secret fables under ground to save himself from any treasonable and sudden assault. But finding now that all parts about him were fore-closed, he had recourse to his last remedy: which he then was constrained to practise, as well to frustrate his enemies of their triumphing over him, as to save himself from their torture and merciless hands; who, as he well knew, would neither respect his famous enterprizes, his honour, nor his age. When therefore he saw no way to escape, nor counsel to resort unto, he took the poison into his hand, which he alwaies preserved for a sure Antidote against the sharpest diseases of adverse fortune; which being ready to swallow down, he uttered these words: *I will now (said he) deliver the Romans of that fear which hath so many years possist them; that fear, which makes them impatient to attend the death of an old man. This victory of Flaminius, over me, which am disarmed, and betrayed into his hands, shall never be numbered among the rest of his heroical deeds: No, it shall make it manifest to all the Nations of the world, how far the ancient Roman virgine is degenerate and corrupted. For such was the nobleness of their forefathers, as when Pyrrhus invaded them in Italy, and was ready to give them battle at their own door, they gave him knowledge of the treason intended against him by poison; whereas these of a latter race, have employed Flaminius; a man who hath heretofore been one of their Consuls, to practise with Prusias, contrary to the honour of a King, contrary to his faith given, and contrary to the Laws of Hospitality, to slaughter or deliver up his own Guest. He then cursing the person of Prusias, and all his, and desiring the immortal gods to revenge his fidelity, drank off the poison and dyed.*

In this year also (as good Authors have reported) to accompany Philopomen and Hannibal, died Scipio the African; these being all of them, as great Captains as ever the world had; but not more famous than unfortunate. Certainly, for Hannibal, whose Tragedy we have now finished, had he been Prince of the Carthaginians, and one who by his authority might have commanded such supplies, as the War which he undertook, required; it is probable, that he had torn up the Roman Empire by the roots. But he was so strongly crost by a cowardly and envious Faction at home, as his proper virtue, wanting publick force to sustain it, did lastly dissolve it self in his own, and in the common misery of his Country and Common-weal.

Hence it comes, to wit, from the envy of our equals, and jealousy of our Masters, be they Kings or Common-weal, that there is no profession more unprosperous than that of men of war, and great Captains, being no Kings. For besides the envy and jealousy of men, the spoils, rapes, famine, slaughter of the innocent, vastation and burnings, with a world of miseries laid on the labouring man, are so hateful to God, as with good reason did Moline the Marshal of France confess, That, were not the mercies of God infinite, and without restriction, it were

were in vain for those of his profession to hope for any portion of them: seeing the cruelties, by them permitted and committed, were also infinite. Howsoever, this is true, That the victories which are obtained by many of the greatest Commanders, are commonly either ascribed to those that serve under them, to Fortune, or the cowardise of the Nation against whom they serve. For the most of others, whose virtues have raised them above the level of their inferiours, and have surmounted their envy: yet have they been rewarded in the end, either with disgrace, banishment, or death. Among the Romans we find many examples hereof; as Coriellanus, M. Livius, L. Enylius, and this our Scipio, whom we have lately buried. Among the Greeks we read of not many that escaped these rewards. Yeal long before these times, it was a Legacy that David bequeathed unto his victorious Captain Joab. With this fear Alexander feared Fernemus, Philotas, and others; and prepared it for Antipater and Cassander. Hereunto Valentinian the Emperour invited Ætius: who, after many other victories, overthrew Attilia of the Hunnes, in the greatest battle for the well fighting and resolution of both Armies, that ever was stricken in the world, for there fell of those that fought, beside run-aways, an hundred and fourscore thousand. Hereupon it was well and boldly told unto the Emperour by Proximus, That in killing of Ætius, he had cut off his own right hand with his left: for it was not long after, that Maximus (by whose perswasion Valentinian slew Ætius) murdered the Emperour; which he never durst attempt, Ætius living. And, besides the loss of that Emperour, it is true, That with Ætius, the glory of the Western Empire was rather dissolved, than obscured. The same unworthy destiny, or a far worse had Bellarinus; whose undertakings and victories were so difficult and glorious, as after-ages suspected them for fabulous. For he had his eyes torn out of his head by Justinian: and he died a blind begger. Narses also, to the great prejudice of Christian Religion, was disgraced by Justin. That rule of Cato against Scipio, hath been well observed in every age since then, to wit, That the Common-weal cannot be accounted free, which standeth in awe of any one man. And hence have the Turks drawn another Principle, and indeed, a Turkish one. That every warlike Prince should rather destroy his greatest men of war, than suffer his own glory to be obscured by them. For this cause did Nijaset the second dispatch Bassa Aconat; Selim strangle Egzi

Mustapha; and most of those Princes bring to ruine the most of their Vicers. Of the Spanish Nation, the great Gonslow, who drove the French out of Naples: and Ferdinando Cortese, who conquered Mexico were crowned with Nettles, not with Lawrl. The Earls of Egmond and Horn had no heads left them to wear Garlands on. And that the great Captains of all Nations have been paid with this Copper Coin; there are examples more than too many. On the contrary, it may be said, That many have acquired the State of Princes, Kings, and Emperours, by their great ability in matter of War; This I confess. Yet must it be had withall in consideration, that these high places have been given or offered unto very few, as rewards of their military virtue; though many have usurped them, by the help and favour of those Armies which they commanded. Neither is it unregardable, That the Tyrants, which have oppressed the liberty of free Cities: and the Lieutenants of Kings or Emperours, which have traitterously cast down their Masters, and stepped up into their seats; were not all of them good men of war: but have used the advantage of some commotion, or many of them by bafe and cowardly practices, have obtained those dignities, which undeservedly were ascribed to their personal worth. So that the number of those that have purchased absolute greatness by the greatness of their warlike virtues; is far more in seeming than in deed. Phocas was a Souldier, and by the help of the Souldiers he got the Empire from his Lord Mauritius: but he was a coward; and, with a barbarous cruelty, seldom found in any other than cruelties, he slew first the children of Mauritius, a Prince that never had done him wrong, before his face; and after them Mauritius himself. This his bloody aspiring was but as a debt, which was paid unto him again by Heraclius: who took from him the Imperial Crown, unjustly gotten; and set it on his own head. Leontius laid hold upon the Emperour Justine, cut off his Nose and Ears, and sent him into banishment: but Gods vengeance rewarded him with the same punishment, by the hands of Tiberius; to whose charge he had left his own men of war. Justine having recovered forces, lighted on Tiberius, and barbed him after the same fashion. Philippus commanding the forces of Justine, murdered both the Emperour and his Son. Anasthus, the vassal of this new Tyrant, surprisid his Master Philippus, and thrust out both his eyes. But with Anasthus, Theodosius dealt more gently: for having wrested the Scepter out of his hands, he enforced him to become a Priest. It were an endless and a needless work to tell, how Leo rewarded this Theodosius; how many others have been repaid with their own cruelty; by men alike ambitious and cruel; or how many hundreds, or rather thousands, hoping of Captains to make themselves Kings, have by Gods justice miserably perished in the attempt. The ordinary, and perhaps the best way of thriving by the practice of Arms, is to take what may be gotten by the spoil of Enemies, and the liberality of those Princes and Cities, in whose service one hath well deserved. But scarce one of a thousand have prospered by this course. For that observation, made by Solomon, of unthankfulness in this kind, hath been found belonging to all Countries and Ages: A little City, and a few men in it, and a great King came against it: and compassed it about, and builded Forts against it: And there was found a poor and wise man therein, and he delivered the City by his wisdom: but none remembered this poor man. Great Monarchs are unwilling to pay great thanks, lest thereby they should acknowledge themselves to have been indebted for great benefits: which the unwiser sort of them think to favour of some impotency in themselves. But in this respect they are often times couzened and abused; which proves that weakness to be in them indeed, whereof they so gladly shun the opinion. Contrariwise, free Estates are bountiful in giving thanks, yet so, as those thanks are not of long endurance. But concerning other profit which their Captains have made, by enriching themselves with the spoil of the Enemy, they are very inquisitive to search into it; and to strip the well-deservers out of their gettings: yea most injuriously to rob them of their own, upon a false supposition; that even they whose hands are most clean from such offences, have purloined somewhat from the common Treasury. Hereof I need not to produce examples: that of the two Scipio's being so lately recited.

In my late Sovereigns time, although for the wars, which, for her own safety, she was constrained to undertake, her Majesty had no less cause to use the service of Martial men both by Sea and Land, than any of her Predecessors for many years had: yet according to the destiny of that profession, I do not remember that any of hers, the Lord Admiral excepted, her eldest, and most prosperous Commander, were either enriched, or otherwise honoured, for any service by them performed. And, that her Majesty had many advised, valiant, and faithful men, the prosperity of her affairs did well witness, who in all her dayes never received dishonour by the cowardise or infidelity of any Commander, by her self chosen and employed.

For as all her old Captains by Land died poor men, as Malley, Randol, Drewry, Reade, Willford, Layton, Fellam, Gilbert, Constable, Bouchier, Berkeley, Bingham, and others: so those of a later and more dangerous employment, whereof Norrice and Vere were the most famous, and who have done as great honour to our Nation (for the means they had) as ever any did; those (I say) with many other brave Colonels, have left behind them (besides the reputation which they purchased with many travels and wounds) nor title nor estate to their posterity. As for the L. Thomas Burrough, and Peregrine Bert, L. Willoughby of Eresby, two very worthy and exceeding valiant Commanders, they brought with them into the world their Titles and Estates.

That her Majesty in the advancement of her men of War did sooner believe other men than her self, a disgrace unto which many wife Princes, besides her self, have been subject; I say, that such a confidence, although it may seem altogether to excuse her Noble Nature, yet can it not but in some sort accuse her of weakness. And exceeding strange it were, were not the cause manifest enough, that where the prosperous actions are so exceedingly prized, the Advers are so unprosperous and so generally neglected. The cause, I say which hath wrought one and the same effect in all times, and among all Nations, is this, that those which are nearest the person of Princes (which Martial-men seldom are) can with no good grace commend, or at least magnifie a profession far more Noble than their own, seeing therein they should only mind their Masters of the wrong they did unto others, in giving less honour and reward to men of far greater deserving, and of far greater use than themselves.

But his Majesty hath already paid the greatest part of that debt. For besides the relieving by Pensions all the poorer sort, he hath honoured more Martial men than all the Kings of England have done for this hundred years.

He hath given a Coronet to the L. Thomas Howard for his chargeable and remarkable service, as well in the year 1588. as at Calix, the Islands, and in our own Sea; having first commanded as a Captain, twice Admiral of a Squadron, and twice Admiral in Chief. His Majesty hath changed the Baronies of Montjoy & Burley into Earldoms; and created Sidney ney Vicount, Kneller, Ruffel, Carew, Drovers, Arundel of Warde, Gerald, and Chichester, Barons, for their governments and services in the Netherlands, France, Ireland, and elsewhere.

§. III.

Philip, making provision for war against the Romans, deals hardly with many of his own subjects. His negotiation with the Bassarne. His cruelty. He suspecteth his Son Demetrius. Demetrius accused by his brother Perseus; and shortly after slain by his fathers appointment. Philip repenteth him of his sons death, whom he findeth to have been innocent: and intending to revenge it on Perseus, he dieth.

O Vintius Martius the Roman Ambassador, who travelled up and down, seeking what work might be found about Greece, had received instruction from the Senate, to use the utmost of his diligence in looking into the Estate of Macedonia. At his return home, that he might not seem to have discovered nothing, he told the Fathers, That Philip had done whatsoever they enjoined him: yet so, as it might appear, that such his obedience would last no longer, than meer necessity should enforce him thereunto. He added further, That all the doings and sayings of that King, did wholly tend unto Rebellion, about which he was devising. Now it was so indeed, that Philip much repented him of his faithful obsequiousness to the Romans, and foresaw their intent, which was, to get his Kingdom into their own hands; which safety of their honour, if they could find convenient means; or otherwise (as to him seemed apparent) by what means soever. He was in an ill case: as having been already vanquished by them; having lost exceedingly both in strength and reputation; having subjects that abhorred to hear of War with Rome; and having neither neighbour nor friend, that, if he were thereto urged, would adventure to take his part: yet he provided as well as he could devise, against the necessity which he daily feared. Such of his own people as dwelt in the maritime Towns, and gave him cause to suspect that they would do but bad service against the Romans, he compelled to forsake their dwelling, and removed them all into Emathia. The Cities and Country, whence these were transplanted, he filled with a multitude of Thracians, whose faith he thought a great deal more assured against those enemies that were terrible to the Macedonians. Further, he devised upon alluring the Bassarne, a strong and hardy Nation, that dwelt beyond the River of Danubius, to abandon their seat, and come to him with all their multitude: who, besides other great rewards, would h-lp them to root out the Dardanians, and take possession of their Country. These were like to do him notable service against the Romans; being not only stout fighting men, but such, as being planted in those quarters by him; would bear respect unto him alone; The last benefit that could be hoped by their arrival, must be the utter extirpation of the Dardanians; a people alwayes troublesome to the Kingdom of Macedonia, whensoever they found advantage. Neither was it judged any hard matter, to persuade those Bassarne, by hope of spoil, and other incitements, unto a more desperate Expedition, through Illyria, and the Countries upon the Adriatick Sea, into Italy it self. It was not known who should withstand them upon the way: rather it was thought, that the Scordisci; and peradventure some others through whose Country they were to pass, would accompany them against the Romans, were it only in hope of spoil. Now to facilitate the remove of these Bassarne from their own habitations, into the Land of the Dardanians, upon the border of Macedonia; a long and tedious journey unto them, that carried with them their wives and children; Philip with gifts did purchase the good will of some Thracian Princes, Lords of the Countries through which they were to pass. And thus he sought means to strengthen himself with the help of the wild Nations, which neither knew the Romans, nor were known unto them; since he was not like to find assistance from any civil Nation, about the whole compass of the Mediterranean Seas. But the deviles were long ere they took effect: so as the Bassarne came not before such time as he was dead; his death being the overthrow of that purpose. In the mean time he neglected not the training of his men to war, and the exercise of them in some small Expedition against those wild people that bordered upon him, and stood worst affected toward him.

But these his counsels and proceedings were miserably disturbed by the calamities that fell upon him, both in his Kingdom, and in his own house. The Families and whole Townships, which he had caused much against their wills to forsake their ancient dwellings, and betake themselves to such new habitations, as he in his discretion thought meet for them, were vehemently offended at the change. Yet their anger at first contained it self within words: he having ving done them no great wrong in that alteration, otherwise than by neglecting their affection to the places wherein they had long lived: which also he did unwillingly, being himself over-ruled by necessity, that seemed apparent. This evil therefore would soon have been determined, had not his cruel and vindictive nature made it worse. He could not pardon words proceeding from just sorrow: but imputed all to traitorous malice; and accordingly sought revenge where it was needless. In his rage he caused many to dye: among whom were some eminent men; and few or none of them deservedly. This increased the hatred of the people, and turned their former exclamations into bitter curses. Which grew the more general, when the King in a barbarous and base fury, mistrusting all alike whom he had injured, thought himself unlike to be safe, until he should have massacred all the children of those Parents, whom tyrannically he had put to death. In the execution of this his unmanly pleasure, some accidents, more tragical then perhaps he could have desired, gave men cause to think (as they could not in reason think otherwise) that, not without vengeance poured on him from Heaven, he felt the like misery in his own children. It is hard to say what the Romans intended, in the extraordinary favour which they shewed unto Demetrius, the Kings younger Son. It may well be (though it may be also suspected) that they had no purpose to make and nourish dissention between the brethren, but only to cherish the virtue and towardliness of Demetrius; like as we find it in their Histories. But their notable favour towards this young Prince, and his mutual respect of them, bred extreme jealousy in the Fathers head. If any custom of the Romans, the manner of their life, the fashion of their apparel, or the unsightly contriving and building (as then it was) of the Town of Rome, were jest at in ordinary discourse and table-talk; Demetrius was sure to be presently on fire, defending and praising them, even in such points as rather needed excuse. This, and his daily conversation with their Embassadors as often as they came, gave his Father cause to think, that he was no fit partaker of any Counsel held against them. Wherefore he communicated all his devices with his elder Son Perseus: who fearing so much lest his brother should step between him and the succession, converted wholly unto his destruction, that grace which he had with his Father. Perseus was then thirty years old; of a stirring spirit, though much defective in valour. De- metrius was younger by five years, more open and unwary in his actions, yet thought old and crafty enough, to entertain more dangerous practices than his free speeches discovered. The jealous head of the King having entertained such suspicions, that were much increased by the cunning practice of his elder Son, a slight occasion made the fire break out, that had long lain smothered. A Muster and ceremonious Iustration of the Army, was wont to be made at certain times with great solemnity. The manner of it at the present was thus. They cleft in twain a Bitch; and threw the head and forepart, with the entrails, on the right hand, and the hinder part on the left hand of the way which the Army was to pass: This done, the Arms of all the Kings of Macedon, from the very first original, were born before the Army. Then followed the King between his two Sons: after him came his own band, and they of his Guard; whom all the rest of the Macedonians followed. Having performed other ceremonies, that Army was divided into two parts: which under the Kings two Sons, charged each other in manner of a true fight; using poles, and the like, in stead of their pikes and accustomed weapons. But in this present skirmish there appeared some extraordinary contention for the victory: whether happening by chance, or whether the two Captains did over-earnestly seek each to get the upper hand, as a betokening of their good success in a greater trial. Some small hurt there was done, and wounds given, even with those stakes, until Perseus his side at length recoyled. Perseus himself was sorry for this, as it had been some bad presage: but his friends were glad, and thought, that hereof might be made good use. They were of the craftier sort: who, perceiving which way the Kings favour bent, and how all the courtes of Demetrius led unto his own ruine, addressed their services to the more malicious and crafty head. And now they said, that this victory of Demetrius would afford matter of complaint against him; as if the heat of his ambition had carried him beyond the rules of that solemn pastime. Each of the brethren was that day to feast his own companions, and each of them had spies in the others lodging, to observe what was said and done. One of Perseus his Intelligencers behaved himself so indifferently, that he was taken and well beaten by three or four of Demetrius his men, who turned him out of doors. After some store of wine, Demetrius told his companions, that he would go visit his brother, and see what cheer he kept. They agreed to his motion, excepting such of them as had ill handled his brothers man: yet he would leave none of his train behind, but forced them all to bear him company. They, fearing to be ill rewarded for their late diligence, armed themselves secretly to prevent all danger. Yet was there such good epiual kept, that this their coming armed was forthwith made known to Perseus: who thereupon tumultuously locked up his doors, and if he stood in fear to be assaulted in his house. Demetrius wondered to see himself excluded, and feared very angrily with his brother. But Perseus bidding him be gone as an enemy, and one whose murderous purpose was detected, sent him away with an entertainment no better than defiance. The next day the matter was brought before the King. The elder brother accused the younger unto the Father of them both. Much there was alledged; and, in effect, the same that hath been here recited, save that by misconstruction all was made worse. But the main point of the accusation, and which did aggravate all the rest, was, That Demetrius had undertaken this murder, and would perhaps also dare to undertake a greater, upon confidence of the Romans; by whom he knew that he should be defended and born out. For Perseus made shew, as if the Romans did hate him; because he bore a due respect unto his Father, and was sorry to see him spoiled, and daily robbed of somewhat by them. And for this cause he said it was, that they did animate his brother against him: as also that they sought how to win unto Demetrius the love of the Macedonians. For proof hereof he cited a Letter, sent of late from Titus Quintius to the King himself: whereof the contents were, That he had done wisely in sending Demetrius to Rome; and that he should yet further do well to send him thither again, accompanied with a greater and more honourable train of Macedonian Lords. Hence he enforced, That this counsel was given by Titus, of purpose to shake the allegiance of those, that should wait upon his brother to Rome; and make them, forgetting their duties to their old King, become servants to this young Traitor Demetrius. Hereto Demetrius made answer, by rehearsing all passages of the day and night foregoing, in such manner as he remembered them, and had conceived of them: bitterly reprehending Perseus, that converted matters of pastime, and what was done or spoken in wine, to such an accusation, whereby he sought his innocent brothers death. As for the love which the Romans did bear him, he said that it grew, if not by his own virtue, at least wise from their opinion thereof: so as by any impious practice, he were more like to lose it wholly, than to increase it. In this wretched pleading there wanted no such passions, as are incident to fathers, children, and brethren, besides those that are common to all Plaintiffs and Defendants, before ordinary Judges. The King pronounced like a Father, though a jealous Father, That he would conclude nothing upon the excess or error, whatsoever it were, of one day and night, nor upon one hours audience of the matter, but upon better observation of their lives, manners, and whole carriage of themselves both in word and deed. And herein he may seem to have dealt both justly and compassionately. But from this time forward he gave himself over wholly to Perseus: using so little conference with his younger Son, that when he had matters of weight in hand, such especially as concerned the Romans, he liked neither to have him present, nor near unto him. Above all, he had especial care to learn out what had passed between Demetrius and T. Quintius, or any other of the Roman great ones. And to this purpose he sent Embassadors to Rome, Philocrates and Apelles; men whom he thought no way interested in the quarrels between the brethren, though indeed they altogether depended on the elder, whom they saw this more in grace. These brought home with them a Letter, said to be written by Titus (whose seal they had counterfeited) unto the King. The contents whereof were, A deprecation for the young Prince; with an intimation, as by way of granting it, That his youthful and ambitious desires had caused him to enter into practices unjustifiable, against his elder brother, which yet should never take effect: for that Titus himself would not be author, or abettor of any impious device. This manner of excuse did forcibly persuade the King to think his Son a dangerous Traitor. To strengthen him in this opinion, one Didas, to whom he gave Demetrius in custody, made shew as if he had pilied the estate of the unhappy Prince, and so wrung out of him his secret intentions, which he shortly discovered unto Philips. It was the purpose of Demetrius to fly secretly to Rome, where he might hope not only to live in safety, from his father and brother, but in greater likelihood, than he could find at home; of bettering such claims as he had in reversion unto the Crown of Macedon. Whatsoever his hopes and meanings were, all came to nought through the falsehood of Didas; who, playing on both hands, offered unto the Prince his help for making the escape, and in the mean while while revealed the whole matter to the King. So Philip resolv'd to put his Son to death, without further expence of time. It was thought behoveful to make him away privily, for fear lest the Romans should take the matter to heart, and hold it as a proof sufficient, at least, of the Kings despite against them, if not of his meaning to renew the war. Didus therefore was commanded to rid the unhappy Prince out of his life. This accur'd minister of his Kings unadvised sentence, first gave payson to Demetrius: which wrought neither so hastily, nor so secretly, as was desired. Hereupon he sent a couple of Ruffians, to finish the tragedy: who villainously accomplished their work, by smothering that Prince, in whose life consisted the greatest hope of Macedonia.

In all the race of Antigonus there had not been found a King, that had thus cruelly dealt with any Prince of his own blood. The houses of Lysimachus and Cassander fell either with themselves, or even upon their heels; by intestine discord and jealousies, grounded on desire of sovereign rule, or fear of losing it. By the like unnatural hatred, had almost been cut off the lines of Ptolemy and of Seleucus: which, though narrowly they escap'd the danger; yet were their Kingdoms thereby grievously distemper'd. Contrariwise, it was worthy of extraordinary note, how that upstart family of the Kings of Pergamus had rais'd it self to marvellous greatness, in very short space, from the condition of meer slavery: whereof a principal cause was, the brotherly love maintained by them, with singular commendation of their piety. Neither was Philip ignorant of these examples, but is said to have propounded the last of them to his own children, as a pattern for them to imitate. Certainly he had reason so to do: not more in regard of the benefit which his enemies reaped by their concord, than in remembrance of the tender fosterage, wherewith King Antigonus his Tutor had faithfully cherish'd him in his minority. But he was himself of an unmerciful nature; and therefore unmeet to be a good perwader unto kindly affection. The murders by him done upon many of his friends, together with the barbarous outrages, which for the satiating of his blood-thirsty appetite, he delightfully had committed upon many innocents, both strangers and subjects of his own; did now procure vengeance down from Heaven, that rewarded him with a draught of his own payson. After the death of his Son, he too late began to examine the crimes that had been objected; and to weigh them in a more equal balance. Then found he nothing that could give him satisfaction, or by good probability induce him to think, that malice had not been contriver of the whole process. His only remaining Son Perseus could so ill dissemble the pleasure which he took in being freed from all danger of competition: as there might easily be perceived in him a notable change, proceeding from some other cause, than the remove of those dangers which he had lately pretended. The Romans were now no less to be feared than at other times; when he, as having accomplished the most of his desires, left off his usual trouble of mind, and carefulness of making provision against them. He was more diligently courted, than in former times, by those that well understood the difference between a rising and a setting Sun. As for old Philip, he was left in a manner desolate, some expecting his death, and some scarce enduring the tediousness of such expectation. This bred in the King a deep melancholy; and filled his head with suspicious imagination; the like whereof he had never been slow to apprehend. He was much vexed: and so much the more, for that he knew neither well to whom, nor perfectly whereof to complain. One honourable man, a Cousen of his, named Antigonus, continued so true to Philip, that he grew thereby hateful to Perseus: and thus becoming subject unto the same jealous impressions which troubled the King, became also partaker of his secrets. This Counsellor, when he found that the anger conceived against Perseus would not vent it self, and give ease to the King, until the truth were known whether Demetrius were guilty or no of the treason objected; as also that Philoetes and Apelles (the Embassadors which had brought from Rome that Epistle of Flamininus, that served as the greatest evidence against Demetrius) were suspected of forgery in the business: made diligent enquiry after the truth. In thus doing he found one Xybius, a man most likely to have understood what false dealing was used by those Embassadors. Him he apprehended, brought to the Court, and presented unto the King: saying, that this fellow knew all, and must therefore be made to utter what he knew. Xybius for fear of torture, uttered as much as was before suspected: confessing against himself, that he had been employed by the Embassadors in that wicked piece of business. No marvel if the Fathers passions were extreme, when he understood that by the unnatural practice of one Son, he had so wretchedly cast away another, far more virtuous and innocent.

innocent. He raged exceedingly against himself, and withal against the Authors of the mischief. Upon the first news of this discovery, Apelles fled away, and got into Italy; Philoetes was taken: and either forasmuch as he could not deny it when Xybius confronted him, yielded himself guilty; or else was put to torture. Perseus was now grown stronger, than that he should need to fly the Country: yet not so stout as to adventure himself into his fathers presence. He kept on the borders of the Kingdom towards Thrace, whilst his father wintred at Demetrias. Philip therefore, not hoping to get into his power this his ungracious Son, took a resolution, to alienate the Kingdom from him, and confer it upon Antigonus. But his weak body, and excessive grief of mind, so disabled him in the travel thereto belonging, that ere he could bring his purpose to effect, he was constrained to yield to nature. He had reigned about two and forty years: always full of trouble; as vexed by others, and vexing himself with continual wars; of which that with the Romans was most unhappy, and few or none of the rest found the conclusion, which a wise Prince would have desired, of bringing forth together both honour and profit. But for all the evil that befell him, he might thank his own perverse condition: since his Uncle, King Antigonus, had left unto him an estate, so great, and so well settled, as made it ease for him, to accomplish any moderate desires, if he had not abhorred all good counsel. Wherefore he was justly punished by feeling the difference between the imaginary happiness of a Tyrant, which he affected, and the life of a King, whereof he little cared to perform the duty. His death, even whilst yet it was only drawing near, was fore-figured unto Perseus, by Caligenes the Phrygian, who also concealed it a while from those that were about the Court. So Perseus came thither on the sudden, and took possession of the Kingdom: which in fine he no less improvidently lost, than he had wickedly gotten.

§. IV.

How the Bastarnæ fell upon Dardania. The behaviour of Perseus in the beginning of his reign. Some wars of the Romans: and how they suffered Masaniissa cruelly to oppress the Carthaginians. They quarrelled with Perseus. They allow not their Confederates to make war without their leave obtained. The Treason of Callicrates, whereby all Greece became more obnoxious to Rome, than in former times. Further quarrels to Perseus. He seeks friendship of the Achæans, and is withstood by Callicrates. The Romans discover their intent of warring upon him.

Immediately upon the death of Philip, came the Bastarnæ into Thrace; where order had been taken, long before, both for the free passage, and for the indemnity of the Country. This Compact was friendly observed, as long as no other was known than that Philip did live to recompense all that should be done, or sustained, for his service. But when it was heard, that a new King reigned in Macedonia; and not heard withal, that he took any care what became of the enterprise: then was all doubt and confounded. The Thracians would no longer afford so good markets unto these strangers, as formerly they had done. On the other side, the Bastarnæ would not be contented with reason, but became their own carvers. Thus each part having lost their rich hopes repos'd in Philip, grew careful of thriving in the present; with little regard of right or wrong. Within a while they fell to blows; and the Bastarnæ had the upper hand, so as they chased the Thracians out of the plain Countries. But the victors made little use of their good fortune. For whether by reason of some overthrow, received by them in assaulting a place of strength; or whether because of extrem bad weather, which is said to have afflicted them as it were miraculously: all of them returned home, save thirty thousand, which pierced on into Dardania. How these thirty thousand sped in their voyage, I do not find. It seems that by the careless using of some victories, they drew loss upon themselves: and finally took that occasion, to follow their companions back into their own Country.

As for Perseus, he thought it not expedient, in the novelty of his reign, to embroil himself in a war so dangerous, as that with the Romans was likely to prove. Wherefore he wholly gave his mind to the settling of his Estate, which well done, he might afterwards accommodate himself, as the condition of his affairs should require, either for war or peace. To prevent all danger of rebellion, he quickly took away the life of Antigonus. To win love of his people, he sat personally to hear their causes in judgement, (though herein he was so over-diligent and curious, that one might have perceived this his virtue of justice to be no better than feigned) as also he gratified them with many delightful spectacles, magnificently by him set forth. Above all, he had care to avoid all necessity of war with Rome: and therefore made it his first work, to send Embassadors thither, to renew the league; which he obtained, and was by the Senate saluted King, and friend unto the State. Neither was he negligent in seeking to purchase good will of the Greeks, and other his neighbours: but was rather herein so excessively bountiful, that it may seem a wonder how in few years, to his utter ruine, he became so griping and tenacious. His fear was indeed the marring passion, which over-ruled him, and changed him into so many shapes, as made it hard to discern which of his other qualities were naturally his own. For proof of this, there is requisite no more, than the relation of his actions past and following.

The Romans continued, as they had long, busy in wars against the Spaniards and Ligurians; people often vanquished, and as often breaking forth into new rebellion. They also conquered Sicilia; subdued the rebellious Sardinians; and had some quarrels, though to little effect, with the Illyrians and others. Over the Carthaginians they bore (as ever since the victory) a heavy hand; and suffered Masaniissa to take from them what he listed. The Carthaginians, like obedient Vassals to Rome, were afraid, though in defence of their own, to take arms: from which they were bound by an Article of peace, except it were with leave of the Romans. Masaniissa therefore had great advantage over him, and was not ignorant how to use it. He could get possession by force, of whatsoever he desired, ere their complaining Embassadors could be at Rome: and then were the Romans not hardly entreated to leave things as they found them.

So had he once dealt before, in taking from them the Country of Emporia: and so did he use them again and again: with pretence of title, where he had any; otherwise, without it. Gale the Father of Masaniissa had won some land from the Carthaginians; which afterward Syphax won from Gale; and within a while, restored to the right owners, for love of his wife Sophonisba, and of Asdrubal his father-in-law. This did Masaniissa take from them by force: and by the Romans' (to whose judgement the case was referred) was permitted quietly to hold it. The Carthaginians had now good experience, how beneficial it was for their Estate, to use all manner of submissive obedience to Rome. They had scarcely digested this injury, when Masaniissa came upon them again; and took from them above seventy Towns and Castles, without any colour of right. Hereof by their Embassadors, they made lamentable complaint unto the Roman Senate. They shewed how grievously they were oppressed by reason of Two Articles in their League: That they should not make war out of their own Lands; nor with any Confederates of the Romans. Now although it were so that they might lawfully withstand the violence of Masaniissa, invading their Country, howsoever he was pleased to call it his: yet since he was Confederate with the Romans, they durst not presume to bear defensive arms against him, but suffered themselves to be eaten up, for fear of incurring the Romans indignation. Wherefore they intreated, that they might have fairer justice; or be suffered to defend their own by strong hand; or at least, if right might wholly give place to favour, That the Romans yet would be pleased to determine, how far forth Masaniissa should be allowed to proceed in these outrages. If none of these petitions could be obtained, then desired they, that the Romans would let them understand, wherein they had offended since the time that Scipio gave them peace; and vouchsafe to inflict on them such punishment as they themselves in honour should think meet: for that better and more to their comfort it were, to suffer at once what should be appointed by such Judges; than continually to live in fear, and none otherwise draw breath, than at the mercy of this Numidian Hangman. And herewithal the Embassadors threw themselves prostrate on the ground, weeping; in hope to move compassion.

Here may we behold the fruits of their envy to that valiant house of the Barchin; of their irreligion in prosecuting a war so important, as Hannibal made for them in Italy; and of their half-penny-worthing in matter of expence when they had adventured their whole estate in the purchase of a great Empire. Now are they servants, even to the servants of those men, whose fathers they have often chased, slain, taken and sold as bond-slaves in the streets of Carthage, and in all Cities of Affrick and Greece. Now have they enough of that Roman peace, which Hanno so often and so earnestly desired. Only they want peace with Masaniissa, once their mercenary, and now their master or rather their tormentor, out of whose cruel hands, they beseech their masters to take the office of correcting them. In such case are they, and adore the Romans, whom they see flourishing in such prosperity as might have been their own. But the Romans had far better entreated Varro, who lost the battle at Cannae; than Hannibal that that want it was used by the Carthaginians: they had freely bestowed, every man of them, all his private riches upon the Common-wealth; and employed their labours for the publick, without craving recompence: as also they had not thought it much, though being in extrem want, to set out an Army into Spain, at what time the enemy lay under their own walls. These were no Carthaginian virtues; and therefore the Carthaginians, having fought against their betters, must patiently endure the miseries belonging to the vanquished. Their pitiful behaviour bred peradventure some commiseration; yet their tears may seem to have been mistrusted, as proceeding no less from envy to the Romans, than from any feeling of their own calamity. They thought themselves able to fight with Masaniissa: which estimation of their forces was able to make them, after a little while, enter into comparisons with Rome. Wherefore they obtained not such leave as they sought, of defending their own right by arms: but contrariwise, when without leave obtained, they presumed so far, the destruction of Carthage was thought an easie punishment of that offence. At the present, they received a gentle answer; though they had otherwile little amends. Gniffusa the Son of Masaniissa was then in Rome, and had not as yet craved audience. He therefore was called before the Senate; where he was demanded the reason of his coming; and had related unto him the complaint made by the Carthaginians against his Father. He answered, That his Father not being thoroughly aware of any Embassadors thither sent from Carthage, had therefore not given him instructions, how to deal in that business. Only it was known, that the Carthaginians had held Council divers nights, in the Temple of Aesculapius: whereupon he himself was dispatched away to Rome, there to intreat the Senate, that these common enemies of the Romans, and of his Father, might not be over-much trusted; especially against his Father, whom they hated most maliciously, for his constant faith to the people of Rome. This answer gave little satisfaction. Wherefore the Senate replied; that for Masaniissa his sake, they had done, and would do, whatsoever was reasonable, but that it stood not with their justice, to allow of this his violence, in taking from the Carthaginians, those Lands, which by the covenants of the League were granted unto them freely to enjoy. With this mild rebuke they dismissed Gniffusa; bestowing on him friendly presents (as also they did on the Carthaginians) and willed him to tell his Father, that he should do well to send Embassadors, more fully instructed in this matter. This happened when the Macedonian war was even ready to begin: at which time the Romans were not willing too much to offend, either the Carthaginians (for fear of urging them unseasonably to rebellion) or Masaniissa, at whose hands they expected no little help. So were they aided both by the Carthaginians, and Masaniissa: by the Carthaginians, partly for fear, partly for hope of better usage in the future; by Masaniissa, in way of thankfulness; though if it had happened (which was unlikely) that they should be vanquished; he made none other account, than that all Affrick round about him, and Carthage therewithal, should be his own.

In the midst of all these cares, the Romans had not been unmindful of Perseus. They visited him daily with Embassadors; that is, with honourable spies to observe his behaviour. These he entertained kindly at first, until (which fell out ere long) he perceived whereto their diligence tended. First they quarrelled with him about the troubles in Dardania: neither would they take any satisfaction, until the Bastarnae were thence gone; though he protested, that he had not sent for them. Afterward they cried narrowly into his doings; and were no less ill contented with good offices, by him done, to sundry of his neighbours, than with those wrongs, which (they said) he did unto other some. Where he did harm to any; they called it making war upon their friends: Where he did good; they called such his bounty, seeking friends to take his part against them. The Dolopians, his subjects, (upon what occasion it is uncertain) rebelled, and with exquisite torments slew Euphranor, whom he had appointed their Governour. It seems that Euphranor had played the Tyrant among them. For they were a people without strength to resist the Macedonian: and therefore unlikely to have presumed far, unless either they had been extremely provoked; or else were secretly animated by the Romans. Whatsoever it was that bred this courage in them, Perseus did soon allay it, and reclaim them by strong hand. But the Romans took very awfully this presumption of the King: even as if he had invaded some Country of their Italian Confederates, and not corrected his own rebels at home. Fain they would have had him to draw in the same yoke with the Carthaginians; whereunto had he humbled once his neck, they could themselves have done the part of Masaniissa; though Emmenc, or some other fit for that purpose, had been wanting.

wanting. And to this effect, they told him, That the Conditions of the League between them were such as made it unlawful both to his Father heretofore, and now to him, to take arms without their licence first obtained.

To the same pass they would also have reduced the Greeks, and generally all their adherents, even such as had entred into league with them upon equal terms: whom usually they rewarded with a frown, whenever they presumed to right themselves by force of Arms, without seeking first the Oracle at Rome. Hereof the Acheans had good experience: whose confidence in their proper strength, made them otherwhiles bold to be their own carvers; and whose hope of extraordinary favour at Rome caused them the more willingly to refer their causes to arbitrement. For when they went about to have chastised the Messenians by War; T. Quintius rebuked them, as too arrogant, in taking such a work in hand, without his authority: yet by his authority he ended the matter, wholly to their good liking. Scarcely at other times were they reprehended, even with lordly threats, when they took upon them to carry any business of importance, by their own power, without standing unto the good grace of the Romans. Who nevertheless upon submission, were apt enough to do them right. Thus were they tamed by little and little, and taught to forget their absolute liberty, as by which they were not like to thrive; especially in usurping the practice of arms, which belonged only to the Imperial City. In learning this hard lesson, they were such untoward Schollers, that they needed, and not long after felt, very sharp correction. Yet was there no small part of blame to be imputed unto their Masters. For the Roman Senate, being desirous to humble the Acheans, refused not only to give them such aid as they requested, and as they challenged by the tenor of the League between them; but further, with a careless insolency, rejected this honest and reasonable petition, That the Enemy might not be supplied from Italy, with victuals or arms. Here with not content, the Fathers, as weariest with dealing in the affairs of Greece, pronounced openly, That if the Argives, Lacedaemonians, or Corinthians would revolt from the Acheans; they themselves would think it a business no way concerning them.

This was presently after the death of Philopemen: at what time it was believed, that the Common-wealth of Achaia was like to fall into much distress: were it not upheld by countenance of the Romans. All this notwithstanding; when Lycortas Praetor of the Acheans had utterly subdued the Messenians far sooner than was expected; and when as not only no Town rebelled from the Acheans, but many entered into their Corporation; then did the Romans with an ill-favoured grace, tell the same Embassadors, to whose petition they had made such bad answer (and who as yet were not gone out of the City,) That they had straightly forbidden all manner of succour to be carried to Messene. Thus thinking, by a fained gravity, to have served their own turns, they manifested their condition; both to set on the weaker against the stronger and more suspected, and also to assume unto themselves a Sovereign power, in directing all matters of war, which dissemblingly they would have seemed to neglect. In like manner dealt they with all their Confederates: not permitting any of them to make war; whether offensive or defensive; though it were against meer strangers; without interposing the authority of the Senate and people of Rome: unless peradventure, sometimes they winked at such violence, as did help towards the accomplishment of their own secret malice. Now these Roman Arts, howsoever many (for gainful or timorous respects) would seem to understand them; yet were generally displeasing unto all men endued with free spirits. Only the Athenians, once the most turbulent City in Greece, having neither subjects of their own that might rebel, nor power wherewith to bring any into subjection; for want of more noble argument wherein to practise their eloquence that was become the whole remainder of their ancient commendations, were much delighted in flattering the most mighty. So they kept themselves in grace with the Romans, remaining free from all trouble: until the war of Mithridates: being men unfit for action, and thereby innocent; yet bearing a part in many great actions, as Gratiators of the Roman victories, and Pardon-cravers for the vanquished. Such were the Athenians become. As for those other Common-wealths and Kingdoms, that with over-nice diligence, strove to preserve their Liberties and Lands from consuming by piece-meal: they were to be devoured whole, and swallowed up at once. Especially the Macedonian, as the most unpliant, and wherein many of the Greeks began to have assistance, was necessarily to be made an example, how much better it were to bow, than to break.

Neither Perseus, nor the Romans were ignorant, porant, how the Greeks at this time stood affected. Perseus, by reason of his near neighbourhood, and of the daily commerce between them and his subjects, could not want good information of all that might concern him, in their affairs. He well knew, that all of them now apprehended the danger which Philopemen had long since foretold, of the miserable subjection, wherinto Greece was likely to be reduced, by the Roman Patronage. Indeed they not only perceived the approaching danger, but as being tenderly sensible of their liberty, felt themselves grieved with the present subjection, whereto already they were become obnoxious. Wherefore though none of them had the courage, in matters of the publick to fall out with the Romans; yet all of them had the care to choose among themselves none other Magistrates, than such as affected the good of their Country, and would for no ambition, or other servile respect, be flatterers of the greatness which kept all in fear. Thus it seemed likely, that all domesticall conspiracies would soon be at an end; when honesty, and love of the Common-wealth, became the fairest way to preferment. Of this careful provision for the safety of Greece, the Romans were not thoroughly advertised: either because things were diligently concealed from their Embassadors; whom all men knew to be little better than spies; or because little account was made of that intelligence, which was brought in by such Traitors (of whom every City in Greece had too many) as were men unregarded among their own people, and therefore more like to speak maliciously than truly; or perhaps because the Embassadors themselves, being all Senators, and capable of the greatest Office or charge, had no will to find out other matter of trouble, than was fitting to their own desires of employment. But it is hard to conceal that which many know, from those that are feared or flattered by many. The Acheans being to send Embassadors to Rome, that should both excuse them, as touching some point wherein they refused to obey the Senate; and inform the Senate better in the same business: chose one Callistratus, among others, to go in that Embassy. By their making choice of such a man, one may perceive the advantage, which malicious wretches, who commonly are forward in pursuing their vile desires, have against the plain sort of honest men, that least earnestly thrust themselves into the troublesome business of the weal-publick. For this Callistratus was in such wise transported with ambition, that he chose much rather to betray his Country, than to let any other be of more authority than himself therein. Wherefore instead of well discharging his credence, and alledging what was meetest in justification of his people, he uttered a quite contrary tale; and strongly encouraged the Romans, to oppress both the Acheans, and all the rest of Greece, with a far more heavy hand. He told the Senate, that it was high time for them, to look unto the setting of their authority, among his froward COUNTRYMEN: if they meant not wholly to forego it. For now there was taken up a custom, to stand upon points of confederacy, and laws: as if these were principally to be had in regard, any injunction from Rome notwithstanding.

Hence grew it, that the Acheans, both now, and at other times, did what best pleased themselves, and answered the Romans with excuses: as if it were enough to say, That by some condition of League, or by force of some Law, they were discharged or hindered from obeying the Decrees of the Senate. This would not be so, if he, and some other of his opinion might have their wills: who ceased not to affirm, That no Columns, or Monuments, erected, nor no solemn oath of the whole Nation, to ratify the observance of Confederacy or Statute, ought to be of force, when the Roman willed the contrary. But it was even the fault of the Romans themselves, that the multitude refused to give ear unto such persuasions. For howsoever in popular Estates, the sound of liberty used to be more plausible, than any discourse tending against it: yet if they which undertook the maintenance of an argument, seeming never so bad, were sure by their so doing, to procure their own good; the number of them would increase apace, and they become the prevalent faction. It was therefore, strange how the Fathers could so neglect the advancement of those, that sought wholly to enlarge the amplitude of the Roman Majesty. More wisely, though with seditious and rebellious purpose, did the Greeks; who many times, yea and ordinarily, conferred great honours, upon men otherwise of little account or desert, only for having uttered those brave words against the Romans. The Fathers hearing these and the like reasons, wherewith he exhorted them to handle roughly those that were obstinate, and by cherishing their friends, to make their party strong; resolved to follow this good counsel, in every point; yea to depress all those that held with the right, and to set up their own followers, were it by right or by wrong. And to this end, they not only dealt thenceforth more peremptorily with the Achaëans, than had been their manner in former times; but wrote at the present unto all Cities of Greece, requiring them to see that their mandate (which was concerning the restitution of those that were banished out of Lacedæmon) should be fulfilled. Particularly in behalf of Callistratus, they advised all men to be such, and so affected, as he was, in their several common-weals. With this dispatch, Callistratus returned home a joyful man: having brought his Country into the way of ruine, but himself into the way of preferment. Nevertheless he forbore to vaunt himself of his eloquence used in the Senate. Only he reported his Embassy, that all men became fearful of the danger, wherewith he threatened those that should presume to oppose the Romans. By such Arts he obtained to be made Pretor of the Achaëans: in which Magistracy, as in all his courses following, he omitted nothing that might serve to manifest his ready obsequiousness unto those whom he had made his Patrons.

Now, as the Romans by threatening-terms wan many flatterers, and lost as many true friends: so Perseus on the other side, thinking by liberal gifts, and hopeful promises, to assure unto himself those that ill could brook his enemies; got indeed a multitude of partakers, though little honester than his enemies had. Thus were all the Cities of Greece distracted with factions: some holding with the Romans, some with the Macedonians, and some few, respecting only the good of the Estates wherein they lived. Hereat the Lords of the Senate were highly offended; and thought it an indignity not sufferable, That a King, no better than their Vassal, should dare to become head of a faction against them. This therefore must be reckoned in the number of the trespasses: whereof if not any one alone, yet all of them together, shall afford them just occasion to make War upon him. Perseus having finished his business among the Dolopians, made a journey to Apollo's Temple at Delphi. He took his Army along with him: yet went, and returned in such peaceable and friendly wife, that no place was the worse for his journey, but the good affection towards him generally increased thereby. With those that were in his way, he dealt himself; to such as lay further off, he sent Embassadors or Letters: praying them, That the memory of all wrongs whatsoever, done by his Father, might be buried with his Father's: since his own meaning was to hold friendship sincerely with all his neighbours. The Romans perhaps could have been pleased better, if he had behaved himself after a contrary fashion, and done some acts of hostility in his passage. Yet, as if he ought not to have taken such a journey, without their licence; this also was made a valuable matter, and cast into the heap of his faults. He laboured greatly to recover the love of the Achaëans: which his Father had so lost, that by a solemn decree, they forbade any Macedonians to enter their territories. It was jealousy perhaps, no less than hatred, which caused them, at the first, to make such a decree. For howsoever Philip had by many vile acts, especially by the death of the two Arats, given them cause to abhor him, yet in the publick administration of their estate, he had, for the more part, been to them beneficial, that not without much ado, and at length, without any general consent, they resolve to forsake him. Wherefore it was needful, even for preservation of concord among them, to use all circumspection, that he might not, by his agents, negotiate, and hold intelligence with any, in a Country towards him so doubtfully affected: especially when by hearkening to his messages, they might make themselves suspected by their new friends, but the continuance of this decree, beyond the time of War, and when all danger of innovation was past, was uncivil, if not inhumane; as nourishing deadly hatred, without leaving means of reconciliation. And hereof the Achaëans reaped no good fruit. For, although they were not, in like sort, forbidden the Kingdom of Macedon: yet understanding what would be due to them, if they should adventure thither, none of them durst set foot therein. Hence it came to pass, that their bond-men, knowing a safe harbour, out of which their Masters could not fetch them, ran daily away in great numbers: exceedingly to the loss of such, as made of their slaves very profitable use. But Perseus took hold upon this occasion: as fitly serving to pacify those, whose enmity vain he would have changed into love. He therefore apprehended all these fugitives, to send them home again: and wrote unto the Achaëans, That as for good will unto them, he had taken pains to restore back their servants, so should they do very well to take order for keeping them, that hereafter they might not run away again. His meaning was readily understood, and his Letters kindly accepted by the greater part; being openly rehearsed by the Pretor, before the Council. But Callistratus took the matter very angrily; and bade them be advised what they did: for that this was none other, than a plain device, to make them depart from the friendship of the Romans.

Herewithall

Herewithall he took upon him, somewhat liberally, to make the Achaëans beforehand acquainted with the War, that was coming upon Perseus from Rome. He told them how Philip had made preparations for the same War; how Demetrius had been made away, because of his good affection to the Romans; and how Perseus had, since his being King, done many things, tending to the breach of peace. Briefly, He rehearsed all those matters, which were afterwards alledged by the Romans; the invasion of the Bastarnæ, upon the Dardaniæ; the Kings Journey against the Dolopians; his voyage to Delphi; and finally, his peaceable behaviour, which was (he said) a dangerous temptation of men to his party. Wherefore he advised them to expect the event of things, and not over-hastily to enter into any degree of offriendship with the Macedonians. Hereto good answer was made by the Pretors brother: That Callistratus was too earnest in so light a matter; and that, being neither one of the Kings Councillors, nor of the Roman Senate, he made himself too well acquainted with all that had passed, or was like to follow. For it was well known, that Perseus had renewed his League with the Romans; that he was by them saluted King, and friend to the estate: and that he had lovingly entertained their Embassadors: This being so; why might not the Achaëans, as well as the Ætolians, Thessalians, Epirots, and all the Greeks, hold with him such correspondence, as common humanity required? Nevertheless Callistratus was grown a man so terrible, by his Roman acquaintance, that they durst not over-tightly gainsay him. Therefore the matter was referred unto further deliberation: and answer made the whilst, That since the King had only sent a Letter without an Embassy, they knew not how to resolve. Better it was to say thus, than, that they were afraid to do as they thought most reasonable and convenient. But when Perseus herewith not contented, would needs urge them further, and send Embassadors: then were they fain, without any good pretence, to put on a countenance of anger, and deny to give audience: which was proof sufficient (to one that could understand) of the condition wherein they lived. For hearkening to this advice of Callistratus; they were soon after highly commended by a Roman Embassy: whereby it became apparent, that the Romans intended War upon the Macedonians; though hitherto no cause of War was given.

S. V.

How Eumenes King of Pergamus was buffed with Pharnaces, the Rhodians, and others. His hatred to the Macedonian: whom he accuseth to the Roman Senate. The Senate honours him greatly, and condemns his enemies the Rhodians; with the causes thereof. The unjust stoutness of the Macedonian Embassadors. Perseus his attempt upon Eumenes. The brotherly love between Eumenes and Attalus. Perseus his device to possess some of the Roman Senators: whereupon they decree War against him, and send him defiance. Other things concerning the justice of this War.

Eumenes King of Pergamus had been troubled about these times, by the Kings Pharnaces and Mithridates, his neighbours. He had taken the right course, in making first his complaint to the Romans: by whom he was animated with comfortable words, and promise. That they, by their authority, would end the business to his content. But in conclusion, by the help of the Kings, Phylas and Artaxerxes, he ended the War himself; and brought his Enemies to seek and accept peace, on such conditions as pleased him to give them. After this, being at good leisure; he began to consider how the affairs of Macedon stood under Perseus. His hatred to Perseus was very great: and therefore he was glad to understand, that the hatred of the Romans, to the same his Enemy was as great, and withall notorious. Now, besides his ancient and hereditary quarrel with the Macedonians; it vexed him exceedingly, That his own honours (whereof the Greeks, prodigal in that kind, had heaped immoderate store on his Father and him) began to wax every where stale; whilst Perseus, either by his currying favour, or by the envy born to the Romans, had gotten their best liking and wishes. For despite of this indignity, He stirred up the Lycians against the Rhodians his old friends: and in helping these rebels, was so violent, that he proceeded, in a manner, in open War. But small pleasure found he in these poor and indirect courses of revenge.

The Lycians could not be saved by his Patronage from severe and cruel chastisement, given to them by the Rhodians. This rendered him contemptible: as likewise, his acts of hostility, little different from robberies, made him hateful to those which loved him before. As for his honours in the Cities of Greece; they not only continued falling into neglect: but were abrogated by a decree decree of the Acheans, as too unmeasured, misbecoming them to give, and affected by him beyond the proportion of his deservings. All this (which he needed not to have regarded, had he not been too vainly ambitious) befell him; especially for his being over-serviceable to the Romans; and for his malice to that noble Kingdom; which if it fell, the liberty of Greece was not like to stand. Now for the redress hereof, he thought it vain to strive any longer with bounty, against such an Adversary, as by hopeful promises alone, without any great performance, had over-topped him in the general favour. And therefore he resolved even to overturn the foundations of this popularity, by inducing the Romans utterly to take away from the eyes of men this Idol, the Macedonian Kingdom, which all so vainly worshipped. Neither would it prove a difficult matter, to persuade those that were already desirous: rather he was like to be highly thanked, for setting forward their wishes; and perhaps to be recompensed with some piece of the Kingdom, as he had been rewarded, for the like service, when Antiochus was vanquished.

To this end he made a second voyage to Rome: where, though he had little to say, which they knew not before, yet his words were heard with such attention, as if they had contained some strange novelty; and so pondered by the Fathers, as if the weight of them were to turn the balance, that before was equal. The death of Demetrius, the expedition of the Bastarnæ into Dardania, that of Perseus himself against the Dolopians, and to Dolphi, the great estimation of the Macedonian in Greece, his intermeddling in businesses of his neighbours, his riches and his great provisions, were all the material points of Eumenes's discourse. Only he descended unto particulars, having searched into all (as he professed) like unto a Spy. He said, that Perseus had thirty thousand foot and five thousand horse of his own, money in a readiness to entertain ten thousand Mercenaries for ten years, Arms to furnish a number thrice as great: The Thracians his friends at hand, ready, at a call, to bring him Souldiers as many as he should require; and that he prepared victuals for ten years, because he would not be driven, either to live upon spoil, or to take from his own Subjects. Herewithall he prayed them to consider, that King Seleucus, the Son and successor of Antiochus the Great, had given his Daughter Laodice in marriage to Perseus; Perseus not wooing, but Seleucus offering the match; That King Prusias of Bythinia, by earnest suit, had gotten to wife the Sister of Perseus; and that these marriages were solemnized with great concourse of Embassadors from all quarters. Neither spared he to tell them, (though seeming loth to utter it plainly) That even the envy to their Estate was the cause, why many that could not endure to hear of amity with Philip, were now grown marvellously well affected to his Son. All this, and some facts of Perseus, which might either be denied or justified, (as that he had procured the death of some which were friends to the Romans, and that he had expelled Alypius, the Illyrian, who invaded Macedon, out of his Kingdom, or Lordship) Eumenes failed not to amplify unto the most; saying, That he thought it his duty to forewarn them: since it would be to himself a great shame, if Perseus got the start of him, and were in Italy making War upon the Romans, ere Eumenes could come thither to tell them of the danger.

It were too great folly, to believe that the Romans stood in fear of Perseus, lest he should set upon them in Italy. Nevertheless, so much as they loved not to make War without fair pretence, not only of wrong done to them or their associates, but of further hurt intended: great thanks were given to Eumenes, who had every way furnished them with such goodly colour, to beautify their intentment. Now thought it were so, that he told them little else than what they knew before, yet at his person, and the manner of his coming, made all seem greater. For if upon any relation made by their own Embassadors, or upon tales devised by their flatterers and spies, they had warred against Perseus, ere he had committed any open act of hostility against them, their injustice and oppression would have been most manifest. But when the wrongs to them done, were so notorious, and the danger threatening them so terrible, that such a Prince as Eumenes came out of his own Kingdom, as far as from Asia, to bid them look to themselves; who could blame them, if they took the speediest order to obtain their own right and security? Toward this justification of the war, and magnifying the necessity that enforced them thereto, their more than usual curiosity, in concealing what Eumenes had uttered in the Senate, when they could not but understand that his errand was well known; helped not a little. The Macedonian and Rhodian Embassadors were at Rome, provided of answers to the words, which they knew before-hand that he would speak; and with matter of recrimination. The vanity, either of him, of some about Papp. Lit. 40. c. 61.

about him, seems to have disclosed all: when the weariness of the Fathers, in hiding that which all men knew, made a notable shew of some fearful apprehension; against which it behoved their wisdom to neglect no possible remedy. Wherefore careles audience was given to the Rhodian Embassadors; who accused Eumenes, as one more troublesome to Asia, than Antiochus had ever been, and a provoker of the Lycians to rebellion. The Rhodians had with great pomp conveyed by Sea unto Perseus, his Bride Laodice; which friendly Office, as the Macedonian bountifully requited, so the Romans despondingly accepted. Hence it grew, that when the Lycians, as already vanquished, were setting themselves in their obedience to the people of Rhodes, Embassadors came from Rome with strange news, which gave new life to the rebellion. For the Senate pronounced That it stood not with the manner of the Romans, to alien quite from their own protection any People or Nation by them vanquished: and that the Lycians were by them assigned unto those of Rhodes, not as meet Vassals, but as Dependants and Associates. For proof hereof, they referred themselves unto the Commentaries of the ten Embassadors; whom they had sent to dispose of things in Asia, after the Victory against King Antiochus. Hereat Eumenes, Masaniasis, the Ætolians, and all other Kings or Estates that were beholding to Rome, for increasing the number of their Subjects, had cause to find themselves aggrieved, if they well considered the matter: since by force of this or the like decree, those their Subjects might easily be made their Fellows, whensoever it should please the Senate: though it were so that all men knew the present meaning of the Senate: which was only to plague the Rhodians for their good will to Perseus, by setting them and the Lycians together by the ears. The Fathers could therefore see no reason to dislike Eumenes, upon this complaint made by the Rhodian Embassadors; which indeed more nearly touched themselves. Rather they honoured the King so much the more: for that others (as they would needs take it) conspired against him, because of his love to Rome.

But the Macedonian Embassy they heard not so carelessly as angrily: though peradventure it well contented them to find cause of anger: for whereas at other times all care had been taken, to pacifie them with gentle words and excuses: now heard they plainer language, and were told, That King Perseus desired much to give them satisfaction, concerning any deed or word of his,

that might favour of hostility; but that, if his travel in this kind proved vain, then would he be ready to defend himself by arms, and stand to the chance of War, which often fills out contrary to expectation. These big words may seem to have proceeded from the vehemency of Harpalus, that was chief of the Embassadors; rather than from instruction given by the King, with whose faint heart they agreed not. Yet was there good reason, why Perseus himself might, at this time, think to speed better by a shew of daring, than he was like to do by any submission. For the eyes of all Greece being now cast upon him, as on the greatest hope of deliverance from the Roman servitude; it was not expedient that he should lessen, or perhaps utterly cut off, the general expectation, and the good affection born to him, which thereon depended, by discovering his too much weakness of spirit, unanswerable to a work of such importance. Wherefore he, or his Embassador for him, was bold to set a good countenance on a game not very bad, but subject (in appearance) to fortune, which might have been his, had he known how to use it.

Now that this bravery (as better it may be termed than courage) proceeded from the Kings own heat; it appears by his daring to adventure soon after, on a practice that more justly might anger the Romans, and give them fairer shew of reason to make War upon him. It was known that Eumenes, in returning home, would take Delphi in his way and there do sacrifice to Apollo. Perseus deadly hating him, and thirsting after his blood, resolved to way-lay him; and by making there of him a sacrifice, to rid his own hands of a most mischievous Enemy. So there were appointed three or four stout Russians to do the murder: who placing themselves behind a broken mud-wall, on the side of a very narrow path leading up from the Sea to the Temple, did thence assault the King; whom they sorely bristled with great stones, and left for dead. They might have finished their work, such was the opportunity of the place which they had chosen; but fear of being apprehended, made them, without staying to see all sure, flee in such haste, that they killed one of their own Companions, who could not hold pace with them; because he should not discover them. Eumenes was conveyed away to the little Isle of Agina, where he was cured: being all the while kept so secretly, that the fame of his Death was current in Asia. Hence it came, that his brother Attalus took upon him as King, and either took, or would have taken to wife (supposing it be like a matter of State) Stratonice the daughter of King Ariarathes, whom he then thought the Widow of Eumenes. It may well be numbred among the rare Examples of brotherly love. That when the King turned alive home, Attalus going forth to meet him and do his duty, as in former times, received none other check, than, That he should forbear to marry with the Queen, until he were well assured of the Kings death. More than this, Eumenes never spake of these matters; but bequeathed at his death, unto the same Brother, both his Wife and Kingdom. As likewise Attalus forbore to attempt any thing to the prejudice of the King his Brother: though the Romans (with whom he continued and grew in special favour, when Eumenes fell into their hatred) were in good readines to have transferred the Kingdom from his Brother to him. By such concord of Brethren was the Kingdom of Pergamus raised and upheld; as might also that of Macedon have been, if Demetrius had lived, and employed his grace with the Romans, to the benefit of Perseus.

It is likely that Perseus was very glad, when he understood that his Ministers had both accomplished his will, and had saved all from discovery. But as he was deceived in the main point, and heard shortly after, that Eumenes lived, so was he beguiled in that other hope, of the concealment; which he vainly esteemed the less material. For he had written to one Praxo, a Gentlewoman of Delphi, to entertain the men whom he sent about this business: and she, being apprehended by C. Valerius, a Roman Ambassador, then attending upon the matters of Greece, was carried to Rome. Thus all came to light. Valerius also brought with him to Rome, out of Greece, one Rammius a Citizen of Brundisium; who coming newly from the Court of Macedon, loaden with a dangerous secret, had presently sought out the Ambassador, and thereof discharged himself. Brundisium was the ordinary Port for Ships passing between Italy and Greece. There had Rammius a fair house; wherein he gave entertainment, being a wealthy man, to Embassadors, and other honourable personages, both Romans and Macedonians, journeying to and fro. By occasion of such his Hospitality, he was commended to Perseus, and invited into Macedon with friendly letters; as one, whose many courtesies to his Embassadors, the King was studious to requite. At his coming, he was much made of; and shortly, with more familiarity than he expected or desired, made partaker of the Kings Secret. The sum of all was, That he must needs do a turn, in giving to such of the Romans as the King should hereafter name, a poyson of rare quality; sure in operation, yet not to be perceived either in the taking or afterward. He durst not refuse to accept this Employment: for fear lest the virtue of this Medicine should be tried upon himself. But being once at liberty, he discovered all. Rammius was but one man, and one whom the King had never seen before, nor was like to see again: and therefore, besides that the Kings denial ought to be as good as such a fellows affirmation, the accusation was improbable. Thus did Perseus, in time shortly following, answer for himself; and in like sort concerning the attempt upon Eumenes: denying to have had any hand, either in the one or other: yet withall professing, That such objections were not to be made unto a King, to prove the Rightfulness of making War upon him, but rather unto a subject pleading for his life in judgement. But howsoever the Romans neglected the getting of stronger proof (which might have been easie) than any that we find by them produced: yet the base and cowardly temper of Perseus was very suitable to these practices. Neither did the Senate greatly stand to dispute the matter with him: these his treacheries being held inexcusable. And as for his Royal Estate, wherein he supposed that they ought not to touch him for such private Offences, it gave him no privilege: they judging him to have offended in the nature of a King. Herein surely they wanted not good reason. For if he might not lawfully make War upon Eumenes their Confederate; that is, if he might not send men to waste the Kingdom of Pergamus, or to besiege the Towns: might he send Ruffians to murder the King? If it were no less breach of the League to destroy the Senators by fire or famine, than by violence of the Sword, was it lawful for him to do it by poyson? Wherefore they presently decreed War against him; and sent Embassadors to denounce it unto him, unless he would yield to make such amends as they should require. He seemed at this time to have been so confident in the general favour of Greece, and other comfortable appearances, that if he desired not War, yet he did not fear it: or at least he thought by shew of courage, to make his Enemies more calm. He caused the Embassadors to dance attendance, till being weary, they departed without audience. Then called he them back, and bade them do their Errand. They made a tedious rehearsal of all matters, which they had long been collecting against him; and wherewith Eumenes had charged him: adding thereto, that he had entertained long and secret conference rence in the Isle of Samos, with Embassadors sent to him out of Asia, about some ill purpose. In regard of all which, they peremptorily required satisfaction; as was their manner when they intended to give defiance. Better they might have stood upon the evidence, brought against him by Rammius and Praxo. For if those accusations could be verified, then wanted they not good ground whereon to build: of which otherwise they were destitute; it being no fault in a King, to be strong, well-beloved, & well-befriended. Perseus answered, for the present, in a rage; calling the Romans greedy, proud, insolent, and underminers of him by their daily Embassadors, that were no better than meer spies. Finally, he promised to give them in writing their full answer: which was to this effect; That he would no longer stand to the League made between them and his Father; and renewed by himself indeed only for fear; but wished them to defend to more equal conditions; whereupon he, for his part, would advise, as they might also do for theirs.

In the form of the League between Philip and the Romans, as is set down by Polybius, we find no condition, binding the Macedonian to any inconvenience in the future; excepting those which he immediately performed. But Livy inserts a clause, whereby he was expressly forbidden to make any War abroad, without leave of the Romans. It is most likely, that all the Roman Confederates were included in this peace: whereby every one of the neighbours round about Macedon, entering shortly into league with Rome, did so bind the Kings hands, that he could no more make war abroad, than if he had been restrained by plain covenant. And thus might that seem an Article of the Peace, which never was agreed upon, but only was inferred by consequence. Now if the Romans would urge this point further, and say, that the Macedonian might not bear Defensive Arms, without their permission; then had Perseus very just reason to find himself aggrieved. For since they had allowed his father, without controul, to make war in Thrace, (whilest they themselves were acquainted with the Thracians) elsewhere abroad, though he asked not their licence: why should they now interpret the bargain after another fashion? Was it now become unlawful for him to chastise his own Rebels? or to repay an Illyrian that invaded Macedon? By such allegations he maintained the right of his cause in very mild sort; when it was too late. At the present, by disclaiming the League as unjust, he ministered occasion unto the Embassadors, to give him defiance. Having heard the worst of their message, he commanded them to be gone out of his Kingdom in three days. But either he should have been less vehement, or more constant in his resolution. For if his heart could serve him to undertake the War, he should courageously have managed it, and have slain to work immediately, whilst the Enemy was unprepared; not have lost the opportunity, as now and often he did, in hope of obtaining a worse peace than the former.

§. VI.

The Romans sollicite the Greeks, to joyn with them in the war against Perseus. How the Greeks stood affected in that war. The timorousness of Perseus. Martius a Roman Ambassador deludes him with hope of peace. His forces. He takes the field, and wins part of Thessaly. The forces of Licinius the Roman Consul: and what Assistants the Romans had in this War. Of Tempe in Thessaly; & what advantages the Macedonian had, or might have had; but lost by his fear. Perseus braves the Romans, fights with them, knows not how to fight his Victory; sues for peace, and is denied it by the Vanquished. Perseus having the worst in a skirmish, forsakes all the Country lying about Tempe. The Boeotians rebel against the Romans, and are rigorously punished. The Roman Commanders unfortunate in the War against Perseus. They vex the Greeks their friends; for whose ease the Senate makes Provision, having heard their Complaints. The flustering Alabandians.

SO long had the Romans been seeking occasion to take in hand this Macedonian War, that well they might have been ready for it, when it came; and not (as they were) behind hand in Provisions. But it was on a sudden that they met with a confluence of good pretences to make the War: whereof if no one alone had weight enough, yet all of them together seemed more than sufficient. This opportunity of making their Cause honest in common opinion, was not to be neglected: though otherwise they were unprepared for the Action. Wherefore knowing, or having reason to believe, that their own strengths were such as would prevail in the end; they hastily embraced the fair occasion of beginning, and referred other cares to the diligence of time. Neither was this their unreadiness a small help, towards examining the disposition of the Greeks and others; who must afterwards dearly pay for any backwardness found in their good will. There was not indeed any cause to fear, that all of the Greeks, or other Eastern People should conspire together, and take part with the Macedonian: such was the diffidence between the several Estates; howsoever the generality of them were inclin'd the same way. Nevertheless Embassadors were sent to deal with them all; and to crave their help against Perseus, or rather to demand it, in no less ample manner, than heretofore they had yielded it against Philip and Antiochus, in Wars pretending the Liberty of Greece. The Embassadors used as gentle words for fashion sake, as if they had stood in doubt that their request might happen to be denied. But the Greeks were now grown well acquainted with such Roman courtesie: and understood that not only such as made refusal, but even they who might seem to have granted half unwillingly, were like to hear other manner of words, when once this business was ended. Wherefore none of them were scrupulous in promising the best of their help to the Romans: the Acheans and Rhodiens, which were chief among them, being rather doubtful, even when they had donethier best, lest it should be ill taken, as if they had halst in some part of their duty. It is strange that men could be so earnest to set up the side, whereof they gladly would have seen the ruine. The vulgar sort was everywhere added to Perseus; of the Nobles and Rulers, if some were vehemently Roman, they wanted not opposers, that were wholly Macedonian; yea, the wisest and most honest, who regarded only the benefit of their Country, wished better to Perseus than to the Romans. And of this number Polybius the chief of Historians was one: who though He* judged the victory of Perseus, like to prove hurtful unto Greece, yet wished he the Romans ill to thrive, that so the Greeks might recover perfect Liberty: for his endeavours in which course, he was at length tyrannically handled, as shall be shewed hereafter. This considered, it appears that an extraordinary fear, and not only reverence of the Imperial City, made the Acheans, and other Estates of Greece, thus conformable to the Romans. The occasion of this their fear may be justly imputed unto the timorous demeanor of Perseus himself. He had undertaken a War, whereof the benefit should redound, not only to his own Kingdom, but unto all that were oppressed by the Romans. Yet no sooner were some few Companies brought over-sea, to make a countenance of meaning somewhat against him, than he began to speak the enemy fair, and sue for peace at Rome. Since therefore it was known, that every small thing would serve to terrifie him: and consequently, that it should at all times be in the Romans Power, by giving him any tolerable conditions of peace, to take revenge at leisure upon those which had assisted him; little cause was there why any should adventure to partake with him. He made indeed a great noise; leading about his army; taking by force or compulsion some few Towns, and soliciting all to joyn with him. But wise men could not be beguiled. For at the same time, he sought all means of pacification: and to that end, made humble suit unto the Roman Embassadors. Q. Martius, the chief of those Embassadors, and a man of more snceness in cunning than was usual among the Romans, made shew of inclination to the Kings desire; and gave out such comfortable words, that the King entreated and obtained a meeting at the River Peneus. There did Martius very gently rebuke the King, and charge him with those crimes that are before mentioned. Whereto though Perseus made none other answer, than the same which they could have made for him; yet the Embassadors, and especially Martius, took it in good part, as therewith satisfied; and advised him to give the like satisfaction to the Senate. That this might conveniently be done, a truce was agreed upon. Thus had Martius his desire; which was to make the King lose time. For Perseus had all things then in a readiness, and might have done much, ere the Roman Army could have been in Greece. But by the interposition of this truce, he no way increased his forces; he suffered a most convenient season of winning upon the Enemy, to slip away; and obtained in recompence nothing else, than leisure and vain hope. Yet was he pleased herewith, as it had been with some victory; publishing a copy of the Disputation between him and the Romans, whereby he gave men to understand how much he had the better, and what great hope there was of peace. He sent Embassadors also to the Rhodiens, of whose good will to him he was best persuaded; not only to let them know how much he was superior in cause; but to intreat them, that they would take upon them, as Moderators, to compound the differences between him and the Romans, if perhaps notwithstanding the goodness of his cause, he should be denied peace. These were poor helps. For hereby it appeared, that his late standing upon point of Honour, was no better than meer vanity; his own safety being the utmost of his ambition. This his fearfulness might seem excusable, and the blame thereof to appertain unto the Greeks; who deceived ceived his expectation, by being wanting to him in a time of necessity, that was partly their own: had it not been his Office, who took upon him as their Champion, to give such a manly beginning to the War, as might encourage all others to follow him. But his timorous quality being found, mengrew daily more and more avers from him; and were careful not to put their shoulders to a falling wall. The Rhodiens, among whom he had many stout Partizans, desired him not to crave any thing at their hands, in which they might seem to do against the good liking of the Romans. The Evotians also, who had entered of late into a strict society with the Macedonians, renounced it now, and made the like with the Romans: to whom further, in a sort, they yielded themselves as vassals. Neither was Martius contented to accept their submission under a general form; but caused their several Towns to make covenant apart, each for it self; to the end, that being thus distracted into many little Commonwealths, they might not (were they never so desirous to rebel) have such force to do hurt, as when they agreed, and were incorporated into one, under the City of Thebes. This work, of separating the Evotians from Thebes their Head, was more than Agellius could effect, or Ephaminondas would suffer, then when all Greece followed the Lacedemonians. So far more available to Thebes, being destitute of help from abroad, was the virtue of Ephaminondas, and a few brave Citizens, than was the society with King Perseus, against a number not so great as followed the Lacedemonians.

Martius brought this to effect, whilst the King sat still, as being bound by the truce: and having done this, he turned to the City; where, vaunting what he had wrought by his craft, he was commended, and (though some reproved it as dishonest) employed again by the Senate, with commission to deal as he should think expedient. Touching the Embassadors which Perseus had sent; audience was given to them, for that they should not plainly see how their Master was deluded; but neither excuse nor intreaty would serve their turn: the Senate being resolved before-hand what to do. It was enough that they were admitted into the City, and had thirty days respite allowed them to depart out of Italy: whereas they, who came late on the same errand, did their message without the Walls, in the Temple of Bellona (the usual place of giving audience to open Enemies, or to such Commanders as might not, by reason of some custom alter the City) and had only the short warning of eleven days, to be gone out of Italy. Neither did this poor courtesie serve alone to hide the craft of Martius, as if he had meant none other than good earnest: but it was a likely mean both to keep a long while from Perseus the knowledge of his business, and to stagger his resolution, when he should need it most firm.

And accordingly it fell out. For Licinius the Roman Consul was at Apollonia, in a manner as soon as the Macedonian Embassadors were with their King at Pella. Which though it were enough to have roused Perseus, and have made him lay aside all cowardly hope of getting Pardon, yet was he content to deliberate a while. Whether it were not better to offer himself tributary to the Romans, and to redeem their good will with some part of his Kingdom, that so he might enjoy the rest; than to put all at once to hazard. But finally, the stoutest counsel prevailed; which also was the wisest, and so would have proved, had it been stoutly and wisely followed. He now began, as if the War had not begun until now, to do what should have been done long afore. He caused all his Forces to be drawn together; and appointed their Rendezvous at Citium, a Town in Macedon. All being in readiness, he did Royal Sacrifice, with an hundred Beasts, to I know not what Minerva, that was peculiarly honoured in his Country: and then with all his Courtiers, and those of his Guard, set forward to Citium. His Army he found consisting of nine and thirty thousand foot, and four thousand horse; whereof about twelve thousand foot, and a thousand horse were strangers, of sundry Nations, most part Thracians; the rest of his own Macedonians. These he animated with lively speeches; laying before them the glory of their Ancestors, the insolency of the Romans, the goodness of his Cause, the greatness of his Provisions, and the many advantages which they had of the Enemy, especially in numbers. They answered him cheerfully, with loud acclamations, and bade him be of good courage. From all Cities of Macedon there came likewise Messengers, offering to help him with money and victuals, according to their several Abilities. He gave them thanks: but answered, That his own provisions would abundantly suffice, willing them only to furnish him with Carts, for his Engines and Munition.

Out of his own Kingdom he issued forth into Thessaly: knowing that the Romans were to pass thorow that Country, in their Journey towards him. Some Towns of Thessaly opened their Gates unto him, without making offer to defend themselves; some he balked, thinking them too strong or well-manned; and some he won by force. Of these last was Nylle; a Town thought impregnable, and therefore, not more stoutly than proudly defended by the Inhabitants; who gave contemptuous language to the Assaultants. It was taken by reason of a fall; which the Towns-men rashly made, and being driven back, received the Macedonians, that entered pell mell with them at the gate. All cruelty of War was practised here: to the greater terror of the obstinate. Soletie and Connum (Towns of much importance, especially Connum, which stood in the Straights of Offa, leading into Tempe) yielded at the first. Having well fortified this passage, the King marched onwards to Sicurius, a Town seated on the foot of Mount Offa; where he rested a while, expecting news of the Enemy.

Licinius the Consul brought with him only two Roman Legions: being promised other strength of Auxiliaries, which was thought sufficient. Emmenes and Attalus his brother came to him in Theffaly, with four thousand foot, and a thousand Horse. Thither also came, from every part of Greece, such aid as the several Estates could afford, or thought expedient to send: which from the most of them was very little. Of the Kings abroad; Masaniissa sent thither his Son Antigonus, with a thousand Foot, as many Horse, and two and twenty Elephants. Ariarathes the Cappadocian, by reason of his Affinity with Emmenes, was friend to the Romans; and had sent to Rome his young Son, there to be brought up: yet he did little or nothing in this war; perhaps because Emmenes himself began within a while, but when it was too late, to be otherwise advised than he had been in the beginning. Prusias was content to be a looker on: as being allied to Perseus, and yet fearing the Romans. Antiochus and Pholomy (though Pholomy was then young, and under Tutors) had business of their own; the Syrian meaning to invade the Egyptian: yet each of them promised help to the Romans, which they cared not to perform. Gentius the Illyrian was inclinable to the Macedonian, yet made good countenance to the Romans, for fear. It was a pretty trick wherewith Al. Lucretius, the Roman Admirals Brother, served him, for this his counterfeit good will. This King had four and fifty Ships, riding in the Haven of Dyrachium, uncertain to what purpose: all which Lucretius took away, after a very kind sort; making them to believe, That for none other end than to serve the Romans, their good friend Gentius had sent thither this Fleet. But whatsoever Gentius thought in the beginning; he foolishly lost both his Kingdom and himself, in the end of this War; by offering, rather than giving his help to Perseus.

With none other company than what he brought over the Sea, Licinius came into Theffaly: so tyred with a painful journey, through the Mountainous Country of Albania, which stood in his way from Epirus; that if Perseus had been ready, attending his descent into the Plains, the Romans must needs have taken a great overthrow. He refreshed himself and his wearied Army, by the River Peneus; where he encamped, attending his Auxiliaries, that came in as fast as they could. It was not any slender help, that could enable him to deal with Perseus. Therefore he resolved to abide where he then was, and keep his trenches, until his numbers were sufficiently increased: contenting himself in the mean while, to have gotten quiet entrance into the Country. The Land of Theffaly, in which these two Armies lay, was better affected to the Romans, than any part of Greece besides: as having been freed by them from a more heavy yoke of bondage to the Macedonian, when there was little hope of expectation of such a benefit. It was generally rich, fruitful, and abounding in all things needful to mans life. In the middle of it, but somewhat more to the East, was that beautiful Valley of Tempe, so exceedingly full of all delights, that the name was often used at large to signify the most pleasant and goodly places. This Valley of itself was not great; but adding to it those huge Mountains Offa and Olympus (famous in Poetic) with their Spurs or Branches, by which it was on all sides enclosed; it occupied the better part of Theffaly. And this way were the Romans to enter into Macedonia; unless they would make an hungry journey thorow the Country of the Desartians, as in the former war with Philip, they had long, in vain, attempted to do. Perseus therefore had no small advantage, by being Master of the Straights leading unto Tempe: though far greater he might have had, if by mis-spending of time he had not lost it. For if in defending the ragged passages of these Mountains, he were able to put the Romans often to the worse; yea, to win upon them (for a while) every year more than other, both in strength and reputation: questionless he might have done far greater things, had he seized upon the Straights of Dous, which his Father once kept, and defended all the Country behind the Mountains of Pindus. Surely

Surely, not without extreme difficulty, must the Romans have either travelled by Land, with all their Carriages and Impediments, through places wherein was no relief to be found; or else have committed their Armies, and all things thereto needful, unto the mercy of Seas that were very dangerous; if they would have sought other way into Macedonia, than through the heart of Greece: upon neither of which courses they once devised, notwithstanding any trouble which they found in this present War. It may perhaps be said, that the Greeks, and others, whom the King must have left on his back, would have made him unable to defend any places too far from his own home. But they were all, excepting the Theffalians, better affected now to him, than they had been to his Father in the former War. The Atolians, upon whom the Albanians depended, grew into suspicion with the Romans (as we shall find anon) even as soon as they met with Perseus. The Boetians, how politically Marius had wrought with them, adventured themselves desperately in the Macedonian quarrel: what would they have done, if he at first had done his best? The Rhodians, Illyrians, yea, and Emmenes himself, after a while began to waver, when they saw things go better with Perseus, than they had expected. So that if instead of discouraging his Friends, by suing basely for peace, he had raised their hopes, by any brave performance in the beginning; and increased the number of his well-willers; yea, and bought down with money (as he might have done) some of his enemies, and among them Emmenes, who offered for good recompence, to forget his broken head: then might the Romans perhaps have been compelled to forsake their imperious patronage over Greece; and to render the Liberty by them given, entire; which otherwise was but imaginary. Such benefit of this War, since it was hoped for afterwards, might with greater reason have been expected at first, from greater advantages. But as a fearful company running from their Enemies, till some River stay their flight; are there compelled by meer desperation to do such acts, as done, while the battle lasted, would have won the Victory: so fell it out with Perseus. In seeking to avoid the danger of that War, whereof he should have sought the honour; he left his friends that would have stood by him, and gave them cause to provide for their own safety: yet being overtaken by necessity, he chose rather to set his back to the Mountains of Tempe, and defend himself with his proper forces; than to be driven into such misery, as was inevitable, if he gave a little further ground. What was performed by him or the Romans, all the while that he kept his footing in Theffaly, it is hard to shew particularly, for that the History of those things is much perished. Wherefore we must be contented with the sum.

The Consul having no desire to fight, until such time as all his forces were arrived; kept within his Trenches, and lay still encamped by the River of Peneus, about three miles from Larissa. That which persuaded the Consul to protract the time, did contrawise incite the King, to put the matter unto a hasty trial. Wherefore he invited the Romans into the field; by waisting the Land of the Phereans their Confederates. Finding them patient of this indignity; he grew bold to adventure even unto their Trenches: out of which, if they issued, it was likely that his advantage in Horse would make the Victory his own. At his coming they were troubled; for that it was sudden: yet no way terrified; as knowing themselves to be safely lodged. They sent out a few of King Emmenes his Horse, and with them some light armed foot, to entertain skirmish. The Captain, and some other of these were slain: but no matter of importance done; for that neither Licinius nor Emmenes, found it reasonable to hazard battle. Thus, day after day, a while together, Perseus continued offering battle: which they still refused. Hereby his boldness much increased; and much more his reputation: to the grief of those, who being so far come to make a Conquest, could ill digest the shame that fell upon them by their enduring these bravadoes. The Town of Sycyrium, where Perseus then lay, was twelve miles from the Romans: neither was there any convenient watering in that long march, which used to take up four hours of the morning, but he was fain to bring water along with him in Carts, that his men might not be both weary and thirsty when they came to fight. For remedy of these inconveniences, he found out a lodging seven miles nearer to the enemy: whom he visited the next day by the Sun-rising. His coming at such an unusual hour, filled the Camp with Tumult: inasmuch as though he brought with him only his Horse and light Armature, that were unfit to assail the Trenches, yet the Consul thought it necessary, and resolved to give check to his pride. Wherefore he sent forth his Brother C. Licinius, King Emmenes, Attalus, and many brave Captains, with all his power of Horse, his Velites, and all the rest of his light Armature to try their fortune: he himself remaining in the Camp, with

with his Legions in readines. The honour of this morning, was the Macedonian Kings; for he obtained the Victory in a manner intire (though the Thessalians made a good reitrait) with little loss of his own. But he discovered his weakness ere night, by hearkening, as Princes commonly do, to counsel given by one of his own temper. For whereas the Romans were in great fear, lest he should assault their Camp; and to that purpose, upon the first news of his success, his Phalanx was brought unto him by the Captains, though unsest for: he nevertheless took it for sound advice, which indeed was timorous and base, To work warily, and moderate his victory; by which means it was said, That either he should get honest conditions of Peace, or at leastwise many Companions of his fortune. Certainly it was like that his good fortune would exalt the Hope and Courage of his Friends. Yet, had it been greater, and had he won the Roman Camp, his friends would have been the more, and the bolder. But over-great was his folly, in hoping then for peace: And in suing for it, even when he had the victory; what else did he, than proclaim unto all which would become his partakers, That neither good nor bad fortune should keep him from yielding to the Romans, whenever they would be pleased to accept him? At this time the joy of his victory would admit none of the Considerations. He had slain of the Roman Horse two hundred, and taken of them prisoners the like number. Of their foot he had slain about two thousand: losing of his own no more than twenty Horse, and forty foot. The Roman Camp, after this disaster, was full of heaviness and fear: it being much doubted that the enemy would set upon it. Emenes gave counsel to dilodge by night, and remove to a surer place beyond the River Peneus. The Consul, though ashamed to profess, by so doing, in what fear he stood; yet thought it better to acknowledge the Loss past, than by standing on proud terms, to draw upon himself a greater Calamity. So he passed the River in the dead of the night, and encamped more strongly on the further side. The Atolians were sorely blamed for this loss: as if rather a traiterous meaning, than any true fear, had occasioned their flight, wherein the rest of the Greeks followed them. Five of them that were men of especial mark, had been observed to be the first which turned their backs: an observation likely to cost them dear, at a time of better leisure. As for the Thessalians, their virtue was honoured with reward: so as the Greeks might learn by Examples of either kind, that if they would shun indignation, or incur favour, then must they adventure no less for their Lords the Romans, than gladly they would do for their own Liberty. Thus fared it with the Consul and his Army. Perseus came the next day to correct the former days error: which how great it was, he not until then found. The Romans were gotten into a place of safety, whither they could never have attained, if the King had either pressed his Victory, or given better heed to them that night: his light Armature alone being sufficient to have routed them: whilst they were conveying themselves to the other side of Peneus. But it was vain to tell what might have been done, since there was no remedy. The Romans were beaten, even the flower of their City, The Gentlemen of Rome; out of whom were chosen their Senators, and consequently the Generals themselves, Praetors, Consuls, and all that bore Office or Command among them: yea, they were beaten so shamefully, that they stole away by night, and suffered him to gather up the spoils of them without resistance, as yielding themselves overcome. With such brave words did the King set out the Glory of his Action; dividing the spoils among his Followers. But there was much wanting within him, to have made his honour found. He came nearer to the Romans, and encamped at Mopselus, a place in a mid-way between Tempe and Larissa: as if it were his meaning to press them somewhat harder. Nevertheless he was easily persuaded to use the occasion, which he seemed to have, of obtaining peace. Therefore he sent unto the Consul, and offered to yield unto the same Conditions, wherein his Father had been bound to the Romans; if the War might be taken end. It were needless here again to shew the folly of this his course. Towards the accomplishment of this desired Peace, there was in the Consul no greater power than to grant a Truce, whilst Embassadors might go to Rome: it resting in the Senate and People to approve the conditions, & ratify the League. And of such a truce granted by Martius, he had lately found small commodity redounding. But Licinius dealt plainly, and returned answer, That other hope of peace there was none; save that Perseus would yield both his Kingdom and Person, simply and absolutely, to discretion of the Senate. A manly part it was of Licinius to be so resolute in Adversity. On the other side, it argued a very faint heart in Perseus, that having receiv'd an answer so exemplary

he still persisted, making vain offers of greater tribute. Finding that the peace which he so much desired, could not be purchased with money, the King withdrew himself back to Sycynum. There he lay hearkening what the Enemy did; whose forces were well repaired by the coming of Misagetus the Son of Masaniassa, with the aid before mentioned. This distance between the King and the Consul, the Romans to wax the more bold in making their harvest: about which business they ranged over all the fields. Their careless demeanour gave him hope to do some notable exploit: which he attempted, both upon their Camp, and upon those that were abroad. The Camp he thought to have fired on the sudden: but the alarm being taken in good season, he failed in the enterprise. As for the foragers; he had a good hand upon them, if he could have withdrawn it, and given over in time. But whilst he strove to force a guard, he was visited by the Consul, by whom either in a skirmish of horse, or (for the report is divers) in a great battle, he was overcome. This misadventure, whether great or small, caused Perseus, after a few days, to fall back into Macedon; as being naturally given to fear danger, even where none was; whereby what loss he felt, will appear hereafter. He left all behind him, save only Tempe, weakly guarded: and consequently an easy prey to the Romans.

After the Kings departure, Licinius went straight unto Connu; hoping to have taken it, and so to have gotten entrance into Tempe. But finding the work too hard, he returned back unto the Perrabians and others; from whom he won some Towns, and among the rest, Larissa. There were sundry Towns thereabout, bearing the same name of Larissa: so that this which the Consul took, may seem not to have belonged unto the Thessalians; unless, perhaps, after his victory, Perseus did greater acts than we find recorded, and got some part of Thessaly.

Of matters happening in Greece at this time, it is hard to give a precise account; for that the Histories of them are greatly defective. One may think it strange, that the Boeotians, whom a Roman Embassador could terrify, and bring altogether to his own will, should not be afraid of a Roman Army, then on foot in Greece, and a Navy on their coast. But more strange it is, that the Thebans, from whom their dependants were taken by the Art of Martius, were more true to Rome, than other petty Towns, which by that same distraction of the Boeotians, became within themselves more absolute, than formerly they had been. The causes thereof were to have been sought among the changes happening in their variable factions: whereof the knowledge is now lost. Some of them rebelled, and were thoroughly punished by Lucretius the Roman Admiral: who got so much by spoiling them, that he would have brought others to rebel like sort, if by extreme oppression he could have driven them so far. Neither was Licinius the Consul undiligent in the same kind. What his doings were, after such time as he was at leisure from Perseus, I find no where mentioned. Only this is said in general; That in the War which he made, he cruelly and covertously demeaned himself.

After the same fashion dealt they, that commanded in the year following; Hosilius the Consul, and Hortensius the Admiral, or Praetor of the Fleet. Hosilius showed more of his industry, in picking quarrels with the Confederates of Rome, than in prosecuting the War against the Macedonian. For concerning the Roman War upon his Kingdom, after that the Consul had sought passage in vain over certain mountains, Perseus seemed, in a manner, free from it. He was troubled indeed on that side which looked towards Illyria, by Ap. Claudius, whom the Consul sent thither with an Army of four thousand, and who, by levies made upon the Confederates, doubled this his Army. But Claudius thinking to have taken Usciana, a border town of Illyria, by Treason; came thither in such careless order, that the inhabitants which had made shew of Treason, with purpose only to train him into danger; sallied forth upon him, overthrew him, and chased him so far, that hardly he escaped with the fourth part of his company. Yet this Town of Usciana, shortly after became Roman: which howsoever it happened, Perseus very soon recovered it, and many other places therewithall: Colya a Thracian King, securing him on the one side of Macedon; and Cephalus an Epirot, revolted from the Romans, on the other. Perseus likewise made a painful journey into Ætolia; where he was promised to be admitted into Stratus, that was the strongest City in that Region. Of this hope though he were disappointed by those of the Romans faction, yet in his return home, he took in Aperantia; and shortly heard good news, that Ap. Claudius was again thoroughly beaten by Cleus, one of his Lieutenants. Such success had the Macedonian War under Hosilius. The same Consul offended much the Greeks, by the strict inquisition which his Embassadors made into mens affection towards Rome. For these Embassadors travelling thorow all the Cities of Peloponnesus, gave out speeches tending to shew, That they liked no better of those who fought not by might, and main to advance their business, than of those which were of the Macedonian faction. Their meaning was, to have accused by name, in the Parliament of Achaia, Lycoris that worthy Commander, who nobly followed the steps of Philippe; and together with him, his son Polibius, who soon after was General, of the Achaean Horse; but more notable by that excellent History which he wrote, than by his great employments, which he well and happily discharged. The sum of the accusation should have been; That these were not hearty friends unto the Romans, but such as abstained from raising troubles, more for lack of opportunity, than for any love to the common quiet. But since no colour of truth could be found, that might give countenance to such a tale; it was thought better for the present, to let it alone, and give gentle words, as if all were well. In like manner dealt they among the Etolians. They demanded hostages; and found some in the Council that approved the motion; as also among the Acarnanians, there were that intreated to have Roman Garrisons bestowed in their Towns. But neither the one nor the other of these propositions took effect. They of the Roman faction, accused not only such as were inclinable to the Macedonian, but also the good Patriots; making it no less than a matter of treason, to be a Grecian in Greece. On the contrary side, there wanted not some, who roundly told these pick-thanks of their base flattery, rating them openly in such sort, that one of them hardly escaped being stoned, even in the presence of the Embassadors. Thus was all full of accusations, and excuses: among which the Embassadors carried themselves, as men that could believe none ill: though it were well enough known what they thought. The best was, that an order from the Senate was brought into Greece, and published to this effect: That it should be free for all men, to refuse obedi-

enceto any Roman Magistrate, imposing any burden for the present war, unless it were such, as the Senate had likewise thought meet. Of this Decree the whole Country was glad: for it was, on seemed, a good remedy of many inconveniences. But they that standing on privilege hereof, refused to fulfill every commendment, were punished among the Patrices; which in the end of this war proved little better, if not worse, than to have been Traitors. The Senate was driven to set down this order, by reason of many and vehement complaints brought to Rome, concerning the wrongs done by Roman Magistrates, and especially by the Admirals, Lucius, and Hestius. Lucius was condemned in a great sum of money, for the wrongs by him done; highly to his commendation of the Romans, in that they loved not to have their subjects oppressed. Hestius being still in office, had waiting to amend.

Among the great number of Embassages that came to Rome about this time, either to seek redress of injuries, or to offer their services: it is not worthy that from Labunda, a Town of the lesser Asia, there was presented unto the Senate, and well accepted, a most base piece of flattery. These Admirals brought three hundred horsemen, weapons, and a crown of gold, to bestow upon Jupiter in the Capitol. But having a desire to gratify the Romans with some exquisite token of their dutiful obedience, wherein they would be singular, and being notable to reach unto any great performance; they built a Temple, unto the Town Rome; and appointed anniversary games to be celebrated among them, in honour of that goddess. Now who can wonder at the arrogant folly of Alexander, Antigonus, Ptolemy, and the like vain men, that would be thought gods; or at the shamefull flattery of such as bestowed upon men, and not the most virtuous of men, divine honours; when he sees a Town of houses, wherein powerfull men dwell, worshipped as a Goddess; and receiving (without scorn of the Gods, or shame of the Present) the title of Deity, at the gift of such a rascall City as Labunda?

Q. Martius the Roman Consul, with extreme difficulty and danger, enters into Tempe. The cowardice of Perseus in abandoning Tempe. The Town of Dium quitted by Martius; repaired and fortified by the King. The Romans attempt many places, with ill success. Their affairs in hard estate. Martius a cunning and a bad man. Polybius sent Embassador to Martius from the Achaeans. Polybius his honest wisdom beneficial to the Achaeans. King Eumenes grows averse from the Romans. Perseus negotiates with Antiochus, and Eumenes. His false dealing with Gentius King of Illyria; whom he draws into the Roman war. He sends Embassadors to the Rhodians; who vainly take upon them to be arbitrators between him and the Romans. Perseus leaveth a mighty succour of the Bactrians, by his wretched parsimony.

AFTER two years of the Macedonian war, things were further out of tune in Greece, than when the war began; which had been thought likely to reform all those Countreys, and bring them to what pass the Romans desired; as it did in the end. Perseus had hitherto the better, and was stronger now, than when he lived in peace. He had enlarged his borders on the Illyrian side; his friends, in all parts of Greece, took courage daily; and his reputation grew such, as caused those that were before wholly Roman, to suspect what the issue of the war might prove, and thereupon to become wife for themselves. Contrariwise, Licinius and Hostilius the Consuls, had one after the other spent their time in vain, seeking way into Macedon; and defaced the glorious enterprize of conquest, by many losses received. The Roman Admirals had so demeaned themselves, that many Towns even of the best effected to Rome, kept them out by force. Generally, the fear was great on the Roman side; and the Army much lessened, not only by casualties of war, but by the facility of the Tribunes or Colonels, or else of the Consul himself (for they laid the blame one upon the other) in licensing the Souldiers to depart. Quintus Martius the new Consul, who succeeded unto Hostilius, was to amend all this: which nevertheless was more than he knew how to do; though he brought with him a strong supply of men. He began hotly to set the war on foot, which along time had slept. And he began the right way: not seeking to force the straights that were rarely guarded, but taking pains to climb the mountains which were thought able to forbid all passage over them, without help or need of any custody. The King heard of this approach; and being uncertain what way he meant to take, distributed his own forces, to the defence of all places which might give entrance, or permit ascent. But the Consul proceeded in his journey: with hope, either not to be discovered by the Enemy, or to break through all opposition, or at leastwise, to fight on as convenient ground, as they should have that lay to stop him, and at length, if all failed, to make a safe retreat. He sent before him four thousand of his most expedite foot, to discover the wayes. Two daies was this company troubled, in overcoming the difficulty of no more than fifteen miles: after which they had sight of the Enemy, that lay to deny their passage. They occupied therefore a safe piece of ground; and sent back word to the Consul, where they were; intreating him to hasten unto them: which he did. The Macedonians were not a whit dismayed at his arrival; but met him, and fought with him, two or three daies together; each returning to their own Camp at night, with little loss on either side. This bickering was on the narrow ridge of a mountain, which gave scarcely room unto three to march in front. So that very few hands came to be employed: all the rest were beholders. In this case it was impossible to get forwards; yet a shame to return. Wherefore Martius took the only course remaining; and indeed the best: Part of his men he left with Popilius, to attend upon the Macedonians; whilst he, with the rest, fetcht a compass about, and sought out waies that never had been trodden. Herein he found extreme difficulty: which notwithstanding he overcame. Besides the troubles commonly incident to such journeys, through places unfit for habitation: he was compelled by labour of hand; to make paths where none were; yea, where Nature might seem to have intended, that none should be. So steep he found the descent of the mountains, in this way which he took: that of seven miles, which they travelled the first day, his men were compelled, for the more part to rowl themselves down; as not daring to trust their feet. Neither was this the worst. For they met with rocks, that stood one over another, so upright; and cumbersome to get down: that their Elephants were afraid of that giddy project, and calling their governours, made a terrible noise, which affrighted the horses, and bred great confusion. Having therefore gone, or wallowed, four miles of this grievous journey; there was nothing more desired by the souldiers, than that they might be suffered to creep back again, the same way which they had come. But shift was made to let down the Elephants, by a kind of bridges, like unto falling draw-bridges: whereof the one end was joynted to the edge of the cliff; the other sustained by two long posts, fastened in the ground below. Upon these two posts, or poles, (which indeed, not being very strong, since it was intended that they should be either cut or broken) were fastened two rafters, answerable in length to the distance, between the higher and the lower fall: so as the end of one bridge might reach to the beginning of another. These were covered with planks and turfe; that they might seem continent with the ground: so to make the beasts adventurous to go upon them. If there were a plain of any good extent from the foot of a rock, to the next downfall; then might the bridge be shorter. When an Elephant was gone a pretty way, upon one of these; the posts upholding the frame were cut asunder; thereby causing him to sink down unto the next bridge; whence he was conveyed in like manner, to the third, and onward still to the very bottom. Thus went they down sliding, some on their feet, others on their buttocks, till they came to an even valley. By this it appears, how thoroughly provided the Romans used to be in their journeys, of things needful in all occasions: as also what inestimable pains they took in this descent, about the conveyance of themselves and all their carriages down the mountains. The next day they rested; staying for Poptilus and his company, who hardly, or perhaps never, should have overtaken them, if the Enemy had followed, and set upon him from aloft. The third and fourth daies journeys were like unto the first: save that custome, and the nearness to their waies end without meeting enemy, caused them the better to endure the labour.

Perseus could not be ignorant of the Romans coming towards him: since they fought with his men upon the passage, three daies together; he lying so nigh, that he might well hear have heard the noise. Yet was he so possessed with fear; that he neither stirred to help his own men, or to hinder the Consul, nor made any provision for that which might fall out; but as one void of counsel, fate hearkening after the event. Four only passages there were, leading into Tempe: the first by Connus; which the Romans were unable to force: the second and third were the same which Martius had attempted in vain, and another like unto it, the last, by the City of Dium out of Macedon. All these were sufficiently guarded: and whosoever would seek any other way, must be fain to take such pains as Martius had undergone. The entrance by Dium was fairer than any of the rest: whereof only the King had benefit: for that his enemies could not get thither, save through the valley itself, into which they must first pierce another way. Dium stood upon the foot of the huge mountain Olympus, about a mile from the Sea: of which mile, the River Hellon becoming there a lake, and called Baephyras, took up the one half, the rest being (such as might easily have been fortified. Besides all these, there was in the midst of Tempe, a passage which ten men might easily keep: where the spurs of the mountains, reaching far into the valley; drew near to the very banks of Penem, a goodly and deep River which ran through it. Wherefore nothing had been more easie, than to make the Consul repent him of his troublesome journey: if Perseus could have seen his own advantages. For the Roman Army was not only in ill case to fight, after the vexation of that miserable travel: but must needs have either perished for want of victuals, or been enforced to return the same way that he came, if the King had made good the straight of Dium. To have returned, and clumbed up with their Elephants and carriages, against those rocks, from which, with extreme labour, they could hardly get down, it seems a matter of impossibility: especially considering how the enemy from above their heads, would have beaten upon them; being now aware of the path which they had taken, though he knew it not when they stole away from him. It may therefore be thought strange that the Romans did not rather take their journey into Macedon, from the side of Illyria, whence that Kingdom had often been invaded, as lying open on that part: than put themselves to the trouble of breaking into Tempe, whence, after that they were arrived, there was no means to escape, without forcing one of those passages, which they despaired to win. But the cowardize of Perseus did commend the counsel by them followed, as wise. For he no sooner heard that the Enemy was come over the Mountains into Tempe, than he feared like one out of his wits; saying, That he was vanquished, and had lost all, without battel. Herewithall he began to take out of Dium, what he could carry away away in haste; and straightwaies abandoned the Town. In the same vehemency of amazement, he sent a straight commandment to Thessalonica, that the Arsenal there should be set on fire; and to Pella, that his treasures there should be cast into the Sea: as if the Romans were like presently to be Masters of these two Cities. Niceas, who was appointed to drown the treasure, performed it as hastily as well he could: though soon after, his Master grew sorry for the loss; and it was all, in a manner, recovered by Divers from under the water. But Andronicus, who had charge to set fire on the Kings Arsenal, deferred the execution, foreseeing that repentance might follow: and so he prevented the damage. Whether Niceas, for his absolute and blind obedience, or Andronicus, for his careful providence, merited the greater commendation, or more easie pardon; it rested in the King to interpret. The reward of his service, was this, Perseus growing ashamed of his mad cowardize, that appeared in this hasty direction: caused them both to be slain. Also those poor men, which had fetched his treasure out of the Sea by their diving, were payed their wages after the same sort: that so there might be no witnesses of the Kings base folly. Such end must they fear, who are privy to dishonourable actions of great Princes. If Perseus would have gone surely to work, for the hiding of his fault; then must he so royally have behaved himself, that no man might believe him to be the Author of any unworthy act or counsel. But his virtue was of no such capacity. He thought it enough to lay the blame upon others. And therefore, having called Hippias away (the Captain which had stopped the Consul on the top of the Mountain) and Alepiodatus, from defence of the passages, whereto they were by him appointed: he rated them openly; saying, That they had betrayed unto the Enemy the gates and bars of Macedon. Of this reproach, if they would discharge themselves, by laying it upon him, to whom of right it belonged, then might they have sped as did Niceas and Andronicus.

The Consul Martius had great cause to rejoyce, for that the King had so hastily relinquished his possession of Tempe, and all the passages leading thereto: since the Roman Army, this notwithstanding, was hardly able to subsist for want of victuals. He took Dium without resistance, and thence went forward into Macedon: wherein having travelled about a daies journey, and gotten one Town that yielded, he was compelled by meer lack of food for his men, to return back towards Thessaly. His Fleet came to him, in this time of necessity, well appointed to have holpen him in the war: but having left behind, at Atynsfa, the ships of burthen, which carried the provisions. Wherefore it fell out happily, that one of his Lieutenants had been careful to occupy the Castles about Tempe, which were forsaken by the Macedonians: for by those waies only might Corn be brought into the Army. To meet the sooner with this Corn, which was most desirously expected, he forsook Dium, and went to Phila; by which foolish journey (if not worse than foolish) he lost more, than a little the longer fasting had been worth. It is probable that his Carts, with all, or the most of his store, were lost among the Mountains: for other wise it had been madnes to put himself on such an enterprise, so slenderly provided, as that without enforcement, or fight of the Enemy, he should be fain to quit it. Howsoever it was: men thought him a coward, or at least a bad man of war; since he thus recoyled and gave off, when it most behoved him to have prosecuted the action.

By understanding the folly, or cowardize of Martius; the King recollected himself, understood his own errors, sought to hide it by such poor means as have been shewed, and laboured to make what amends he could. He quickly reposted the Town of Dium, which he hastily repaired, finding it dismantled by the Romans. This done, he encamped strongly by the River of Enipeus; meaning there to stop the Enemies proceeding all that Summer. Less diligence, more timely used, would have been enough, not only to have delivered Martius into his hand, who had beguiled him with an idle hope of peace, but to have given him such a noble victory, as might cause the Romans to seek a good end of the war upon fair conditions, and not to begin again in haste. Yet this recovery and fortification of Dium, was to the Consul an exceeding hinderance. For little or nothing could afterward be done toward the Conquest in hand, in all the continuance of his office. Only the Town of Heraclea, standing on the River of Penem, five mile from Dium, was taken by force, or rather by a trick of climbing upon men's heads, somewhat after the manner of our tumblers. But it made such defence as it could, and was not given up for fear. After this, Martius did set a bold face towards Pemus; as if he would have taken it again, and have driven the King further off: though his intent or hope was nothing like so great: his chief care, care, being to provide for his wintering. He sent the Admiral to make attempt upon the Sea-Towns, Thessalonica, Cassandrea, Demetrias, and others. All these were assailed: but in vain. The fields about Thessalonica were wasted; and some companies, that sundry times adventured forth of the Town, were still put to the worse. As for the Town it self; there was danger in coming near it, either by Land or Sea; by reason of the engines, which shot from the walls, and reached unto the Fleet. Wherefore the Admiral setting sail from thence, ran along by Amia, and Antigonea, (standing near to each of them; and both doing and receiving hurt) until he came to Pallene in the territory of Cassandrea. There King Eumenes joyned with him, bringing twenty ships of War: and five other were sent thither from King Prosius. With this access of strength, the Admiral was bold to try his fortune at Cassandrea: which was bad. There was a new ditch lately cast by Perseus, before the Town: which, while the Romans were filling up, question was made, What became of the earth taken thence, for that it lay not upon the bank? By this occasion, it was learned, that there were Arches in the Town-wall filled up with that earth, and covered with one single row of brick. Hence the Admiral gathered hope of making way into the Town, by sapping the walls. To this work he appointed such as he thought meetest: giving an alarm to the other side of the Town, thereby to shadow his attempt. The breach was soon made. But whilst the Romans were shouting for joy, and ordering themselves for the assault: the Captains within the Town perceived what was done; and sallying forth unexpected, gave a fierce charge on the companies that were between the ditch and the walls of whom they slew about six hundred, and suffered few to escape unwounded. This did after, and the want of good success on that part of the Town which King Eumenes assailed (a supply in the mean while entering the Town by Sea) caused the siege to break up. Torone was the next place which the Admiral thought meet to attempt: and thence likewise he was repelled. Finding this too well manned; he made way towards Demetrias: whereinto Euphranor, a Macedonian Captain, was gotten before his coming, with such forces, as were not only sufficient to have defended the Town, if the Admiral had laid siege to it, but to keep the Land about it from spoil; or, at least (as they did) to make the enemy pay dear for all that he there got. This Euphranor had taken his journey to Demetrias, by Malibea; whither the Consul

(that he might not be quite without work) had sent his Lieutenant to besiege it: and by the terror of his appearing suddenly upon their heads, caused the besiegers to dislodge in all haste, setting their Camp on fire.

Such fortune attended on the Romans; or rather, so far was their ability short of their Enterprises; ever since their Consul (whether dastardly, or carelessly) most unlike a good Commander, had let go his hold of Macedon, by forsaking Diium: yea, it is to be suspected, that some greater harm befell them, or, at least, that they were in some greater danger, than is expressed in the broken remaining History of this war. For Martius periwaded the Rhodiens by Agapollis their Embassadour, who came to him at Heraclea about other business of less importance, That they should do well to interpose themselves as Mediators, and seek to finish the War. Now, although Polibius do most probably conjecture, that this was rather a malicious device of Martius, craftily seeking to bring the Rhodiens in danger (as anon it fell out) by their opposing the resolution of the Senate; than that it proceeded from any true fear in him, either of Perseus, or of Antiochus, who had then an Army on foot: yet since he made shew of fear, it is like withall, that somewhat had happened, which might make his fear seem not counterfeited. And so were the Rhodiens moved to think of him; not only for that the extraordinary courtesie, both of him and of the Admiral, towards their Embassadour, coming from proud natures, did argue diffidence, where there was no ambition to cause it; but much more, for that shortly after the Embassadours of Perseus, and of Gentius the Illyrian, did set out their business at Rhodes, not more with the strength of a good Fleet, which the Macedonians had gotten, than with the honour of some victory, where, in he had lately slain great numbers of the Roman horse. Thus much we find intimated; though the time, place, or other circumstances of the fight, be not specified. And hereto may be referred, the report of those that were sent from Rome to view the estate of Martius his Army. For they found the Consul wanting meat; the Admiral wanting men; and, for those few that he had, wanting both money and clothes: and App. Claudius the Prætor, who lay on the frontier of Illyria, so unable to invade Macedon, that contrariwise, he was in extremum danger, so as either he must quickly be sent for thence, or a new Army be sent thither to him. Wherefore it may seem, that some blow had been taken on the Illyrian side, which made all to halt; or at

at least that the Romans, with greater loss than is before spoken of, had been driven from some of the Towns which they besieged.

Now, although it were so, that Martius in very few of his actions, behaved himself like a man of war: yet in exercise of Cunning, which one hath most aptly termed, A crooked or sinister kind of wisdom, he dealt as a crafts-matter, with a restless working diligence. This indeed neither proved his sufficiency, nor commended his honesty; since thereby he effected nothing to his own benefit; and nevertheless out of envy, vain-glory, or such delight as weak and buff-headed men take, in creating inexplicable troubles, he directly made opposition to the good of his Country. At such time as Perseus, by the success of his doings against Hesilium, had gotten much reputation, and was thought likely to invade Thessaly. Archo, Lycortas, and other good Patriots among the Acheans, judged it expedient for their Nation to help the Romans, as in a time of adversity, whom in prosperity they loved not to flatter. Wherefore Archo proposed a decree, which passed: That the Acheans should send their whole power into Thessaly, and participate with the Romans in all dangers. So the Army was levied: and Polibius, with others, sent Embassadours unto Martius, to certify him thereof, and know his pleasure. Polibius found the Consul busy in finding passage thorow Tempe into Macedon. He went along with the Army, and awaited the Consul's leisure, till they came to Heraclea; where, finding the time convenient, he presented the Decree, and offered the service of his Nation, whereinsoever it should be commanded. Martius took this very kindly; but said, That he needed now no manner of help. Forthwith Polibius dispatched home his companions, to signify thus much: tarrying himself behind in the Camp. After a while, word was brought to Martius, that Ap. Claudius desired, or rather imperiously required, of the Acheans, five thousand men, to be sent him into Epirus. It was manifest, that Appius had need of these men; and that if he were strong in field, he might do notable service, by distracting the forces of Perseus. But the Labyrinthian head of Martius, could not allow of such plain reason. He called unto him Polibius, to whom he declared, That Appius had no need of such aid, and therefore would him to return home, and in any wise take order that the men might not be sent, nor the Acheans be put to such needless charges. Away went Polibius; musing, and unable to resolve, whether it were for love to the Acheans, that the Consul was so earnest in this business; or rather for envy, and to hinder Ap. Claudius from doing any thing, since himself could do nothing. But when Polibius was to deliver his opinion in the Council touching this matter; then found he a new doubt, that more nearly concerned his own self, and those of his party. For as he was fure to incur the great indignation of the Consul, if he should neglect what was given him in charge; so was it manifest on the other side, that the words by Martius uttered to him in private, would prove no good warrant for him and his friends, if openly they should refuse to help Claudius, alleging that he had no need. In this case therefore, he had recourse unto the Decree of the Senate: which exempted men from necessity of doing what the Roman Commanders should require, unless, by special order from the Senate, the same were likewise appointed. So for lack of warrant from the Senate, this demand of Appius was referred unto the advice of the Consul: by whom it was fure to be made frustrate. Hereby the Acheans were faveys, of more than an hundred and twenty Talents: though Polibius himself ran into danger of Appius his displeasure; and for such honest dealing in his Countries behalf, was afterwards rewarded by the Romans with many a long years imprisonment.

Whether it were by the like policy of Martius, that King Eumenes grew cold in his affection to the Romans; or whether this King began when it was too late, to stand in fear lest the fire, which he himself had helped to kindle, would shortly take hold on his own lodging; or whether the regard of money were able to overfway all other passions; it is hard to determine: since they that had better means to know the truth, have not precisely affirmed any certainty. One report is, That Eumenes did not so much as give any help to Martius: but coming to have joyned with him, in such friendly manner as he did with the former Consuls, was not entertained according to his liking; and thereupon returned home in such anger, that he refused to leave behind him certain horse of the Gallo Greeks, being requested to have done it. If this were true, and that his brother Attalus tarrying behind with the Consul, did the Romans good service: then is the reason apparent, of the hatred, born afterward by the Senate to Eumenes, and the love to Attalus. But it is more generally received; that Eumenes gave a willing ear to Perseus his desire of accord, for meer desire of gain.

And it might well be, that covetousness drew him on, in the course, where into indignation first led him. Howsoever it befell; Perseus caused Eumenes to be founded, and found him so tractable, that he was bold to solicit him by an Embassy. The tenour of his advertisements, both to Eumenes and Antiochus, was: That there could be no perfect love between a King and a free City; that the Romans had quarrel alike to all Kings, though they dealt with no more than one at a time, and used the help of one against another; that Philip was oppressed by them, with the help of Antiochus, with the help of Philip and Eumenes; and now Perseus assailed with help of Eumenes and Prusias. Herewith he willed Eumenes to consider, that when Macedon was taken out of their way, they would be doing with him in Asia, which lay next at hand; yea, that already they began to think better of Prusias, than of him. In like sort he admonished Antiochus, not to look for any good conclusion of his war with the Egyptians, so long as the Romans could make him give over, by denouncing their will and pleasure. Finally, he requested both of them, either to compell the Romans to surcease from their War upon Macedon; or else to hold them as common enemies unto all Kings. Antiochus lay far out of the Romans way: and therefore was little troubled with such remonstrances. Eumenes was more nearly toucht; and as he felt part of this to be true, so had he reason to stand in doubt of the rest. Yet when he should give answer, he began to offer a bargain of peace for money. He thought the Romans to be no less weary, than Perseus was afraid. Wherefore he promised for his own part, That if he might have fifteen hundred Talents for withdrawing his hand from this war, then would he remain a Neuter therein: and that for some greater quantity of money (how much I find not) he would also bring the Romans to condescend unto peace: and for assurance of his true meaning herein, he offered to give hostages. Perseus liked well to receive the hostages, but not to lay out the money; especially before hand, as was required. He would fain have peace with Rome; and not with Eumenes only. For procuring of this, he promised to be at any reasonable cost; but he would lay down the money in the Temple at Samothrace: whence it should be delivered unto Eumenes, after that the peace was fully concluded and ratified. The Isle of Samothrace was Perseus his own: and therefore Eumenes thought the money no nearer to him, being there, than if it remained in Pella. Besides, his labour deserved somewhat, howsoever the business might happen to succeed: so that needs he would have part of his wages in prest. Thus the two Kings did no more, than lose time; and Eumenes grew suspected of the Romans, as a Traitor.

After the same manner dealt Perseus with King Genetius the Illyrian. He had attempted this Illyrian before, who dealt plainly, and said, That without money he could not stir. Hereunto Perseus loved not to hearken, thinking, that his Treasures would serve at the last cast, to deliver him from all his fears. But when the Romans had gotten within Naup, then did his fear urge him to prodigality; so as he agreed to pay three hundred Talents, which Genetius demanded for a recompence. So the bargain was soon made, and pledges on both sides delivered for performance. This was openly done by Perseus, to the end that all his Army might have comfort, by such access of strength to their party. Presently upon the bargain made, Embassadors were sent to Rhodes, from both Perseus and Genetius: who desired the Rhodians, to take upon them, as Arbitrators, between Perseus and the Romans, and to bring the war to an end. The Rhodians thinking that Marius the Consul was no less desirous of peace than the Macedonian, arrogantly promised, that they, by their authority, would make peace; wishing the Kings to shew themselves conformable. But the Roman Senate, hearing proud words to the same effect, from the Rhodian Embassadors, gave an answer as disdainful, angry, and menacing, as they could devise: so as this vain glory of the Rhodians was thoroughly chastised; and more thoroughly should have been, if their submission had not been as humble, as their folly was proud. Such use of Genetius his friendship, made Perseus, without laying out one ounce of silver. Now fain he would have hastened this young and rash Illyrian to enter with all speed into the War: but then must the money be hastened away. Pantarchus the Macedonian Embassador, who remained with Genetius, exhorted him daily to begin the War by Land and Sea, whilst the Romans were unprovided. But finding what it was that made all to stay; he sent word to Perseus. Hereupon ten Talents were sent to Pantarchus, who delivered it to the young King, as Earnest of that which followed. More followed indeed; and sealed up with the seal of the Illyrians, but carried by Macedonians, and not too fast. Before this money came into Illyria, Genetius had laid hands upon two Roman Embassadors, and cast them into prison. Which

Which Perseus no sooner heard, than he recalled his Treasure-bearers, and sent them with their load to Pella; for that now the Illyrian was of necessity to make war with the Romans, whether he were hired thereto or not.

There came about the same time through Illyria, to the aid of Perseus, under one Clondicus, a petty King, ten thousand horse, and ten thousand foot of the Gauls, which were (as Plutarch hath it) the Bastarnæ. These had before-hand made their bargain, and were to receive present pay at the first. At their entry into the Kingdom, Perseus sent one to them; desiring their Captains to come visit him, whom he promised to gratify with goodly rewards; hoping that the multitude would take good words for payment. But the first question that their General asked, was, Whether the King had sent money to give their Souldiers their pay in hand, according to his bargain? Hereto the messenger had not what to answer. Why then (said Clondicus) tell thy Master, that the Gauls will not stir one foot further, until they have gold, as was agreed, and hostages. Perseus hereupon took counsel: if to utter his own opinion before men so wise that they would not contradict him, were to take counsel. He made an invective against the incivility and avarice of the Bastarnæ: who came with such numbers, as could not but be dangerous to him and to his Kingdom. Five thousand horse of them he said would be as many as he should need to use; and not so many, that he should need to fear them. It had been well done, if any of his Counsellors would have told him, That there wanted not employment for the whole Army of them, since without any danger to the Kingdom, they might be let out, by the way of Ferracia, into Thessaly: where, wasting the Country, and filling themselves with spoil, they should make the Romans glad to forsake Thessaly, even for hunger and all manner of want; therein doing the King notable service, whether they won any victory or not. This, and a great deal more, might have been alledged, if any man had dared to give advice freely. In conclusion, Antigonus, the same messenger that had been with them before, was sent again, to let them know the Kings mind. He did his errand: upon which followed a great murmur of those many thousands that had been drawn so far to no purpose. But Clondicus asked him now again, Whether he had brought the money along with him to pay those five thousand, whom the King would entertain. Hereto when it was perceived that Antigonus could make no better answer, than shifting excuses, the Bastarnæ returned presently towards Danubius, wasting the neighbour-parts of Thrace; yet (suffering this crafty messenger to escape unhurt: which was more than he could have well expected).

Thus dealt Perseus, like a careful Treasurer, and one that would preserve his money for the Romans, without diminishing the sum. But of this painful Office he was very soon discharged by L. Emilius Paulus the new Consul: who in fifteen daies after his setting forth from Italy, brought the Kingdom of Macedon to that end, for which God had appointed over it a King so foolish and so cowardly.

§. VIII.

Of L. Emilius Paulus the Consul. His journey. He foreseeth Perseus to discom. He will not hazard battel with any disadvantage. Of an Eclipse of the Moon. Emilius his superstition. The battel of Pydna. Perseus his flight. He forsakes his Kingdom: which hastily yields to Emilius. Perseus at Samothrace. He yields himself to the Roman Admiral, and is sent prisoner to Emilius.

BY the War of Macedon, the Romans hitherto had gotten much dishonour. Which, though it were not accompanied with any danger, yet the indignity of moved them, that either * they decreed that Province to L. Emilius Paulus, without putting it, as was otherwise his manner, to the chance of lot, between him and his fellow-Consul; or at least were gladder that the lot had cast it upon him, than that so worthy a man was advanced to the dignity of a second Consulship. He refused to propound unto the Senate any thing that concerned his Province; until by Embassadors, thither sent to view the estate of the War, it was perfectly understood, in what condition both the Roman Forces, and the Macedonian, at the present remained. This being thoroughly known to be such, as hath been already told, the Senate appointed a strong supply, not only to the Consul, but unto the Navy, and likewise to the Army that lay between Illyria and Epirus; from which App. Claudius was removed, and L. Anicius sent thither in his place. Emilius, before his departure from Rome, making an Oration to the people, as was the custom, spake with much gravity and authority. He requested those that thought themselves wise enough to manage this War, either to accompany him into Macedon, and there assist him in their advice; or else to govern their tongues at home, and not take upon them to give directions by hearsay, and censure by idle reports: for he told them plainly, that he would frame his doings to occasion: not to the expectation of the multitude. The like speech of his Father L. Emilius, who died valiantly in the battle of Canne, might well be living in some of their memories; which was enough to make them conform themselves the more gladly unto the instructions given by a wife and resolute Consul.

All his business within the City being dispatched, Emilius was honourably attended, at his setting forth on his journey, with an especial hope of men, that he should finish the war: though that he should finish it so soon and happily, was more than could have been hoped or imagined. He came to Brundisium: whence, when the wind came fair, he set sail at break of day, and arrived safely at the Isle of Coreyra before night. Thence passed he to Delphi: where having done sacrifice to Apollo, after the fifth day he set forwards to the Camp, and was there in five days more. So are there but five of the fifteen days remaining, in which he finished the War.

Perseus lay strongly encamped at Dium: having spared no labour of men and of women to fortify the banks of Enipeus, where it was soordable in dry weather: so as there was little hope or none, to force him; and consequently, as little possibility to enter that way into Macedon. One great inconvenience troubling the Romans, and much disabling them to make attempt upon Dium, was lack of fresh water. For there were ten miles between Dium and Tempe; all the way lying between the Seashore and the foot of Olympus, without any Brook or Spring breaking forth on that side. But Emilius found present remedy for this, by digging Wells on the shores; where he found sweet Springs: as commonly there is no shore that wants them, though they rise not above the ground. Want of this knowledge was enough to hinder Martinus from taking up his lodging any nearer to the Enemy, than the Town of Heraclæa, on the River of Peneus; where he had watering at pleasure, but could perform no service of any worth. Yet when the Roman Camp had such means to lye close to the Macedonian, as it presently did, the passage onward being defended as hath been shewed, seemed no less difficult than before. Wherefore it was necessary to search another way: which by enquiry was soon found out. There was a narrow passage over Olympus, leading into Perræbia; hard of ascent, but slenderly guarded, and therefore promising a fair journey. Martinus either had not been informed hereof, or durst not attempt it; or perhaps could not get his Souldiers to make the adventure; they fearing lest it would prove such a piece of work as had been their march over Ossa into Tempe. But Paulus was a man of greater industry, courage, and ability to command. He had reformed, even at his first coming, many disorders in the Roman Camp: teaching the souldiers among other good lessons, to be obedient and ready in execution; without troubling themselves, as had been their manner, to examine the doings and purposes of their General. And now he appointed about five thousand men to this enterprise; whereof he committed the charge unto Scipio Emilianus and Q. Fabius Maximus, his own Sons by nature; but adopted, the one of them, by a Son of Scipio the African, the other, by one of the Fabii. Scipio took with him some light-armed Thracians and Cretians; but his main strength was of Legionaries. For the Kings guard, upon the mountain, consisted in a manner, wholly of Archers and Slingers; who though, at some distance they might do notable service against those that should climb up unto them; yet when the darkness took away their aim, they were like to make a bad nights work, being to deal with those that were armed to fight at hand. To conceal the business about which they went, Scipio and Fabius took a wrong way towards the Fleet: where victuals were provided for their journey: it being noised, that they were to run along the coasts of Macedon by sea, and waste the Country. All the way they were passing the mountains (which was about three days) the Consul made shew of a meaning to set upon Perseus where he lay, rather to divert the Kings attention from that which was his main Enterprise, than upon any hope to do good, in seeking to get over Enipeus. The channel of Enipeus, which received in Winter time a great fall of waters from the mountains, was exceeding deep and broad; and the ground of it was such, as though at the present it lay well-near all dry, yet it served not for those that were weightily armed to fight upon. Wherefore Emilius employed none save his Velites; of whom the Kings light armature had advantage at far distance, though the Romans were better appointed for the close. The Engines from off the Towers which Perseus had raised on his own bank, did also beat upon the Romans, and gave them to understand, that their labour was in vain.

Yet

Yet Emilius persisted as he had begun: and notably well fortified: they desired nothing more, than to give battle immediately: the second day. This might have served to teach the Macedonians, that some greater work was in hand: since otherwise a good Captain, as Emilius was known to be, would not have troubled himself with making such bravado's, that were somewhat costly. But Perseus lookt only unto that which was before his eyes: until his men, that came running fearfully down the Mountain, brought word into the Camp, that the Romans were following at their backs. Then was all full of tumult, and the King himself no less (if not more) amazed than any of the rest. Order was forthwith given to dislodge: or rather without order, in all tumultuous haste, the Camp was broken up, and speedily retreat made to Pydna. Whether it were so, that they which had the custody of the passage were taken sleeping, or whether they were beaten by plain force, Scipio and Fabius had very good success in their journey. It may well be, that they slept until the Romans came somewhat near to them; and then taking alarm, when their arrows and slings could do little service, were beaten at hand-strokes: so as the different relations that are cited by Plutarch out of Polybius, and an Epistle of Scipio, may each of them have been true. Thus was an open way cleared into Macedon: which had been effected by Martinus in the year foregoing; but was closed up again through his not prosecuting so rich opportunity.

Perseus was in an extremum doubt what course to take, after this unhappy beginning. Some gave advice to man his Towns, and so to linger out the War: having been taught by the last years example, how resolute the people were in making defence. But far worse counsel prevailed: as generally it doth in turbulent and fearful deliberations. The King resolved to put all at once to hazard of battle: fearing belike to put himself into any one Town, lest that should be first of all besieged; and he therein (as cowardly natures always are jealous) not over-carefully relieved. This was even that fame that Emilius, or any invader, should have desired. So a place was chosen near unto Pydna, that served well for the Phalanx, and had likewise on the sides of it some pieces of higher ground, fit for the Archers and light armature. There he abode the coming of the enemy; who stayed not long behind him. As soon as the Romans had sight of the Kings Army; which with greater fear than discretion, had halted away from them, forsaking the Camp that was to more, than to give battle immediately: doubting lest otherwise the King should change his mind, and get further off. And to this effect Scipio brake with the Consul; praying him not to lose occasion by delay. But Emilius told him, that he spoke like a young man; and therefore willed him to have patience. The Romans were tired with their journey; had no Camp wherein to rest themselves; nor any thing there, save on the bare ground whereon they trod. For these, and the like respects, the Consul made a stand: and shewing himself unto the Macedonian, who did the like, in order of battle, gave charge to have the Camp measured out and entrenched behind the Army; whereinto, at good leisure, he fell back, without any manner of trouble. After a nights rest, it was hoped both by the Romans and the Macedonians, that the matter should be determined; each part thinking their own General too blame, for that they had not fought the same day. As for the King, he excused himself by the backwardness of the enemy, who advanced no further; but kept upon ground serving ill for the Phalanx: as on the other side, the Consul had the reasons before shewed, which he communicated to those about him the next day.

That evening (which followed the third of September, by the Roman account) C. Sulpitius Gallus, a Colonel, or Tribune of a Legion, who had the former year been Praetor, foretold unto the Consul, and (with his good liking) unto the Army, an Eclipse of the Moon, which was to be the same night: willing the Souldiers not to be troubled therewith, for that it was natural, and might be known long before it was seen. It was the manner of the Romans, in such Eclipses to beat Pans of Brass, and Basons, as we do in following a swarm of Bees; thinking that thereby they did the Moon great ease, and helped her in her labour. But this prognostication of Sulpitius converted their superstition into admiration of his deep skill, when they saw it verified. Contrariwise, the Macedonians howled and made a great noise, as long as the Eclipse lasted: rather perhaps because it was their fashion, than for that they were terrified therewith, as with a prodigy betokening their loss: since their desire to fight was no whit lessened by it. I will not here stand to dispute, Whether such Eclipses do signify, or cause any alteration in civil affairs, & matters that have small dependance on natural complexion: for the argument is too large. More worthy of observation it is, how superstitious tivates the wisdom of the wisest, where the help of true religion is wanting. Amilius, though he were sufficiently instructed concerning this defect of the Moon, that it was no supernatural thing, nor above the reach of humane understanding, so as he should need to trouble himself with any devout regard thereof; yet could he not refrain from doing his duty to this moon, & congratulating with sacrifice her delivery, as soon as she shone out bright again: for which he is commended even by Plutarch, a sage Philosopher, as a godly and religious man. If Sulpitius perhaps did not assist him in this foolish devotion, yet it is like, that he, being a Senator, and one of the Council for war, was partaker the next morning in a sacrifice done to Hercules; which was no less foolish. For a great part of the day was vainly consumed, ere Hercules could be pleased with any sacrifice, and vouchsafe to shew tokens of good luck in the entrails of the beasts. At length, in the belly of the one and twentieth sacrifice, was found a promise of victory to Amilius: but with condition, That he should not give the onset. Hercules was a Greek, and partial, as nearer in alliance to the Macedonian than to the Roman. Wherefore it had been better to call upon the new goddess, lately canonized at Alabanda; or upon Romulus, founder of their City, on whom the Romans had bestowed his Deity; or (if a God of elder date were more authentic) upon Mars the Father of Romulus, to whom belonged the guidance of military affairs; and who therefore would have limited his favour, with no injunctions contrary to the rules of war.

Now concerning the battle; Amilius was throughly perswaded, that the King meant to abide it: for that otherwise he would not have stayed at Pydna, when as a little before, his leisure served to retire whither he listed, the Romans being further off. In regard of this, and perhaps of the tokens appearing in the Sacrifices, the Consul thought that he might wait upon advantage, without making any great haste. Neither was it to be neglected, that the morning Sun was full in the Romans faces: which would be much to their hindrance all the forenoon. Since therefore Perseus kept his ground, that was commodious for the Phalanx, and Amilius sent forth part of his men to bring in Wood and Fodder, there was no likelihood of fighting that day. But about ten of the clock in the morning, a small occasion brought to pass that, which whereto neither of the Generals had over earnest desire.

A Horse brake loose at watering, which

two or three of the Roman Souldiers followed into the River, wading after him up to the knees. The Kings men lay on the further bank: whence a couple of Thracians ran into the Water, to draw this horse over to their own side. These fell to blows, as in a private quarrel; and one of the Thracians was slain. His Countrymen seeing this, hastened to revenge their fellows death, and followed those that had slain him over the River. Hereupon company came in, to help on each part, until the number grew such, as made it pass a fray, and caused both the Armies to be careful of the event. In fine, each of the Generals placed his men in order of battle, accordingly as the manner of his Country, and the arms wherewith they served, did require. The ground was a flat level, save that on the sides a few hillocks were raised here and there; whereof each part might take what advantage it could. The Macedonians were the greater number, and the Romans the better souldiers, and better appointed. Both the King and the Consul encouraged their men with lively words: which the present condition could bountifully afford. But the King, having finished his Oration, and sent on his men, withdrew himself into Pydna: there to do sacrifice, as he pretended, unto Hercules. It is the less marvel, that he durst adventure such a stratagem, whereby to save his own person. As for Hercules, he liked not the sacrifice of a Coward: whose unfeigned devotion could be no better then hypocrisy. For he that will pray for a good Harvest, ought also Plough, Sow, and Weed his Ground. When therefore the King returned to the battle, he found it no better than lost: and he in looking to his own safety, caused it to be lost altogether, by beginning the flight.

The acts of this day, such as we find recorded are, That the Roman Elephant's, could do no manner of good: That the Macedonian Phalanx did so stoutly press onwards, and beat off all which came before it, as Amilius was thereat much astonished, that the Peligni rushing desperately on the Phalanx, were over-born; many of them slain, and the squadrons following them to discourage herewith, as they retired apace towards an hill. These were the things that fell out averse to the Romans; and which the Consul beholding, is said to have rent his Coat-armour for grief. If the King with all his power of horse, had in like manner done his devoyre, the victory might have been his own. That which turned the fortune of the battle, was the same which doubtless the Con-

ful expected, even from the beginning: the difficulty or almost the impossibility of holding the Phalanx long in order. For whilst some of the Romans small battalions pressed hard upon one part of it, and others recoyled from it; it was necessary (if the Macedonians would follow upon those which were put to the worse) that some files having open way before them, should advance themselves beyond the rest that were held at a stand. This coming to pass, admonished the Consul, what was to be done. The long Pikes of the Macedonians were of little use; when they were charged in flank by the Roman Targettires; according to the direction given by Amilius, when he saw the front of the enemies great battel become unequal, and the ranks in some places open, by reason of the unequal resistance which they found. Thus was the use of the Phalanx proved unavailable against many small Squadrons; as it had been formerly in the battel of Cynoscephala: yea this form of embattailing was found unserviceable against the other, by reason, that being not every where alike distressed, it would break of it self; though here were little such inconvenience of ground, as had been at Cynoscephala.

Perseus, when he saw his battel begin to rout, turned his bridle presently, and ran again towards Pella. All his Horse escaped, in a manner untouched, and a great number followed him; the little harm which they had taken, witnessing the little good service which they had done. As for the poor foot, they were left to the mercy of the Enemy: who slew above twenty thousand of them; though having little cause to be furious, as having lost in that battel, only some fourscore, or sixscore men at the most. Some of the foot, escaping from the execution, overtook the King and his company in a Wood, where they fell to railing at the Horsemen, calling them cowards, traitors, and such other names, till at length they fell to blows: The King was in doubt lest they had ill meaning to himself; and therefore turned out of the common way being followed by such as thought it good. The rest of the company dispersed themselves: every one as his own occasions guided him. Of those that kept along with their King, the number began within a while to lessen. For he fell to devising upon whom he might lay the blame of that daies misfortune, which was moit due to himself: thereby causing those that knew his nature, to shrink away from him, how they could. At his coming to Pella, he found his Pages and household-servants, ready to attend him, as they had been wont. But of his great men that had escaped from the battel, there was none appearing in the Court. In this melancholy time, there were two of his Treasurers that had the boldness to come to him, and tell him roundly of his faults. But in reward of their unseasonable admonitions, he stabbed them both to death. After this, none whom he sent for would come to him. This boded no good. Wherefore standing in fear, lest they that refused to come at his call, would shortly dare some greater mischief, he stole out of Pella by night. Of his friends he had with him only Evander (who had been employed to kill Eumenes at Delphi) and two others. There followed him likewise about 500. Cretians, more for love of his money than of him. To these he gave of his plate, as much as was worth about fifty talents, though shortly he consumed them of some part thereof; making them as if he would have redeemed it, but never paying the money. The third day after the battel he came to Amphipolis, where he exhorted the Town-men to fidelity, with tears: and his own speech being hindered by tears, he appointed Evander to speak what himself would have uttered. But the Amphipolitans made it their chief care to look well to themselves. Upon the first make of the overthrow, they had emptied their Town of two thousand Thracians that lay there in Garrison: sending them forth under colour of a gainful employment, and shutting the gates after them. And now to be rid of the King, they plainly bad Evander to be gone. The King hearing this, had no mind to tarry: but embarking himself and the treasure which he had there, in certain vessels that he found in the River Strymon; passed over the Ile of Samothrace: where he hoped to live safe, by privileges of the Religious Sanctuary therein.

These miserable shifts of the King make it the less doubtful, how all the Kingdom fell into the power of Amilius, within so few daies after his victory. Pydna, which was nearest at hand, was the last that yielded. About six thousand of the souldiers, that were of sundry Nations, fled out of the battel into that Town; and prepared for defence: the confused rabble of so many strangers hindering all deliberation and consent. Hippus, who had kept the passage over Offa against Martius, with Pantamus, who had been sent Embassador to Geminus the Illyrian, were the first that came in: yielding themselves, and the Town of Berec, whither they had retired out of the battel. With the like message, came others from Thessalonica, from Pella, and from all the Towns of Macedon, within two daies: the loss of the head bereaving the whole body of all sense and strength. Neither did they of Thyssa, stand out any longer, when they knew that the King had forsaken his Country: but opened their gates upon such terms, that the sack of it was granted to the Roman Army. Amphilochus sent abroad into the Country, such as he thought meetest, to take charge of other Cities: he himself marching towards Pella. He found in Pella no more than three hundred Talents: the same, whereof Perseus had lately defrauded the Illyrian. But within a very little while he shall have more.

It was soon understood, that Perseus had taken Sanctuary in the Temple at Samothrace: his own Letters to the Consul confirming the report. He sent these Letters by persons of such mean condition, that his case was pitied, for that he wanted the service of better men. The scope of this writing was, to desire favour: which, though he begged in terms ill becoming a King, yet since the inscription of his Epistle was, King Perseus to the Consul Paulus; the Consul, who had taken from him his Kingdom, and would not allow him to retain the Title, refused to make any answer thereunto. So there came other Letters, as humble as could be expected: whereby he craved and obtained, that some might be sent to confer with him about matters of his present estate. Nevertheless, in this Conference, he was marvellously earnest, that he might be allowed still to retain the name of King. And to this end it was, perhaps, that he had so carefully preserved his Treasure, unto the very last: flattering himself with such vain hopes as these: That the Romans would neither violate a Sanctuary; nor yet neglect those great riches in his possession; but compound with him for money, letting him have his desire to live at ease, and to be called King. Yea, it seems that he had indeed, even from the beginning, a desire to live in this Isle of Samothrace; both for that in one of his consultations about the War, he was dejected by his friends, from seeking to exchange his Kingdom of Macedon, for such a paltry Island; and for that he offered to lay up the money which Enneus demanded, in the holy Temple that was there. But he finds it otherwise. They urge him to give place unto necessity, and, without more ado, to yield to the discretion and mercy of the people of Rome. This is so far against his mind, that the Conference breaks off without effect. Presently, there arrives at Samothrace, Cn. Octavius, the Roman Admiral, with his Fleet: who, as they say, as well by visible things, as by their language, to draw the King out of his lurking hole; where, for fear of imprisonment, he had now already imprisoned himself. When all would not serve, a question was moved to the Samothracians: How they durst pollute their Temple, by receiving into it one that had violated the like holy privilege of Sanctuary, by attempting the murder of King Enneus at Delphi? This went to the quick. The Samothracians, being now in the power of the Romans, take this matter to heart; and send word to the King, that Evander, who lives with him in the Temple, is accused of an impious fact, committed at Delphi, whereof, unless he can clear himself in judgement, he must not be suffered to prophane that holy place, by his abiding in it. The reverence born to his Majesty, now past, makes them forbear to say, that Perseus himself is charged with the same crime. But what will this avail, when the Minister of the fact being brought into judgement, shall (as is to be feared) appeach the Author? Perseus therefore, willeth Evander to have consideration of the little favour that can be expected at the Romans hand; who are like to be presidents and overseers of this judgement: so as it were better to dye valiantly, since none other hope remains, than hope to make good an ill cause; where, though he had a good plea, yet it could not help him. Of this motion Evander seems to like well: and either kills himself, or hoping to escape thence, by deferring the time as it were, getteth poison wherewith to end his life, is killed by the Kings commandment. The death of this man, who had stuck to Perseus in all times of need, makes all the Kings friends that remained hitherto, to forsake him: so as none are left with him, save his wife and children, with his Pages. It is much to be suspected, that they which leave him upon this occasion, will tell perillous tales, and say, That the King hath lost the privilege of this holy Sanctuary, by murdering Evander therein. Or if the Romans will affirm so much, who shall dare to gainsay them? Since therefore there is nothing but a point of formality, and even that also liable to dispute, which preserves him from captivity; he purposeth to make an escape, and fly, with his Treasures, unto Cyrrus, his good friend, into Thrace. Oroandes, a Cretian, lay at Samothrace with one ship; who easily was persuaded to waite the King

King thence. With all secrecy the Kings money, as much as could be so conveyed, was carried aboard by night; and the King himself; with his wife and children (if rather it were not true, that he had with him only * Philip his elder Son, who was only by adoption his Son, being his * brother by nature) with much ado got out at a window by a Rope, and over a mud-wall. At his coming to the Sea-side, he found no Oroandes there: the Cretian had played a Cretian trick, and was gone with the money to his own home. So it began to wax clear day, whilst Perseus was searching all along the shore: who had stayed so long about this, that he might fear to be intercepted ere he could relover the Temple. He ran therefore amain towards his lodging: and thinking it not safe to enter it the common way, lest he should be taken, he hid himself in an obscure corner. His Pages missing him, ran up and down making inquiry; till Oroandes made Proclamation, That all the Kings Pages, and Macedonians whatsoever, abiding with their Master in Samothrace, should have their lives and liberty, with all to them belonging, which they had either in that Isle, or at home in Macedon, conditionally. That they should presently yield themselves to the Romans. Hereupon they all came in. Likewise Ion, a Thessalonian, to whom the King had given the custody of his children, delivered them up to Oroandes. Lastly, Perseus himself, with his Son Philip, accusing the gods of Samothrace, that had no better protected him, rendred himself, and made the Roman Victory complete. If he had not trusted in those gods of Samothrace, but employed his whole care in the defence of Macedon, without other hope of living, than of reigning therein; he might well have brought this War to an happier end. Now, by dividing his cogitations, and pursuing at once, those contrary hopes of saving his Kingdom by Arms, and himself by flight, he is become a spectacle of misery, and one among the number of those Princes, that have been wretched by their own default. He was presently sent away to Amphilochus; before whom he fell to the ground so basely, that he seemed thereby to dishonour the Victory over himself, as gotten upon one of abject quality, and therefore the less to be esteemed. Amphilochus used to him the language of a gentle Victor: blaming him, though mildly, for having, with so hostile a mind, made war upon the Romans. Hereunto good answer might have been returned by one of better spirit. As for Perseus, he answered all with a fearful silence. He was comforted with hope of life, or (as the Consul termed it) almost allowance; for that such was the mercy of the people at Rome. After these good words, being invited to the Consul Table, and respectfully entreated, he was committed prisoner to Delphi.

Such end had this Macedonian War, after four years continuance: and such end there-withall had the Kingdom of Macedon; the glory whereof, that had sometime filled the parts of the world then known, was now translated unto Rome.

Gentius King of the Illyrians taken by the Romans.

About the same time, and with like celebrity, Anicius the Roman Prætor, who succeeded unto App. Claudius, had thence success against King Gentius the Illyrian. Gentius had an Army of fifteen thousand; with which he was at Lissus, ready to assist King Perseus as soon as the money should come, whereof he had received only ten Talents. But Anicius arrested him on the way, fought with him, overcame him, and drove him into * Scorda. This Town was very defensible by nature, besides the help of fortification; and strongly manned with all the force of Illyria; which, assisted with the Kings presence, made it seem impossible to be won; in any not a very long time. Yet Anicius was confident in his late Victory; and therefore presented his Army before the walls, making countenance to give an assault. The Illyrians, that might easily have defended themselves within the Town, would needs issue forth and fight. They were, it seems, rather passionate, than courageous: for they were beaten; and thereupon forthwith began amazed to treat about yielding. The King sent Embassadors; by whom, at first, he desired truce for three daies, that he might deliberate concerning his estate. It ill became him, who had laid violent hands on the Roman Embassadors, to have recourse to such mediation. But he thought his own fault pardonable, in as much as hitherto there was no greater harm done by him, than the casting of those Embassadors into prison, where they were all alive. Having obtained three daies respite, he passed up a River, within half a mile of the Roman Camp, into the Lake of Scorda, as it were to consult the more privately; though indeed deed, to hearken whether the report were true, his brother Caracanthus was coming to his rescue. Finding that no such help was toward, it is wonder, that he was so foolish as to return into Scorda. He sent messengers, craving access unto the Prætor, before whom, having lamented his folly past (which, excepting the dishonesty, was not so great as his folly present) he fell down humbly, and yielded himself to discretion. All the Towns of his Kingdom, together with his wife, children, brother, friends, were presently given up. So this War ended in thirty daies: the people of Rome, not knowing that it was begun, until Perenna, one of the Embassadors that had been imprisoned, brought word from Anicetus how all had passed.

How the Romans behaved themselves in Greece and Macedonia after their Victory over Perseus.

NOW began the Romans to swell with the pride of their fortune; and to look Tyrannically upon those that had been unmanly toward them before, whilst the War with Perseus seemed full of danger. The Rhodian Embassadors were still at Rome, when the tydings of these Victories were brought thither. Wherefore it was thought good to call them into the Senate, and bid them do their errand again. This they performed with a bad grace, saying, That they were sent from Rhodes to make an overture of peace; forasmuch as it was thought, that this war was no less grievous to the Romans themselves, than to the Macedonians and many others: but that now they were very glad, and in behalf of the Romans did congratulate with the Senate and people of Rome, that it was ended much more happily than had been expected. Hereto the Senate made answer, That the Rhodians had sent this Embassy to Rome, not for love of Rome, but in favour of the Macedonian; whose partizans they were, and should be taken. By these threats, and the desire of some (covetous of the charge) to have War proclaimed against Rhodes; the Embassadors were so affrighted, that in mourning Apparel, as humble Suppliants, they went about the City, beseeching all men, especially the great Ones, to pardon their indiscretion, and not to prosecute them with vengeance; for some foolish words. This danger of War from Rome being known at Rhodes, all that had been any while absent from the Romans in the late War of Macedonia, were either taken and condemned, or sent prisoners to Rome; excepting some that flew themselves for fear, whose goods also were confiscated. Yet this procured little grace; and lest would have done, if old M. Cato, a man by nature vehement, had not uttered a milde sentence, and advertised the Senate, That in decreeing War against Rhodes, they should much dishonour themselves, and make it thought, that rather the wealth of that City, which they were greedy to ransack, than any just cause, had moved them thereto. This consideration, together with their good desires in the Wars of Philip and Antiochus, helped well the Rhodians: among whom, none of any mark remained alive, save those that had been of the Roman faction. All which notwithstanding, many years passed, ere by importunate suit, they could be admitted into the Society of the Romans: a favour which till now they had not esteemed; but thought themselves better without it, as equal friends.

With the like, or greater severity, did the Romans make themselves terrible in all parts of Greece. Amylius himself made progress thorow the Country; visiting all the famous places therein, as for his pleasure: yet not forgetting to make them understand what power he had over them. More than five hundred of the chief Citizens in Demetrias were slain at one time by those of the Roman faction, and with help of the Roman Souldiers. Others fled, or were banished, and their goods confiscated. Of which things, when complaint was made to the Consul, the redress was such, as required not the pains of supplication. His friends, that is to say, those which betrayed unto the Romans the liberty of their Country, he feasted like a King, with excessive cheer; yet so, that he had all things very cheap in his Camp: an easie matter, since no man durst be backward in sending provisions, nor let on them the due price. Embassadors likewise were sent from Rome; some, to give order for settling the estate of Macedonia, towards which they had more particular instruction from the Senate, than was usual in such case; and some, to visit the affairs of Greece. The Kingdom of Macedonia was set at liberty by Amylius, and the Embassadors, his assistants, who had order therefore from the Senate. But this liberty was such as the Romans used to bestow. The best part of it was, That the Tribute which had been payed unto the Kings, was lessened by said, and said, at Cato's

by half. As for the rest, the Country was divided into four parts, and they forbidden commerce one with the other. All the Nobility were sent captive into Italy with their wives and children, as many as were above fifteen years old. The ancient Laws of the Country were abrogated, and new given by Amylius. Such mischief the Senate thought it better to do at the first alteration of things in this Province, and in the time of Conquest, than otherwise to leave any inconvenience that should be worse in the future. But concerning the Greeks, that were not sent to Rome, the things done to them could deserve no better name than meet tyranny: yea, and shameless perjury; were it not so, that the familiar custom, among Princes and great Estates, of violating Leagues, doth make the Oaths of confederation seem of no validity. The Embassadors that were sent to visit the Greeks, called before them all such men of note, from every quarter, as had any way discovered an unserviceable disposition towards the Romans. These they sent to Rome; where they were made sure enough. Some of these had sent Letters to Perseus, which fell at length into the Romans hands: and in that respect, though they were no subjects; yet wanted there not colour, for using them as traitors, or at least as enemies. But since only two men were beheaded, for having been openly on the Macedonian side; and since it is confessed, that the good Patriots were no less afflicted in this inquisition, than they that had sold themselves to the King: this manner of proceeding was inexcusable tyranny. With the Achæans these Embassadors were to deal more formally: not so much because that Common-wealth was strong; (though this were to be regarded by them, having no Commission to make or denounce War) and like to prove untractable, if manifest wrong were offered; as for that there appeared no manner of sign, by Letters, or otherwise, whereby any one of the Achæans could be suspiciously charged to have held correspondence with the Macedonian. It was also so, that neither Callistratus, nor any of his adherents, had been employed by the Nation, in doing or offering their service to the Romans; but only such as were the best Patriots. Yet would not therefore the Embassadors neglect to use the benefit of the time; wherein, since all men trembled for fear of Rome, the season served it, y to rank the Achæans with the rest. And hereto Callistratus was very urgent: fearing, and procuring them to fear in behalf of him and his friends, that if some sharp order were not now taken, he and his fellows should be made to pay for their mischievous devices, ere long time passed. So the Embassadors came among the Achæans: where one of them, in open assembly of the Nation, spake, as Callistratus had before instructed him. He said, That some of the chief among them, had with money and other means befriended Perseus. This being so, he desired that all such men might be condemned; whom, after sentence given, he would name unto them. After sentence given (cried out the whole assembly) what justice were this? Name them first, and let them answer; which if they cannot well do, we will soon condemn them: Then said the Roman boldly, That all their Prætors, as many as had led their Armies, were guilty of this crime. If this were true, said Xenon, a temperate man, and confident in his innocence, than should I likewise have been friend to Perseus: whereof, if any man can accuse me, I shall thoroughly answer him, either here presently, or before the Senate at Rome. Upon these words of Xenon the Embassador laid hold, and said, That even so it were the best way, for him and the rest to purge themselves before the Senate at Rome. Then began he to name others, and left not until he had cited above a thousand; willing them to appear and answer before the Senate. This might even be termed the captivity of Greece; wherein so many of the bestest and worthiest men were carried from home, for none other cause, than their love unto their Country; to be punished according to the will of those, who could not endure, that virtue, and regard of the publick liberty, should dwell together in any of the Greeks. At their coming to Rome, they were all cast into prison, as men already condemned by the Achæans. Many Embassadors were sent from Achæa (where it is to be wondered, that any such honest care of these innocent men could be remaining: since honesty had been thus punished as a vice, in so many of the worthiest among them) to inform the Senate, that these men were neither condemned by the Achæans, nor yet held to be offenders. But in stead of better answer, it was pronounced; That the Senate thought it not expedient for the Country, that these men should return into Achæa. Neither could any solicitation solicitation of the Achaens, who never ceased to importune the Senate for their liberty, prevail at all; until after seventeen years, fewer than thirty of them were enlarged, of whom that wife and virtuous man Polybium the great Historian, was one. All the rest were either dead in prison, or, having made offer to escape, whether upon the way before they came to Rome, or whether out of Jayle, after that they were committed thereto, suffered death as malefactors.

This was a gentle correction, in regard of what was done upon the Epirots. For the Senate being desirous to preserve the Macedonian Treasure whole; yet withall, to gratifie the Souldiers, gave order, that the whole Country of Epirus should be put to sack. This was a barbarous and horrible cruelty; as also it was performed by Amphilus with mischievous subtilty. Having taken leave of the Greeks, and of the Macedonians, with bidding them well to use the liberty bestowed upon them by the people of Rome; he sent unto the Epirots for ten of the principal men out of every City. These he commanded to deliver up all the Gold and Silver which they had; and sent along with them, into every of their Towns, what companies of men he thought convenient, as it were to fetch the money. But he gave secret instructions to the Captains, that upon a certain day by him appointed, they should fall to sack, every one the Town wherinto he was sent. Thus in one day were three score and ten Cities, all confederate with the Romans, spoiled by the Roman Souldiers; and besides other acts of hostility in a time of peace, a hundred and fifty thousand of that Nation made slaves. It may be granted, that some of the Epirots deserved punishment, as having favoured Perseus. But since they among this people, that were thought guilty of this offence; yea, or but coldly affected to the Romans, had been already sent into Italy, there to receive their due; and since this Nation, in general, was not only at the present in good obedience, but had even in this War done good service to the Romans: I hold this act too wicked, that I should not believe it, had any one Writer delivered the contrary. But the truth being manifest by consent of all, it is the less marvellous that God was pleased to make Amphilus childless, even in the glory of his triumph, how great soever otherwise his virtues were.

nians. How terrible they were to other Kingdoms abroad, it will appear by the efficacy of an Embassy sent from them to Antiochus; whereof, before we speak, we must say somewhat of Antiochus his foregoers, of himself, and of his affairs about which these Embassadours came.

§. XI.

The War of Antiochus upon Egypt brought to end by the Roman Embassadours.

A*ntiochus* the Great, after his peace with the Romans, did nothing that was memorable in the short time following of his reign and life. He died the six and thirtieth year after he had worn a Crown, and in the seventeenth or eighteenth of Philomy Epiphanes; while he attempted to rob the Temple of Bel, or (according to Justine) of Jupiter. He left behind him three Sons, Seleucus, Philopator, Antiochus Epiphanes, Demetrius Soter; and one Daughter, Cleopatra, whom he had given in marriage to Philomy Epiphanes King of Egypt. Seleucus, the fourth of that name, and the eldest of Antiochus his Sons; reigned in Syria twelve years, according to Eusebius, Apian, and Sulpitius: though Josephus give him but seven years: A Prince, who, as he was slothful by nature, so the great loss which his Father Antiochus had received, took from him the means of managing any great affair. O him, about three hundred years before his birth, Daniel gave this judgment, Et stabit in loco ejus vilissimus & indignus decore regio. And in his place (speaking of Antiochus, the Father of this man) shall start up a vile person, unworthy the honour of a King. Under this Seleucus, those things were done which are spoken of Onias the high Priest, in these words, and other to the same effect: What time as the holy City was inhabited with all peace, because of the godliness of Onias the Priest, it came to pass, that even the King did honour the place, and garnished the Temple with great gifts. And all that is written in the third Chapter of the second of Maccabees, of Simon of Benjamin, who by Apollonius betrayed the Treasure of the Temple: and of Heliodorus sent by the King to seize them; of his miraculous striking by God, and his recovery at the prayers of Onias; of the Kings death, and of his successor Antiochus Epiphanes. It is therefore from the reign of this King, that the Books of the Maccabees take beginning.

ning. Which Books seem not to be delivered by one and the same hand. For the first Book, although it touch upon Alexander the Great, yet it hath nothing else of his story; nor of the acts of his successors, till the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, the brother and successor of this Seleucus, from whom downward to the death of Simon Maccabaeus (who died in the hundred threescore and seventeen year of the Greeks in Syria) that first Book treateth. The Author of the second Book, although he take the story somewhat further off, by way of a Proem, yet he endeth with the hundred and one and fiftieth year of the Grecian reign, and with the death of Nicanor, slain by Judas: remembering in the fourth Chapter the practice of Jeson the brother of Onias; who, after the death of Seleucus, prevailed with Antiochus Epiphanes, his successor, for the Priesthood. It is also held by Janfenius, and other grave Writers, that it was in the time of this Onias, that Arins King of the Spartans sent Embassadours to the Jews, as to their brothers and kinsmen. Which intelligence between them and the Greeks, Jonathan the brother and successor of Judas, remembering in the Preamble of that Epistle, which he himself directed to the people of Sparta by Numenius and Antipater his Embassadours, whom he employed at the same time to the Senate of Rome; repeating also the former Letters word by word, which Arins had sent to Onias the high Priest, whereto Josephus adds, that the name of the Lacedaemonian Embassadour was Demoteles, and that the Letters had a square Volume, and were sealed with an Eagle holding a Dragon in her claws.

Now to this Seleucus, the fourth of that name, succeeded Antiochus Epiphanes, in the hundred and seven and thirtieth year of the Greeks in Syria. He was the second Son of the Great Antiochus: and he obtained his Kingdom by procuring the death of the King his brother; which also he usurped from his brothers Son.

Philomy Philometor, his Nephew by his Sister Cleopatra, being then very young, had been about seven years King of Egypt.

Philomy Epiphanes, the Father of this King Philometor, had reigned in Egypt four and twenty year, in great quiet, but doing little or nothing that was memorable. Philip of Macedon, and the Great Antiochus, had agreed to divide his Kingdom between them, whilst he was a child. But they found such other business ere long with the Romans, as made them give over their unjust purpose; especially Antiochus, who gave with his Daughter in marriage, unto this Philomy, the Provinces of Calistria, Phoenicia, and Judaea, which he had won by his victory over Scopas, that was General of the Egyptian Forces in those parts. Nevertheless, Philomy adhered to the Romans: whereby he lived in the greater security. He left behind him two Sons, this Philomy Philometor, and Philomy Phylcon; with a Daughter Cleopatra. Cleopatra was wife to the elder of her brethren, and after his death to the younger, by whom she was cast off, and her Daughter taken in her stead. Such were the marriages of these Egyptian Kings.

Philomy Philometor, so called (that is, the Lover of his Mother) by a bitter nickname, because he slew her, tell into hatred with his subjects, and was like to be chased out of his Kingdom, his younger brother being set up against him. Phylcon having a strong party, got possession of Alexandria; and Philometor held himself in Memphis, craving succour of King Antiochus his Uncle. Hereof Antiochus was glad: who under colour to take upon him the protection of the young Prince, fought by all means possible to possess himself of that Kingdom. He sent Apollonius the Son of Mnesteus Embassadour into Egypt, and under colour to assist the King's Coronation, he gave him instructions to persuade the Governours of the young King Philometor, to deliver the King his Nephew, with the principal places of that Kingdom, into his hands; petending an extraordinary care and charge of his Nephews safety and well doing. And the better to answer all arguments to the contrary, he prepared a forcible Army to attend him. Thus came he alongst the coast of Syria to Joppa, and from thence on the sudden he turned himself towards Jerusalem; where, by Jeson the Priest, (a Chaplain fit for such a Patron) he was with all pomp and solemnity received into the City. For though lately, in the time of Seleucus, the brother and predecessor of Epiphanes, that impious Traitor Simon of the Tribe of Benjamin, Ruler of the Temple, when he would have delivered the Treasures thereof to Apollonius Governour of Calistria and Phoenicia, was disappointed of his wicked purpose by miracle from Heaven; the said Apollonius being stricken by the Angel of God, and recovering again at the Prayer of Onias: yet sufficed not this example to terrifie terrible others from the like ungodly practices. Presently upon the death of Selenus, this Jason, the brother of Onias, seeking to supplant his brother, and to obtain the Priesthood for himself, offered unto the King three hundred and threescore Talents of silver, with other rents and fums of money. So he got his desire, though he not long enjoyed it.

This naughty dealing of Jason, and his being over-reached by another in the same kind, calls to mind a by-word taken up among the Acheans, when as that mischiefous Gallierates, who had been too hard for all worthy and virtuous men, was beaten at his own weapon, by one of his own condition. It was thus:

One fire than other burns more forcibly,
One Wolf than other Wolves does bite more sore,
One Hawk than other Hawks more swift does fly:
So one most mischiefous of men before,
Callicrates, false knave as knave might be,
Met with Menelaids more false than he.

And even thus fell it out with Jason: who within three years after was betrayed, and over-bidden by Menelaus the brother of Simon, that for three hundred Talents more obtained the Priesthood for himself: Jason thereupon being forced to fly from Jerusalem, and to hide himself among the Ammonites.

From Jerusalem, Antiochus marched into Phenicia, to augment the numbers of his men of war, and to prepare a Fleet for his expedition into Egypt; with which, and with a mighty Army of Land forces, He went about to reign over Egypt, that he might have the dominion of two Realms, and entered Egypt with a mighty company; with Chariots and Elephants, with Horsemen, and with a great Navy, and moved War against Ptolemæus King of Egypt; but Ptolemæus was afraid of him, and fled, and many were wounded to death. He won many strong Cities, and took away the spoils of the Land of Egypt. Thus was fulfilled the Prophecy of Daniel: He shall enter into the quiet and plentiful Provinces, and he shall do that which his fathers have not done, nor his Fathers Father. Never indeed had any of the Kings of Syria so great a victory over the Egyptians, nor took from them so great riches. For he gave a notable overthrow to the Captains of Ptolemy, between Pellus, and the Hill Cassius, after which he entered and sacked the greatest and richest of all the Cities of Egypt, Alexandria excepted, which he could not force. In conclusion, after that Antiochus had finished Egypt, he turned again, and went up towards Israel and Jerusalem with a mighty people, and entered proudly into the Sanctuary, and took away the Golden Altar, and the Candlestick for the light, and all the instruments thereof, and the table of the Showbread, and the pouring vessels, and the Bells, and the Golden Basins, and the Vail, and the Crowns, and the Golden Apparel. He took also the Silver, and the Gold, and the precious Jewels, and the secret Treasures: and when he had taken away all, he departed into his own Land, after he had murdered many men.

It was about the beginning of the Macedonian War, that Antiochus took in hand this Egyptian business. At what time he first laid claim to Celestria, justifying his title by the same allegations which his Father had made; and still averting, that this Province had not been consigned over to the Egyptians; or given in dowry with Cleopatra. Easie it was to approve his right unto that which he had already gotten, when he was in a fair way to get all Egypt. The Greeks, Robdians, Athenians, and other of the Greeks, pressed him, by several Embassages, to some good conclusion. But his answer was, that if the Alexandrians could be contented to receive their King, his Nephew Philometor, the elder brother of the Ptolemies, then should the War be presently at an end; otherwise not. Yet when he saw that it was an hard piece of work to take Alexandria by force: he thought it better to let the two brothers consume themselves with intestine War, than by the terror of his arms, threatening destruction unto both of them, to put into them any desire of coming to agreement. He therefore withdrew his Forces for the present; leaving the Ptolemies in very weak estate, the younger almost ruined by his invasion; the elder hated and forsaken by his people.

But how weak soever these Egyptians were, their hatred was thought to be so strong, that Antiochus might leave them to the prosecution thereof; and follow, at good leisure, his other business at Jerusalem, or elsewhere. So after the sack of Jerusalem, he rested him a while at Antioch, and then made a journey into Cilicia, to suppress the Rebellion of the Thracians and others in those parts, who had been given, as it were, by way of dowry to a Concubine of the Kings, called Antiochis. For Governor of Syria in his absence, he left one one Andronicus, a man of great authority about him. In the mean while, Menelaus the brother of Simon, the same who had thrust Jason out of the Priesthood, and promised the King three hundred talents for an In-charge; committing the charge of the Priesthood to his brother Tysimachus: stole certain Vessels of Gold out of the Temple: whereof he presented a part to Andronicus the Kings Lieutenant, and sold the rest at Tyre, and other Cities adjoining. This he did, as it seemeth to advance the payment of the three hundred talents promised; the same being now by Sophists eagerly demanded. Hereof when Onias the Priest (formerly dispossessed by Jason) had certain knowledge, being moved with zeal, and detesting the sacrilege of Menelaus, he reproved him for it; and fearing his revenge, he withdrew himself into a Sanctuary at Daphne.

Daphne was a place of delight adjoining as a suburb to Antioch. In compass it had about ten miles: wherein were the Temples of Apollo and Diana, with a Grove, sweet Springs, banqueting places, and the like; which were wholly, in a manner, abused to lust, and other such voluptuousness. Whether it were well done of Onias to commit himself to the protection of Apollo and Diana, or to claim privilege from the Holiness of a ground consecrated to any of the Heathen Gods, I will not stand to discourse. Only I say for mine own opinion, that the inconvenience is far less, to hold this Book as Apocryphal, than to judge this fearful shift which Onias (though a virtuous man) made for his life, either commendable or allowable, as the Book seems to do. As for this refuge, it could not save the life of the poor old man: for Menelaus taking Andronicus apart, prayed him to slay Onias. So when he came to Onias, he counselled him craftily, giving him his right hand with an oath, and persuaded him to come out of the Sanctuary; so he slew him incontinently without any regard of righteousness. Hereof when complaint was made to Antiochus after his return out of Cilicia, He took away Andronicus his garment of purple, and rent his clothes, and commanded him to be led throughout the City; and in the same place where he had committed the wickedness against Onias, he was slain as a murderer. In taking revenge of this innocent mans death, I should have thought that this wicked King had once in his life time done Justice. But presently after this, at the suit of one Ptolemy, a Traitor to Ptolemy Philometor, he condemned innocent men to death, who justly complained against Menelaus, and his brother Tysimachus, for a second robbing of the Temple, and carrying thence the Vessels of Gold remaining. Hereby it is manifest, that he was guided by his own outrageous will, and not by any regard of justice: since he revenged the death of Onias, he slew those that were in the same cause with Onias; who, before they told their cause, yea, before the Scythians, they should have been heard as innocent. By reason of such his unsteadiness, this King was commonly termed Epimaneus, that is, Mad, instead of Epiphaneus, which signifies Noble, or Illustrious.

After this, Antiochus made preparation for a second voyage into Egypt, and then were there seen throughout all the City of Jerusalem, forty daies long, horsemen running in the air with robes of gold, and as hosts of spear-men, and as troops of Horsemen, set in array, encountering and coursing one against another. Of these productions, as if they were warnings of God, all flogs, or rather forewarnings of God, all Histories have delivered up, some more, some less. Before the destruction of Jerusalem by Vespasian, a Star in the form of a sword appeared in the Heavens directly over the City, after which there followed a slaughter like unto this of Epiphaneus, Pliny tells us, that the Armies were seen fighting in the Air from the morning till the evening.

In the time of Pope John the eleventh, a fountain poured out blood in stead of water, in or near the City of Genoa; soon after which the City was taken by the Saracens, with great slaughter. Of these and the like prodigious signs, Vipers hath collected many, and very remarkable. But this one seemeth to me most memorable, because the most notorious. All men know, that in the Emperour Nero, the offspring of the Cæsars, as well natural as adopted, took end; whereof this notable sign gave warning.

When Livia was first married to Augustus, an Eagle let fall into her arms a white Hen, holding a Lawrel branch in her mouth. Livia caused this Hen to be carefully nourished, and the Lawrel branch to be planted: of the Hen came a fair increase of white Poultry; and from the little branch there sprang up in time a Grove of Lawrels; so that afterwards, in protection, he hath remaining none other help whereby to save both his Kingdom and life, than what can be obtained by their intercession which were employed against him. This miserable condition of him, his brother and sister shewed it self, even in the habit of those Embassadors. They were poorly clad; the hair of their heads and beards overgrown, as was their manner in time of affliction; and they carried in their hands branches of Olive. Thus they entred into the Senate, and there fell, groveling and prostrate, upon the floor. Their garments were not so mean and mournful, nor their looks and countenances so sad and dejected, but that their speech was than either of the other far more lamentable. For, having told in what danger their King and Country stood; they made a pitiful and grievous complaint unto the Senate, beseeching them to have compassion of their Estate, and of their Princes, who had always remained friendly and faithful to the Romans. They said that the people of Rome had so much heretofore favoured this Antiochus in particular, and were of such account and authority, with all other Kings and Nations; as, if they pleaded but to send their Embassadors, and let Antiochus know that the Senate was offended with his undertaking upon the King their Confederate; then would he presently raise his siege from before Alexandria, and withdraw his Army out of Egypt into Syria. But that if the Senate protracted any time, or used any delay; then should Pholomy and Cleopatra be shortly driven out of their Realms, and make repair to Rome, with shameful dishonour to the Senate and people thereof, in that, in the extrem dangers of all their fortunes, they had not vouchsafed to relieve them.

The Lords of the Senate moved with compassion, sent incontinently C. Popilius Lenus, C. Decimius, and A. Hostilius, as Embassadors to determine and end the War between those Kings. In commission they had first to find King Pholomy, and then Antiochus, and to let them both understand, that, unless they ceased, and gave over Arms, they would take that King no more for a friend to the Senate and people of Rome, whom they found obstinate, or using delay. So these Romans, together with the Alexandrian Embassadors, took their leave, and went onward their way within three days after.

Whilest Popilius and his fellows were on their way toward Egypt, Antiochus had transported his Army over Lysine, some forty miles from Alexandria. So near was he to the end of his Journey, when the Roman Embassadors met him. After greetings and salutations at their first encounter, Antiochus offered his right hand to Popilius; but Popilius filled it with a Roll of Paper; willing him to read those Mandates of the Senate before he did any thing else. Antiochus did so; and having a little while considered of the business, he told Popilius, That he would advise with his friends, and then give the Embassadors their answer. But Popilius, according to his ordinary blunt manner of speech, which he had by nature, made a Circle about the King with a Rod which he held in his hand, willing him to make him such an answer as he might report to the Senate, before he moved out of this Circle. The King astonished at this so rude and violent a Commandment, after he had stayed and pawed a while, I will be content (quoth he) to do whatsoever the Senate shall ordain. Then Popilius gave unto the King his hand, as to a Friend and Allie of the Romans.

Thus Antiochus departed out of Egypt, without any good issue of his costly Expedition; even in such manner as * Daniel had prophesied long before: yea, fulfilling every particular circumstance, both of returning, and of doing mischief to Jerusalem after his return; like as if these things had rather been historified than foretold by the Prophet. As for the Roman Embassadors, they stayed a while, and settled the Kingdom of Egypt, leaving it unto the elder brother, and appointed the younger to reign over Cyrene. This done, they departed towards Cyprus; which they left, as it had been, in the power of the Egyptians, having first sent away Antiochus Fleet, which had already given an overthrow to the Egyptian ships.

How the Romans were dreadful to all Kings. Their demeanour towards Eumenes, Prusias, Mafanilla, and Coys. The end of Perseus and his Children. The instability of Kingly Estates. The Triumphs of Paulus, Anicius, and Octavius. With the Conclusion of the Work.

BY this peremptory demeanour of Popilius, in doing his Message, and by the ready obedience of King Antiochus to the will of the Senate; we may perceive how terrible the Romans were grown; through their conquest of Macedonia. The same Popilius had been well contented, a year before this, to lay aside the roughness of his natural condition, and to give good language to the Achaeans and Aetolians, when he went Embassador to those people of Greece, that were of far less power than King Antiochus. Likewise, Antiochus had with good words, and no more than good words, dismissed other Embassadors which came from Rome, in such sort, as they complained not, much less used any menacing terms, though he performed nothing of their request. But now the case was altered. So found other Kings as well as Antiochus.

Eumenes sent to Rome his brother Attalus, to gratulate the victory over Perseus, and to crave help or countenance of the Senate against the Gallo Greeks, which molested him. Very welcome was Attalus, and lovingly entertained by most of the Senators: who bad him be confident, and request of the Senate his Brothers Kingdom for himself; for it should surely be given him. These hopeful promises tickled Attalus with such ambition, that he either approved, or seemed to approve the motion. But his honest nature was soon reclaimed by the faithful council of Stratus a Physician; whom Eumenes had sent to Rome of purpose to keep his Brother upright. So, when he came into the Senate, he delivered the errand about which he had been sent, recounting his own services done to the Romans in the late War, where withall, he forgot not to make of his Brother as good mention as he could: and finally, requested, That the Towns of Eurus and Maronea might be bestowed upon himself. * By his omitting to sue for his Brothers Kingdom, the Senate conceived opinion, that he meant to crave another day of audience for that business alone. Wherefore to make him understand how gracious he was, they not only granted all his desire; but in the presents which they gave unto him (as was their custom to Embassadors that came with an acceptable message) they used singular magnificence. Nevertheless Attalus took no notice of their meaning, but went his way, contented with what they had already granted. This did so highly displease the Senate, that whilst he was yet in Italy, they gave order for the liberty of Eurus and Maronea: thereby making uneffectual their promise; which otherwise they could not, without shame, revoke. And as for the Gallo-Greeks, which were about to invade the Kingdom of Pergamus; they sent Embassadors to them, with such instructions, as rather encouraged than hindered them in their purpose. The displeasure of the Senate being so manifest; Eumenes thought it worthy of his labour to make another voyage to Rome. He might well blame the folly of his second voyage thither, for this necessity of the third: since, by his malice to Perseus, he had laid open unto these ambitious Potentates the way to his own doors. No sooner was he come into Italy, than the Senate was ready to send him going. It was not thought expedient to use him as an enemy, that came to visit them in love: neither could they, in so doing, have avoided the note of singular inconsistency: and to entertain him as a friend, was more then their hatred to him, for his ingratitude, as they deemed it, would permit. Wherefore they made a Decree, That no King should be suffered to come to Rome; and by virtue thereof sent him home, without expence of much farther complement.

Prusias King of Bithynia had been at Rome somewhat before; where he was welcomed after a better fashion. He had learned to behave himself as humbly as the proud Romans could expect or desire. For, entering into the Senate, he lay down and killed the threshold, calling the Fathers his gods and saviours; as also he used to wear a Cap, after the manner of slaves newly manumitted, professing himself an enfranchised bondman of the people of Rome. He was indeed naturally a slave, and one that by such abject flattery kept himself safe, though doing otherwise greater mischief than any wherewith Perseus had been charged. His errand was, besides matter of complement, to commend unto the Senate the care of his Son Nicomedes, whom he brought with him to Rome, there to receive education. Further petition he made, to have have some Towns added to his Kingdom: whereto, because the grant would have been unjust, he received a cold answer. But concerning the Wardship of his Son, it was undertaken by the Senate: which, vaunting of the pleasure lately done to Egypt, in freeing it from Antiochus, willed him thereby to consider, what effectual protection the Romans gave unto the children of Kings, that were to their Patrons commended.

But above all other Kings, Masanissa held his credit with the Romans, good. His quarrels were endless with the Carthaginians: which made the friendship of the Romans to him the more assured. In all Controversies they gave judgement on his side: and whereas he had invaded the Country of Emporia, holding the Lands, but unable to win the Towns, the Romans (though at first they could find no pretext, whereby to countenance him in this oppression) compelled finally the Carthaginians both to let go all their hold, and to pay five hundred Talents to the Numidians, for having hindered him of his due solong. Now indeed had Rome good leisure to devise upon the ruins of Carthage: after which, the race of Masanissa himself was shortly by them rooted up. But hereof the old King never dreamed. He sent to Rome one of his Sons, to congratulate the Victory over Persus; and offered to come thither himself, there to sacrifice for joy unto Jupiter in the Capitol. His good will was lovingly accepted; his Son rewarded, and he entreated to stay at home.

Cecyls the Thracian sent Embassadors to excuse himself touching the aid by him given to Persus, for that the Macedonian had him bound by hostages; and to intreat, That his Son, which was taken with the children of Persus, might be set at liberty, for convenient ransom. His excuse was not taken; since he had voluntarily obliged himself to Persus, by giving hostages without necessity: Yet was his Son given back to him ransom-free; with admonition, to carry himself better toward the Romans in time following. His Kingdom lay between Macedonia, and some barbarous Nations; in which respect, it was good to hold him in fair terms.

As for those unhappy Kings, Persus and Gentius, they were led thorow Rome, with their children and friends, in the Triumphs of Amylinus and Anticus. Persus had often made suit to Amylinus, that he might not be put to such disgrace: But he still received one scornful answer, That it lay in his own power to prevent it; whereby was meant, that he might kill himself. And surely, had he not hoped for greater mercy than he found, he would rather have sought his death in Macedonia, than to have been beholding to the courtesy of his insolent enemies for a wretched life. The issue of the Roman clemency, whereof Amylinus had given him hope, was no better than this; After that he, and his fellow-Kings, had been led in chains thorow the streets, before the Chariots of their Triumphant Victors, they were committed to prison, wherein they remained without hope of release. It was the manner, that when the Triumpher turned his Chariot up towards the Capitol, there to do sacrifice, he should command the Captives to be had away to prison, and there put to death: so as the honour of the Vanquisher, and misery of those, that were overcome, might be both together at the utmost. This last sentence of death was remitted unto Persus: yet so, that he had little joy of his life; but either famished himself, or (for it is diversely reported) was kept watching perforce by those that had him in custody; and so dyed for want of sleep. Of his Sons, two dyed; it is uncertain how. The youngest called Alexander (only in name like unto the Great, though destined sometimes perhaps by his Father, unto the fortunes of the Great) became a Joyner, or Turner; or, at his best preferment, a Scribe under the Roman Officers. In such poverty ended the Royal house of Macedonia; and it ended on the sudden; though some eight score years after the death of that Monarch, unto whose ambition this whole Earth seemed too narrow.

If Persus had known it before, that his own Son should one day be compelled to earn his living by handy-work, in a painful Occupation; it is like, that he would not as in a wantonness of Sovereignty have commanded those poor men to be slain, which had recovered his treasures out of the Sea, by their skill in the feat of diving. He would rather have been very gentle, and would have considered, that the greatest oppressors, and the most under-trodden wretches, are all subject unto the One high Power, governing all alike with absolute command. But such is our unhappy-ness; in stead of that blessed Counsel, Do as you would be done unto, a sentence teaching all moderation, and pointing out the way to felicity; we entertain that arrogant thought, I will be like to the most High: that is, I will do what shall please my self. One hath said truly.

Pesse voluit.

James 3.
10.

Even they that have no murderous will,
Would have it in their power to kill.

All, or the most, have a vain desire of ability to do evil without controul: which is a dangerous temptation unto the performance. God, who best can judge what is expedient, hath granted such power to very few: among whom also, very few there are, that use it not to their own hurt. For who keeps not that a Prince, by taking his Sovereign Authority to the utmost extent, enableth (besides the danger to his own person) some one of his own Sons or Nephews to root up all his progeny? Shall not many excellent Princes, notwithstanding their brotherhood, or other nearness in blood, be driven to flatter the Wife, the Minion, or perhaps the Harlot that governs one, the most unworthy of his whole house, yet reigning over all? The untimely death of many Princes which could not humble themselves to such flattery; and the common practice of the Turkish Emperours to murder all their brethren, without expecting till they offend; are two good proofs hereof. Hereunto may be added, that the heir of the same Roger Mortimer, who murdered most traitorously, and barbarously King Edward the second; was, by reason of a marriage, proclaimed, in time not long after following, Heir apparent to the Crown of England: which, had he obtained, then had all the power of Edward fallen into the race of his mortal enemy, to exercise the same upon the Line of that unhappy King. Such examples of the instability whereto all mortal affairs are subject; as they teach moderation, and admonish the transitory gods of Kingdoms, not to authorize by wicked precedents, the evil that may fall on their own posterity: so do they necessarily make us understand, how happy that Country is, which hath obtained a King able to conceive and teach, That *God is the first *The true Law of

for them, without contrivement to turn it upside-down at their pleasure.

Now concerning the Triumph of L. Amylinus Paulus, it was in all points like unto that of T. Quintius Flavius, though far more glorious, in regard of the Kings own person, that was led along therein, as part of his own spoils; and in regard likewise both of the Conquest, and of the Booty. So great was the quantity of Gold and Silver carried by Paulus into the Roman Treasury, that from thenceforth; until the Civil Wars which followed upon the death of Julius Caesar, the Estate had no need to burthen it self with any Tribute. Yet was this noble Triumph likely to have been hindered by the Souldiers; who grudging at their General, for not having dealt more bountifully with them. But the Princes of the Senate over-ruled the people and Souldiers herein, and brought them to reason by severe exhortation. Thus Paulus enjoyed as much honour of this Victory as men could give. Nevertheless, it pleased God to take away from him his two remaining Sons, that were not given in Adoption: of which, the one dyed five days before the Triumph, the other three days after it. This loss he bore wisely: and told the people, That he hoped to see the Common-wealth flourish in a continuance of prosperity; since the joy of his Victory was requited with his own private calamity, in stead of the publick.

About the same time, Octavius the Admiral, who had brought Persus out of Samothrace; and Anicius the Praetor, who had conquered Illyria, and taken King Gentius prisoner; made their several Triumphs. The glory of which magnificent spectacles, together with the confluence of Embassadors from all parts, and Kings, either visiting the Imperial City, or offering to visit her, and do their duties in person; were enow to say unto Rome, Summe Superbiam, Take upon thee the Majesty that thy deserts have purchased.

BY this which we have already set down, is seen the beginning and end of the three first Monarchies of the World; whereof the Founders and Erectors thought, that they could never have ended. That of Rome which made the fourth, was also at this time almost at the highest. We have left it flourishing in the middle of the field; having rooted up, or cut down, all that kept it from the eyes and admiration of the World. But after some continuance, it shall begin to lose the beauty it had; the storms of ambition shall beat her great boughs and branches one against another; her leaves shall fall off, her limbs wither, and a rabble of barbarous Nations enter the field, and cut her down.

Now these great Kings, and conquering Nations, have been the subject of those ancient Histories, which have been preserved, and yet remain among us; and with all of so many tragical Poets, as in the persons of powerful Princes, and other mighty men have complained against Infidelity, Time, Destiny, and most of all against the Variable success of worldly things, and Instability of Fortune. To these undertakings, these great Lords of the World have been stirred up, rather by the desire of Fame, which ploweth up the Air, and soweth in the wind; than by the affection of bearing rule which draweth after it so much vexation, and so many cares. And that this is true, the good advice of Cinco to Pyrrhus proves. And certainly, as Fame hath often been dangerous to the living, so it is to the dead of no use at all; because separate from knowledge. Which, were it otherwise, and the extreme ill bargain of buying this lasting discourse, understood by them which are dissolved; they themselves would then rather have withered, to have stollen out of the world without noise, than to be put in mind, that they have purchased the report of their actions in the World, by rapine, oppression, and cruelty: by giving in spoil the innocent and labouring soul to the idle and insolent, and by having emptied the Cities of the World of their ancient Inhabitants, and filled them again with so many and so variable sorts of sorrows.

Since the fall of the Roman Empire (omitting that of the Germanes, which had neither greatness nor continuance) there hath been no State fearful in the East, but that of the Turk: nor in the West any Prince that hath spread his wings far over his Nest; but the Spaniard; who since the time that Ferdinand expelled the Moors out of Granado, have made many attempts to make themselves Masters of all Europe. And it is true, that by the treasures of both Indies, and by the many Kingdoms which they possess in Europe, they are at this day the most powerful. But as the Turk is now counterpoised by the Persian, so instead of so many Millions as have been spent by the English, French, and Netherlanders in a defensive War, and in diversions against them, it is easy to demonstrate, that with the charge of two hundred thousand pound continued but for two years, or three at the most; they may not only be persuaded to live in peace, but all their swelling and overflowing streams may be brought back into their natural channels and old banks. These two Nations, I say, are at this day the most eminent, and to be regarded; the one seeking to root out the Christian Religion altogether, the other the Truth and sincere Profession thereof; the one to join all Europe to Asia, the other the rest of all Europe to Spain.

For the rest, if we seek a reason of the succession and continuance of this boundless ambition in mortal men, we may add to that which hath been already said; That the Kings and Princes of the World have alwaies laid before them the actions, but not the ends of those great Ones which preceded them. They are alwaies transported with the glory of the one, but they never mind the misery of the other, till they find the experience in themselves. They neglect the advice of God, while they enjoy life, or hope of it; but they follow the counsel of death, upon his first approach. It is he that puts into man all the wisdom of the World, without speaking a word; which God, with all the words of his Law, promises, or threats, doth refuse. Death, which hateth and destroyeth man, is believed; God, which hath made him, and loves him, is alwaies deferred. I have considered (saith Salomon) all the works that are under the Sun, and behold, all is vanity and vexation of spirit: but who believes it till Death tells it us? It was Death, which opening the conscience of Charles the fifth, made him enjoin his Son Philip to restore Navarre; and King Francis the first of France, to command

mand that justice should be done upon the Murderers of the Protestants in Merindol and Cabrieres, which till then he neglected. It is therefore death alone that can suddenly make man to know himself. He tells the proud and insolent, That they are but subjects, and humbles them at the instant; makes them cry, complain, and repeat; yea, even to hate their forepassed happiness. He takes the account of the rich, and proves him a beggar; a naked beggar, which hath interest in nothing, but in the gravel that fills his mouth. He holds a Glass before the eyes of the most beautiful, and makes them see therein their deformity and rottenness; and they acknowledge it.

O eloquent, just, and mighty Death! whom none could advise, thou hast persuaded; what none have dared, thou hast done; and whom all the world hath flattered, thou only hast cast out of the world and despised: thou hast drawn together all the far stretched greatness, all the pride, cruelty, and ambition of man, and covered it all over with these two narrow words, Hic jacet.

Lastly, whereas this Book, by the title it hath, calls it self, The first part of the General History of the World, implying a second and third Volume; which I also intended, and have hewn out; besides many other discouragements, perswading my silence; it hath pleased God to take that glorious Prince out of the world, to whom they were directed, whose unspeakable and never enough lamented loss hath taught me to say with Job, Perfa est in laudum Citibara mea, & Organum meum in decorem silentium.

TO THE READER.

THE use of Chronological Tables is needful to all Histories, that reach to any length of time; and most of all, to those that are most general: since they cannot, like Annals, yearly set down all occurrences not coherent. This here followeth, may serve as an Index to the present part of this work, pointing unto the several matters, that having fallen out at one time, are far disjoyned in the relation. Certainly it is not perfect, neither do I think that any can be. For howsoever the years of the first Patriarchs may seem to have been well-near complete, yet in the reigns of the Kings of Juda and Israel, we find many fissions, and the last year, or years of one King reckoned also as the fore-birth of another. The same is most likely to have fallen out in many other, though not so precisely regarded. Herein may be added the divers and imperfect forms of the year, which were in use among sundry Nations, causing the Summer months, in process of some ages, to fall into the winter, and so breeding extream confusion in the reckoning of their times. Neither is it a small part of trouble, to choose out of so many, and so utterly disagreeing computations, as have already gotten Authority, what may probably be held for truth. All this, and a great deal more, is to be alleged, in excuse of such errors, as a more attentive and perfect Calculator shall happen to find herein. It may serve to free the Book, and likewise the Reader (if but of mean judgement,) from any notorious Anachronicism; which ought to suffice. The book indeed will need it, even in that regard; not only from some errors of the Press, in the numbering of years, but for some haste mis-reckonings of mine own, which I desire to have hereby reformed, in hope that the Printing of this Table shall not want careful diligence. The Reader, of he be not offended with the rest, shall find reason to be pleased with this, as tending wholly to his own ease.

The titles over the Columns, have reference to that which follows under them, as will readily be Conceived. Where two titles, or more, are over the head, as [in some] there do the numbers underneath proportionably answer, the higher to the higher, the lower to the lower. For example, The walls of Jerusalem were finished in the 319. Year from the building of Rome, and in the 314. from Nabonassar. In like manner it is to be understood, That Jehosaphat began his reign in the 3774. of the Julian Era, in the 3092. of the World, and in the 99. year of the Temple. This needs not more illustration, nor indeed so much, to those that are acquainted with works of this kind. To avoid prolixity, I have forbore to insert those years, which I find not signed with some remarkable accident, as with the birth or death of some Patriarch; the beginning of some Kings reign; some change of Government; some battel fought, or the like. So of the 13. years wherein Sylvius Capetus reigned over the Latines, I note only the first; that is, omitting all between the 4. of Jehosaphat, wherein Capetus began, unto the 17. wherein Sylvius Aventinus succeeded, and wherein Jehoram first reigned with Jehosaphat his father. For I thought it vain to have filled up a Page with 12. lines of idle ciphers, numbring forth, 2. 3. 4. 5. and so still onwards, till I had come to the first of Aventinus, and the 17. of Jehosaphat. In setting down the Kings, there is noted over the head of every one, what place he held in order of succession: as whether he were the first, second, fifth, seventh, or so forth in rank of those that reigned in his Country, without notable interruption: Before the name, is the first year of his reign; at the end or foot of the name (as the space gives leave) is the whole number of years in which he reigned; in the spaces following underneath, are those years of his, which were concurrent with the beginning of some other King, or with the year of any remarkable accident. Where two numbers, or more, are found before one Kings name; there it is to be understood, that the same year belonged not only to the King then beginning, but unto some one or more of his foregoers: as the first year of Jehoram King of Israel, was the same with the second of his brother Ahaziah, and the 22. of his father Ahab. Somewhere two or three names are found in one space, as in the 3077 year of the World, Timiri, Tibni, and Omri; it meant, that every one of them reigned in some part of the same year, which is reckoned the second of Ela, and the first of Omi. Particularly, under the reigns of the Egyptian Kings, are set down the years of those Dynasties, which it was thought meet to insert; as likewise elsewhere, the day, the month, upon which Nabonassar's year began

TO THE READER.

THE use of Chronological Tables is needed to all Historians, that reach to any length of time; and most of all, to those that are most general: since they cannot like Daniel, yearly set down all occurrences: not convenient for so voluminous a work, as an Index to the present part of this work, pointing unto the several matters, that having fallen out at one time, are for distinguished in the relation. Certainly it is not perfect, neither do I think that any can be so happy as to recover the years of the first Patriarchs, may seem to have been well-near completed, yet in the reigns of the Kings of Judah and Israel, we find many variations, and the last year of some of our Kings reckoned also as the first of another. The same is most likely to have fallen out in many others, though not so precisely recovered. There may be added the divers, and imperfect forms of the year, which were in use among several Nations, causing the summer months, in present of some ages, to fall into the winter, and so breeding extrem confusion in the reckoning of their times. Neither is it a small part of trouble, to choose out of so many, and so many disagreeing computations, a true account gotten. Authority, what may perhaps be held for truth. All this, and a great deal more, is to be alleged, in excuse of such errors, as a more impetuous and perfect compiler shall happen to find herein. It may serve to free the Book, and likewise the Reader (if but of mean judgement,) from any notorious Anachronism; which ought to suffice. The book indeed will need it, even in that regard; not only from some errors of the Press, in the numbering of years, but for some little mis-reckonings of mine own, which I desire to have hereby reformed, in hope that the Printing of this Table shall not want careful diligence. The Reader, of he be not offended with the rest, shall find reason to be pleased with this, as tending wholly to his own ease.

The titles over the Columns, have reference to that which follows under them, as will readily be conceived. Where two titles, or more, are over the head, as [in the margin] there do the numbers underneath proportionably answer, the higher to the higher, the lower to the lower.
For example, The walls of Jerusalem were finished in the 319. Year from the building of Rome, and in the 314. from Nabonassar. In lian Aera, in the 3092. of the World, and in years, which I find not signed with some regardable accident, as with the birth or death of some Patriarch, the beginning of some Kings

13. lines of idle ciphers, numbering forth, 2. 3.
4. 5. and so still onwards, till I had come to the 17. of Jehosaphat: In sitting down the Kings, there is noted over the head of every one, what place he held in order of succession; or whether he were the first, second, fifth, seventh, or so forth in rank of those that reigned in his Country, without notable interruption: Before the name, is the first year of his reign; at the end or foot of the name, (as the space gives leave) with the beginning of some other King, or with the year of any remarkable accident. Where two numbers, or more, are found before one Kings name; there it is to be understood, that the same year belonged not only to the King then beginning, but unto some one or more of his foregoers: as the first year of Jehoram King of Israel, was the same with the second of his brother Ahaziah, and the 22. of his father Ahab.

Somewhere two or three names are found in one

Tibni, and Omri; it is meant, that every one of them reigned in some part of the same year, which is reckoned the second of Ela, and the first of Omri. Particularly, under the reigns

Concerning the Æra, or account of years, from Iphitus, who began the Olympiads, from Rome built, from Nabonassar, and the like; as much as was thought convenient hath been said, where due place was, in the book it self: so as it remaineth only to note, that under the title of Olympiads, is set down, first the number of the Olympiad, and beneath it, the year of that Olympiad: as that Cyrus began his reign in Persia, in the 55. Olympiad, and the first year thereof.

Now, first, that the years of the world; of the Olympiads, of Rome, of Nabonassar, and others, had not beginning in one month, but some of them in March, some in April, some about Midsummer, and some at other times: the better to express their several beginnings; some painful Chronologers have divided them proportionally in their several Columns, apportioning part of the one year to part of the other: not (as I have here done) cutting all overboard with one straight line, as if all had begun and ended at one time. But this labour have I spared as more troublesome than useful, since the more part would not have apprehended the meaning; and since the learned might well be without it. It will only be needful to observe, that homologue the Era of the Olympiads be 24. years older than that of Rome, and 29. than that of Nabonassar, yet the reign of some King may have begun at such a time of the year as did not fuse with this difference. But hereof I take little regard. The more curious will easily find my meaning: the vulgar will not find the difficulty. One familiar example will explain all. Queen Elizabeth began her reign the 17. of November, in the year of our Lord 1558. she was crowned, held a Parliament, brake it up, threw down Images, and reformed many things in Religion; all in her first year, yet not all in that year 1558. but the greater part in the year following, whether we begin with the first of January, or with the 25. of March. The like may be otherwhiles found in this Table, but so, as the difference is never of a whole year.

The Julian Period, which I have placed at the greater number, over the years of the World, was delivered by that honourable, and excellent learned Joseph Scaliger, being accommodated to the Julian year, now in use, which it consists of 7980; years and which is divided by the multiplication of 19, 28, and 12, that is, of the Cycle of the Moon, the Cycle of the Sun, and the years of an Indiction. Being divided by any of these it leaves the number of the present year, or if no fraction remain, it leaves the last year of that Cycle to be current. For example, in the 4498. of this Period, which we fought the great battle of Cannae, the Prime of golden number was 14, the Cycle of the Sun, 18, and consequently the Dominical Letter P. It may be found by dividing the same number of the Julian Period 4498, by 19, for the Prime, by 28, for the Cycle of the Sun. This Julian Period, after the present account, always exceeds the year of the present aeternity, besides the former use, and other thence redunding, it is a better Character of a year, than any other Era, as From the beginning of the World, From the Flood, From Troy taken, or the like) which are of more uncertain position. More I shall not need to write, as touching the use or explication of these Tables. Neither as they much requisite to such as are conversant in works of this kind: it is sufficient if hereby all be made plain enough to the vulgar.
